Musie loving society is looking forward with no little expectancy to the piano recital to be given on the evening of Wednesday, April 24, at the studio of Emil Steinegger, 924 Grove street, by his pupil, Miss Elsie Harwood. Piano recitals are many, and infant prodigies common as quakes, but a piano recital by a young musician of really exceptional talent, such as Miss Harwood, is rare as the fire of yesteryear. Miss Harwood is the daughter of H. E. Harwood, assessor of Brooklyn township, Alameda county. The following programme will be rendered: Beethoven, Sonate C sharp minor, Op. 27, No. 2. (Moonlight), (I) Adagio Sostenuto, (II) Allegretto, (III) Presto Agitato; Chopin, (a) Nocturne, D flat, (b) Etude, Op. 25, No. 9, (c) Prelude, (d) Polonaise, C. minor; Rullak, Two Studies in Octaves, No. 3, No. 1; Henselt, Etude, "Si Oseau Je Etais"; Grieg, Norwegian Bridal Procession; Schumann, Selections from Op. 9; Mendelssohn, Scherzo, Opp. 16; Mozart, Rondo in A minor; Moritz Moszkowski, Caprice Espagnol.

A Californian In Rome

Albert Hooper, the eldest son of John Hooper, the wealthy lumberman, is in Rome and has already opened a studio in the Eternal City. Mr. Hooper was a successful business man but his aesthetic leanings were so great as to cause him to give up commercial life and devote all his energies to art. He is a clever miniature painter. The news that he has established himself as a painter in one of the world's great centers of art will come as a surprise to many of his acquaintances here. Two of his friends, E. T. Mezzersmith and Donald de V. Graham are already established as buyers and sellers of antiques in another Italian City, Florence. Mr. Hooper was not well known in society although he was a wealthy bachelor. His only unmarried sister Jeanette is a favorite in her particular circle. One of her sisters married the son of Chief Justice Beatty.

Mrs. Frank Lowden's Ambitions

I hear that Mrs. Frank O. Lowden, Mrs. Carolan's sister, has been inoculated with the social virus and that she intends to make New York and Washington society sit up and take notice. She has taken the John A. Logan house in Washington and will make a determined social campaign, even if her husband is only a Representative. Her choice of the Logan house as a base of warfare is interesting on account of the fact that Mrs. Logan has played such an important part in the social careers of the two sisters Pullman. It was this gentle grande dame who chaperoned them through Europe and finally introduced them to Washington society, the two girls making their debut under her wing. Mrs. Lowden has never cared to visit San Francisco or to invade Burlingame, her sister's stronghold. I hear that she considers our society "crude"—and she from Chicago!

Sequoia's Breakfast Guests

The Sequoia Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution gave their annual breakfast at the Severn, on Friday, April 12. Covers were laid for 100 people, all of whom were D. A. R's from different parts of the Coast.

Mr. A. L. Spreckles and J. N. Harper were among last week's guests at Paraiso Hot Springs.

La Prova Club Recital

One of the principal musical events of last week was the first recital given by La Prova Club, Thursday evening, April eleventh, at Calvary Presbyterian Church. This Club was organized last winter with Mrs. E. Abramson as President and Walter B. Bartlett, Director. A large and enthusiastic audience enjoyed the fine program rendered. The soloists were Miss Gertrude Judd, Miss Clara Raubut, Dr. Maud Noble, Miss C. Cohn, Mrs. E. Abramson, Mrs. L. Christin, Mrs. M. Richards, Mrs. L. Peterson, Mrs. N. Hughes, Miss Veen and Mrs. L. Butler.

Allalba Club's Last Hop

The last dance of the Allalba Club this season was given at the Paris Tea Garden last Saturday. The attendance was very large, guests having been invited to take part in the affair. Among those present were the Misses Reddin, Miss Etta Kreutzman, Miss Elsa Kaempff, Miss Mary Skaife, Miss Grace Willpert, Miss Emma Bazet, Miss Rose Gardner, Miss Violet Lincoln, William Grass, Ben Archibald Schmidt and Harry Hund.

Santa Barbara Notes

With the middle west contingent at Santa Barbara last month was Julius Fleischman of Cincinnati. This remarkable young man was three times Mayor of the Queen City before he was thirty and is a prominent factor in both commercial and social life in his home city, being interested in a dozen of the largest enterprises there and a member of all the leading clubs. In his college days Julius was stroke-oar, half-back, first base, and the back bone of his track team; and a large portion of his time in Santa Barbara was spent astride a horse or in the glorious surf in front of the Murine Eye Remedy Makes Dull Eyes Bright. Sick Eyes Well. Soothes and Quickly Cures Ailing Eyes.

"Potter." Another Cincinnati was Harry L. Wauss, one of the founders of the Elberon County Club.

The theatrical colony at Santa Barbara this summer is practically assured, quite a number of the leading lights of the profession having already bought or rented cottages to be in readiness at the close of the present winter season.

The fact that the new polo grounds in Santa Barbara are fast nearing completion, and that the exclusive county club is becoming a little more lenient regarding outside or summer membership, will attract many San Franciscans who already have their ponies in the Channel City.

The U. S. Battleship Milwaukee will leave San Francisco Wednesday of this week for Santa Barbara and the balance of the squadron will come up from Magdalena in about ten days. Numerous affairs for the officers and their families will be given at the "Potter" during the stay of the fleet.

Bogart Back Among His Friends

After a successful Eastern season Andrew Bogart is back in this city and plans spending the summer among his old cronies here. While his wide circle of friends will be delighted to renew old intimacies with the sweet singer, they will be disappointed to learn that an eleventh-hour change of plans is to deprive them of the opportunity to see him across the footlights. Bogart has been playing one of the big roles in "The Girl and the Governor" with the Jefferson De Angelis Opera Company and it was expected that he would come here with this clever organization and play an engagement at the Van Ness Theatre in June. Unfortunately for us, the company's plans were changed at the last moment and the season was ended in New Orleans; so we must be content this time to hear Bogart when he favors us off the boards. He is occupying his old home at 350 Buchanan street, where he intends to receive a limited number of pupils during the summer months.

Guests at Del Monte

San Francisco arrivals at Del Monte during the past week were: Mr. and Mrs. R. Adams and their two children, Mr. and Mrs. Otto A. Jungblut and Otto A. Jungblut Jr., Mr. and Mrs. M. Browne, Mr. and Mrs. Charles, Mr. and Mrs. Martin J. Dunn, Miss Leonard, Miss Letitia Leonard, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Phelps and child, Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Cox and child, C. S. Aiken, J. J. Hoag, H. H. Lewis, John Caffrey, S. S. Gordon, D. Ghirardelli, F. M. Ames, H. K. Montgomery, A. E. Hughes, J. S. Dinkelspiel, S. B. Dinkelspiel, S. D. Gordon, Max Iorenz, T. W. Read, Dr. H. O. Hornett, F. F. Runyon, H. A. Klyce, William Kelley, J. Brewster, F. E. Booth and John G. Iis.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Marx (Miss Reine Weill) have returned to the city after spending their honeymoon at Del Monte. Mr. and Mrs. Rawlinson M. Reade and Mr. and Mrs. R. L. Laughlin are two young couples now at Del Monte. Mrs. Reade is a niece of Parker Whitney, and a very attractive girl.

General L. P. Jocelyn, just retired from the Fourteenth Infantry, is at Del Monte, with Mrs. Jocelyn, Miss Jocelyn and Mrs. Hume. A number of the officers of the Monterey Presidio have been over to pay their respects to General Jocelyn, who is very popular in both army and social circles.

The Minetti Orchestra will give its first concert of the season in Christian Science Hall on Friday evening, April 26. The programme is full of promise, containing, as it does, the Mozart Symphony in E flat major and Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor. Giulio Minetti is evidently of the opinion that the love of good music which San Francisco is said to have lost in the fire was fully insured in some dollar-for-dollar company.

Ruth McNutt's Marriage

Society is hearing new details every day of Ruth McNutt's marriage to Mr. Brown of Denver. A friend who has recently returned from Europe tells me that the wealthy widower has been paying marked attention to her from the Riviera to Rome and the American colony long ago picked him out as a winner. Mrs. Robinson Riley (Genevieve Goad) summed up their sentiments when she said, "After all, his ready-to-use money compensates for his ready-made family." The fair Genevieve really has a nice appreciation of epigram which beauty worshipers seldom credit her with. She probably developed a fondness for the antics of adjectives at the time that Addison Mizner was devoting himself to her. That was before the beautiful young widow finally accepted the "three R's," as her husband is called.

She Fears Our Climate

The same informant who seasoned the McNutt-Brown nuptials with sauce piquante for me tells me that Adelaide Murphy Breckinridge is the same effervescent Addie who once furnished a tang to San Francisco society. Adelaide confessed to my friend that she would like to visit us once more but "that the San Francisco climate stimulated her so she was never responsible out here." So perhaps the marriage of the banker's daughter and young Breckinridge may be ascribed to climatic conditions. The Breckinridge baby is a cunning youngster and usurps a great deal of his young mother's time. My informant says that Mrs. Breckinridge really enjoys much better health in Europe and looks much better than she did out here.

Mackenzie Gordon Song Recital

The first song recital ever given in San Francisco by Mackenzie Gordon, whose tenor tones have so often been heard in the cause of charity, will take place on Wednesday evening, April 24, commencing at a quarter to nine o'clock. The grand ballroom of the Fairmont Hotel has been secured for this occasion, so the affair will have a double attractiveness for those who have not yet seen that beautiful hall. Mr. Mackenzie Gordon will be assisted by Arthur Weiss, the 'cellist, while Fred Maurer will preside at the piano. Tickets for the recital are now on sale at the music store of Benjamin Curtaz & Son on Van Ness avenue between California and Sacramento streets.

Autos Make Run To Byron

The season seems to be opening at Byron, several automobiles having made the run last Sunday. Mr. Roy J. Somers accompanied by F. A. Somers, Miss Emily Martin and Miss Pearl Judson made the trip in a Pierce-Arrow; F. L. Fagert and a party from Oakland did it in a Packard, while Mr. and Mrs. H. R. Bostwick, accompanied by Mrs. E. L. Hunt, Harry C. Hunt and Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Moroney went in a Pope Toledo; Mr. and Mrs. Homer Boushey arrived in a Pope-Hartford. They report that the roads from Oakland to Livermore are in excellent condition, and from Livermore to Byron via Midway the roads are in fair condition, and should be much better at an early date.

The Siren's Death

(These verses which found their inspiration in Florence Roberts' portrayal of Sapho were written and dedicated to the actress by Jean C. MacMillan. Miss Roberts will recite them during the presentation of the play next week.)

The end! Ah, say it not; for I had thought
To sing my way into the realm of endless day;
To win, by all my power of song, forgiveness for my wrong.
But now, 'tis come, and I am strangely dumb:
I cannot sing, for o'er my head and by my bed I hear the rustle of a wing.
Oh God! 'tis death, death cold and still, and I must go, alone and 'gainst my will.
The end? Ah, no! For that was long ago;
So far, like you, bright star, it only seems the echo of my dreams.
But ah! 'twas more, it was the opening of a door,
And then, the closing up again, before I knew 'twas true.
That was the end when, in my youth, he tutored me of love's great truth,
And taught me to be satisfied just at his side.

He led me on. I slept, and then the truth upon me crept,
That he was gone, gone with but this—a kiss!
Gone when my soul had drunk its fill, and left me on life's hill.
I could not climb thus from his side; yet for a time I tried.
I would not think it was his will, to leave me thus alone, until
I saw him clasp a hand more fair and climb fame's stair!
I turned. I had no friend. Father above, that was the end!
That kiss! A thousand times, not this.
And now, go by! I long to die: I crave no breast on which to rest;
No arm to lean, a sad Siren.

But this I know—there, in Life's glorious afterglow,
He will not spurn to clasp my hand, nor fail to understand.
For looking through the thickening mist, he sees the sins I did resist.
The World? Ah well! the World knows only that I fell.
And so I go without a fear to ask his grace,
When I have seen His face.

Florence Roberts' "Maria Rosa"

To see Florence Roberts in Angel Guimera's "unpleasant" play, "Maria Rosa," is to be moved, deeply and not unpleasantly; and that, after all, is what most of us go to the theatre for—is it not? Given half a chance, Miss Roberts seldom (never, to my knowledge) fails to supply the thrill for which the playgoer pays his none too easily earned money; and "Maria Rosa," for all its unpleasantness, gives her a whole chance, so to say, or very nearly that. Despite the tediousness of the altogether too many lines devoted to "necessary explanations"—a tediousness which not even Miss Roberts' admirable diction could render quite endurable, as the passionate Catalonian peasant girl, into whose fibre the mingled wine and blood from the needle-wound in her lover's foot has passed, ample opportunity is afforded her to demonstrate to the hearty satisfaction of the critic how mature, though still slightly melodramatic, her acting now is. Deprived by the treacherous Ramon of the husband whose blood she has drunk, Maria Rosa, in the skillful hands of the modernist who created her, becomes a rare subject for psychological exploitation. Fourteen months of widowhood finds the flesh sadly athirst; and there is a strange confusing of dead husband and living lover (Ramon, of course) in the soul of the woman. With water which

Death has not spilled, at hand, nay, proffered, forced upon her, is a poor Catalonian peasant girl to perish of thirst? or drink, and hate herself? As Miss Roberts presents it, the problem is certainly not wanting in fascination. Human nature, it seems, is very much the same, whether in Catalonia or California. Maria Rosa, circumstances aiding and abetting, if not compelling, her, makes up her mind to drink. What would you? Is she not a woman, and a poor peasant at that? Not for such as she such delicacy of intuition as that which enabled the exquisite lady of Gautier's "Avatar" to detect in the body of her beloved husband the soul of her rejected lover. With misgivings not a few, Maria Rosa, then, makes up her mind to drink; that is to say, to marry Ramon. At the marriage feast (there must needs be eating and drinking on the stage to satisfy the audience of today), wine pressed by the feet of the dead opens the lips of the living husband. Murder outs. Maria Rosa takes the law into her own hands. She doesn't drink. But she does hate herself, be sure. The avenging dagger, my word for it, went home all the better for that. If these vague hints do not make it plain to you that the Spanish playwright gives Miss Roberts (especially, as becomes him, in the third act) something more than that half a chance, which is all she needs, then go to the Novelty Theatre yourself and come away convinced. On the stage, as in real life, your Ramons have a hard part to play, and it is not altogether Mr. Bergen's fault that the character he represents does not quite carry conviction. As comic sugar-coating for his unpleasant pill, Angel Guimera offers us Tomasa, Quirico, and their quarrels. I have no quarrel with him or them.

—Harry Cowell.

The Chicago Orchestra

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, after a belated arrival and much confusion over delayed baggage, including most of the scores, gave their first concert last Friday evening at Christian Science Hall. The programme was necessarily much changed in order to adjust it to their depleted repertoire, otherwise two such heavy Beethoven compositions as the third Leonore Overture and the "Eroica" symphony should never have been given at the same concert. And the long Symphonic Variations by Bellman for 'cello and orchestra between the severely classical Beethoven pieces did not dispel the feeling of ennui induced by an overdose of deadly serious music. The orchestra is conducted by Alexander von Fielitz, a composer of distinction, who wields his baton in thoroughly competent fashion. The playing was at all times excellent, flawless in attack and altogether beyond criticism in its accompaniment work. And Mr. von Fielitz has the rare good taste to confine his violent and visible work to rehearsal periods so that at the concerts he may indulge in a refreshingly quiet demeanor that ought to act as a rebuke to many conductors who perform unpleasant gymnastics in sight of the public. The soloists of the first concert were Mme. Marie Zimmerman, who uses her fine soprano with discrimination, Dr. Schussler, the possessor of a good baritone voice, well schooled, but lacking in temperament, and Franz Wagner, 'cellist, whose instrument did not emit the beautiful sounds we are accustomed to when Hekking or Gerardy controls the bow. An interesting novelty of the evening was the Irish Rhapsody by Villiers Stanford, a Dublin composer. The work is fairly original, very well constructed, and proved an enjoyable and inspiring close to the programme.

The University Symphony Concert

The tenth symphony concert of the season by the University Orchestra took place on Thursday of last week at the Greek Theatre with Mr. and Mrs. Petschnikoff as soloists. The programme consisted of the first symphony of Schumann, the Tschaikowsky violin concerto, and the Concertante Symphonie, for violin and viola, of Mozart. The Schumann work, his Spring Symphony, was delightful, and though there was a noticeable lack of animation in portions of the first and last movements, the rendition as a whole was good, the larghetto and scherzo being particularly well read. But the clou of the afternoon was the rendition of the Tschaikowsky concerto by Alexandre Petschnikoff. Such playing of such a composition is epoch making to a music lover, and the whole season of musical attractions contained no peer to this chef d'oeuvre. All the salient points of excellence in Petschnikoff's playing as set forth in the preceding recitals dwindle into insignificance when one considers his glorious performance of the Tschaikowsky work, and from the first few measures one felt the conviction that the player and the composer were one as to sentiment, that this particular music was to the violinist an outlet for his individual emotions, and the intimate personal friendship that existed between Tschaikowsky and Petschnikoff doubtless owed its origin to this unanimity of temperament. The strong Russian flavor of the composition was most vividly apparent in the first movement, where musical phrases of glowing sentiment or ecstatic passion are interspersed with episodes of barbaric splendor, and Petschnikoff's violin seemed a living thing portraying the gamut of human emotions. The canzonetta movement which followed was a vehicle for the artist's supremely beautiful tone coloring, while the Finale was a tremendous climax to the whole. The tranquil beauties of the Mozart duo which succeeded the concerto while of refreshing spontaneity and played with consummate artistry by Mr. and Mrs. Petschnikoff, did not dispel the impression produced by the Tschaikowsky composition. The next concert of the University Orchestra will take place May second with the following programme: Second Symphony, Brahms; Italian Serenade, Wolf; Roman Carnival Overture, Berlioz, and the d'Albert concerto for violincello with Anton Hekking as soloist.

A Week of Successes

The interest of the lovers of the drama has not been entirely centered during the past week on Florence Roberts and her Spanish play. At the Van Ness Theatre "The Cingalee" has proved one of the biggest suc-suit them perfectly to the entire satisfaction of their critical admirers. A well balanced company aids these in making the farce go with lightning speed. E. Milton Royle's beautiful comedy of "Friends" has been an unusually strong attraction to the patrons of the Colonial Theatre. It is a delicately constructed play and finds acceptable interpretation at the hands of the clever stock company. Morgan Wallace, the new leading man, is an actor whose work shows good training and considerable native talent. Izetta Jewel's portrayal of the leading feminine role is up to her high standard of conscientious efficiency; and the rest of the company acquits itself well. The Fadettes Woman's Orchestra need not plead the gallantry due their sex to secure for themselves the first mention in a review of this week's bill at the Orpheum. They are instrumentalists of wonderful versatility and most satisfactory execution and the audience every night seems never to hear enough from them. Louis Agoust in a Frenchy skit finds opportunity to display her skill as a juggler; while Morrow and Schellberg have a singing and dancing act in which the pedal is immeasurably superior to the vocal part. Cartmell and Harris give a dancing act, too, but it is too good to surfeit an Orpheum audience. Dorothy Drew in her second week is just as good as in her first, which is saying much. At the American Theatre "The Tenderfoot" has had a hearing entirely warranted by its good music and its catchy comedy. Teddy Webb has a part that repays his efforts and Miss Sinnott continues the good work which introduced her to the local theatre-goers. The other principals do justice to the tuneful ditties provided for them and the chorus is excellent.

Last Week of "The Tenderfoot"

Commencing with the Sunday matinee the San Francisco Opera Company enters upon the second week of "The Tenderfoot" and also on its final week at the American Theatre. "The Tenderfoot" has had a most cesses given since the opening of that playhouse. It is a musical comedy of the best sort with fascinating ensembles, tuneful music and bright comedy, and the members of the Augustin Daly Company who are presenting it in no wise disappoint expectation. Genevieve Finlay especially shows herself a capable actress and an accomplished singer with a fine contralto voice. Melville Stewart and Hallen Mostyn stood out as particularly good while Sam Collins, the diminutive comedian, was rewarded for his efforts with hearty laughter. A scarf dance performed by two attractive young women won deserved applause. At the Alcazar "All on Account of Eliza," one of Dietrichstein's best farces, has drawn together a nightly audience reminiscent of nothing so much as of the old O'Farrell street days. The company does full justice to the roaring humor of the piece. Bertram Lytell and John Maher divide the principal masculine honors, while Daisy Lovering and Laura Lang handle parts that successful run and will no doubt continue next week to attract those who enjoy a tuneful musical comedy. Everybody is ideally cast in "The Tenderfoot." Teddy Webb makes a distinct hit as the boisterous Sergeant Barker, and Miss Sinnott is as clever and bewitching as ever in the character of Sally. George Kunkel as Professor Pettibone and Fred Rogers as Hop Lee are also excellently cast, while the remaining principals, including Carl Haydn, Aida Hemmi, Aimee Leicester and Ruby Norton all appear to the utmost advantage. The song hits of "The Tenderfoot" are numerous and the large audiences seem to appreciate them to the utmost extent. Among the lyric gems are "My Alamo Love," "I'm a Peaceable Party," "Adios," "Marriage Is a Lottery," and "The Tortured Thomas Cat." The choruses are particularly attractive.

with considerable danger to themselves. Bessie Wynn, who is one of the most beautiful girls on the American stage and who twinkled brightly as the star of the original production of the Babes in Toyland, will sing some new songs. Harry Linton and Anita Lawrence, two Broadway stars, will make their vaudeville debut in a racy little sketch entitled "An Auto Elopement." The Rialto Comedy Four is sure to be an immense hit. Their entertainment of song comedy and fun has proved one of the greatest successes of the present season. Some of the best acts have been retained from this week, notably Louise Agoust and Company in her charming bit of French vaudeville, Cartmell and Harris with their singing and dancing specialties, Morrow and Schellberg, the singing mimics, and the famous Fadettes Woman's Orchestra of Boston, which performs so well under the baton of Caroline B. Nichols.

Laughable Farce at the Alcazar

After the success of "All on Account of Eliza" this past week, the New Alcazar Stock Company will continue to keep its friends laughing in "There and Back," George Arliss's delightful comedy. The author spins his plot around the matrimonial troubles of a pair of husbands, who endeavor to outwit their wives and spend a few weeks on a lark of the bachelor days' variety. Their efforts to retire to the seclusion necessary for this purpose bring about all sorts of laughable complications and keep the play from lapsing for a moment into dullness. There is a fascinating air of subdued scandal about the performance that adds spice to every situation. Bertram Lytell, the handsome leading man, and John B. Maher, the comedian, are cast in the two prominent male roles, while playing opposite them are Laura Lang and Adele Belgarde. Daisy Lovering, as the lady with a past, has a very prominent part; while Will Walling, H. D. Byers and Ernest Glendinning have acceptable roles. "There and Back" will be followed by Barrie's "The Admirable Crichton."

Florence Roberts in Sapho

The fourth and final week of Florence Roberts' engagement at the Novelty Theatre will commence on Monday night and undoubtedly a big audience will be on hand to greet the actress when she appears in the role of Sapho, for Miss Roberts's performance of this part is well known here and has always been a special favorite. The play will be given an elaborate production. Thurlow Bergen will appear in the role of Jean and this assures a splendid presentation of the part. All the members of the Roberts company will appear in the production. There will be a matinee on Saturday only. It is announced that the management of the Novelty Theatre has arranged for a special season of two weeks of the San Francisco Opera Company. The first week, commencing Monday, April 29, will be devoted to a magnificent revival of "Robin Hood" in which will be heard an extremely fine cast.

"The Serenade" will be sung during the second week. Special scenery and effects will be utilized in the presentation of these two favorite works.

Hitchcock to Play One Night More

Raymond Hitchcock is to play a special return engagement at the Van Ness Theatre on Sunday night in his merry musical comedy, "A Yankee Tourist," which proved a big hit at the Novelty Theatre a few weeks since. He comes back to this city for the one performance only, the date being secured because the engagement of "The Cingalee" closes on Saturday night while Lillian Russell does not commence her engagement until Monday. "A Yankee Tourist" played to enormous business at the Novelty Theatre and the special Sunday night performance at the Van Ness will give many an opportunity to secure seats who were unable to make reservations during the run of the piece at the Novelty Theatre.

Benefit Performance

The Theatrical Mechanical Association of this city will give a benefit next Thursday afternoon in aid of their charity fund. The affair will take place at the Novelty Theatre and those in charge hope to offer one of the biggest programmes ever given for a benefit here. Many of the best acts from the various theatres in this city will be given to swell the programme of features. Seats are now on sale at the box office of the theatre.

Ouida Play at Colonial

"Moths," a dramatization of Ouida's famous novel, will be the offering at the Colonial Theatre for the week commencing Monday evening, April 22. The cast this week is exceptionally strong and well balanced, including Frank Bacon, Morgan Wallace, the new leading man who has already hit popular favor; Izetta Jewell, A. Burt Wesner, Maud Odelle, Jane Jeffery, Bessie Bacon and Lonna Nelson. One of the features in connection with the presentation of this drama will be the staging, George Lask having been specially engaged to look after this end of the production. "Moths" is at once highly dramatic and replete with bright comedy, being equal in merit and interest to "The Charity Ball" and "The Wife." It was first played here by the original New York Company and later by the Frawley Company at the Columbia Theatre. The excellent performance of "Friends" has attracted big crowds this week and is proving one of the biggest successes of the Colonial. Sunday night will be the last opportunity afforded local theatre-goers to witness "Friends," with Saturday and Sunday matinees.

Annie Russell will follow Lillian Russell at the Van Ness Theatre, appearing as Puck in an elaborate revival of "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Henrietta Crossman will present "All-of-a-Sudden Peggy" and "The Almighty Dollar" during her coming engagement at the Van Ness Theatre.

The Viavi System of Treatment

Its Basic Principles

Viavi Stands for an intelligent recognition of the fundamental laws of physical well-being. Observance of these laws means health. The penalty of their violation is ill health. An immense amount of needless suffering is the result of ignorance. Most of it could be avoided by a knowledge of the facts as they are.

Viavi Stands for a dissemination of these facts; for health and happiness in the family and the home; for healthy fatherhood, motherhood and sturdy babyhood. Viavi believes that motherhood is the highest honor to which a woman can attain.

For Nature as the sole curative power. No man or medicine can cure. The best that one can do is either to get out of Nature's way or to furnish her such assistance as she may need.

In the "Boston Medical and Surgical Journal," under date of November 29, 1906, a prominent Massachusetts physician says this: "Nature is the real curative agent. 'Nature alone can heal. This is the highest law of practical medicine and the one to which we must adhere. Nature creates and maintains. She must, therefore, be able to cure.' The physician then really can do little more than to supply for his patient the most favorable conditions and materials with which Nature is to work."

"First, perhaps, we should name the blood as the agent which supplies all the material from which tissues are built and from which the glands of the body elaborate their secretions. The same blood stream is the principal agent for tearing down and removing the old and obstructing material. An eminent clinician has well remarked, 'It is the blood that heals.'"

"Second in importance in the work of reconstruction of the body is the part played by the nerves, as the nervous system dominates all the phenomena of organic life. It is well said, 'The cells are the artisans in the organs' workshop, but the nerves are the overseers.' Hence it is often necessary in the work of therapeutics to rouse the nervous system to more vigorous work."

In the New York Medical Journal, December 16, 1906, a Philadelphia physician has this to say: "No cell can be sick or diseased, except as a result of a direct injury, if it be supplied with the proper quality and quantity of blood and have its waste products properly removed."

"All curative measures must be directed to the restoration of the normal quality and quantity of blood to the part or parts affected."

This Has Been Viavi Doctrine for Twenty Years.

Viavi is not a cure-all. Within the range which it covers, however, it is an effective aid to Nature in removing the cause of suffering.

Viavi stands for natural as opposed to operative measures. It does not claim that an operation never is necessary. At its best, however, it is a bad last resort, and an unnecessary or reckless operation is as criminal as homicide.

Viavi condemns the reckless surgical tendency to unsex womanhood.

Viavi Stands for the education of young manhood and womanhood in matters vital to their physical well-being; the uprooting of the tradition which makes health vulgar and intelligence vicious.

The anniversary of the catastrophe of April 18th finds Viavi in its new home on Pine street, east of Stockton, to visit which it cordially invites its friends, or those who may be interested in this natural system of treatment.

"The Tale of the Turquoise Skull"

her peculiarities might enable me to rescue Harry from her toils. This, then, was the main reason of my visit, and after a few words of courtesy I introduced the subject. The pious horror with which Fray Benito received the name of Lola served only to confirm my fears.

"What is this you tell me, Don Francisco?" said he severely. "Have you been led astray by this daughter of evil?"

"No, reverend sir. I speak in the interest of my friend, who is now in her toils."

"God help him!" said the monk, crossing himself. "She will lure him to death, as she has lured others. Demon, succuba, would that the Holy Office were still in existence, to burn thee to ashes!"

"Who is she, Fray?"

"A demon, senior. Have you not heard of the turquoise skull?"

"No; what is the turquoise skull?"

"It is an instrument of evil possessed by this creature," said Fray Benito, with much energy—"the skull of a heathen king adorned with jewels, and inhabited by evil spirits. With it she works her devilries. Twelve men has she slain. Holy Mary forbid that your friend should be the thirteenth!"

"You don't mean to say that she has murdered twelve men?" I demanded uneasily. The attitude of the monk frightened me.

"Who knows how they die? She lures them with her beauty, and gives them the turquoise skull as a token. Then they perish."

"How do they perish?"

"Nay, senior, I cannot tell you. There was an unworthy brother of our order who was charmed by this succuba, and fell away from his vows. In due time, as is her custom, she gave him the turquoise skull. He bore it to his cell, and was found next morning seated before it—dead."

"And the skull?"

"We sprinkled it with holy water, and conjured the evil spirit who dwelt within to depart. But she came, the accursed one, and bore it away. Ay, my son, bolts and bars and stone walls could not keep her out of the House of the Star. She appeared like a demon in our midst, and disappeared with the skull. We buried Fray Anselm at midnight. May his soul find peace!"

At the conclusion of this story the friar betook himself to his prayers and his rosary; and, seeing that my presence was distasteful, I left him to his devotions.

This was the first I had heard of the turquoise skull, but I was to hear of it again within an hour. This time it was from a lepero. There was no connection between monk and vagabond, yet both spoke of the same thing. Fate is fond of duplicating incidents. My acquaintance with Don Panchito Diaz de Grijalva—for so he styled himself—began by my saving his life. The lepero was crossing the road, when a stallion beyond the control of its rider dashed round the corner. Had I not instinctively rushed forward and he would have been trampled to death. This he recognized, for, having devoutly crossed himself, he dragged Don Panchito out of harm's way, assuredly shook his fist at the flying steed, and advanced towards me with a lordly air.

"I lay myself at your illustrious feet, senior," said he in the stately Spanish tongue. "You are my preserver. All I have is yours."

The gift was no princely one, for his whole wardrobe could have been purchased for half a crown. His skin was as ingrained with dirt as were his clothes. Beyond a pair of leathern breeches, a ragged shirt, and a cloak, he wore nothing worth mentioning save a tattered sombrero, which he held in his hand during our interview. With his evil eyes, his shining teeth, and his long matted hair, he appeared anything but a desirable acquaintance. But, in nowise conscious of his defects, he rolled a cigarette and straddled impudently before me. A finer specimen of the gaol-bird I never beheld, and as I was in no way desirous of continuing his acquaintance I muttered some acknowledgment of his words and turned to go. This, however, he would not permit.

"Do my eyes deceive me," said he, stepping back a pace, "or do I indeed behold the renowned and noble Senor Don Francisco, who honors our city with his magnificent presence?"

I admitted the identity, and turned my back upon him as before; but with no better result.

"Nay, Senor," said he reproachfully, "you must allow Don Panchito Diaz de Grijalva to pay his debts. I owe you my life; permit me to save that of your illustrious friend."

"What is that you say?" I asked, considerably startled.

"Don Henriquez is devoted to Lola Tepeaca. Let him beware, lest she give to him the turquoise skull."

"That skull again! What do you know about it?"

"Everything, your lordship. Was it not I who brought the skull to Lola from the holy hermit Felix, who dwells in yonder mountains? Assuredly it was. Eh, Senor! know you not that he who possesses the turquoise skull surely dies?"

"How does he die?"

"Truly I know not, Senor. It is said that a fiend who slays dwells within the skull; but of the truth of this I know nothing. For four days was I carrying it from the hills, yet still I am alive."

"And Lola, who possesses it; she also is alive."

"The father of sin does not kill his best soldiers, Don Francisco; the demon who dwells within the skull permits her to live and to work harm. Yet," added Panchito, raising a significant forefinger, "twelve has he slain." Beware, Senor, and let not your illustrious friend take the love gift, lest he make the thirteenth."

And with this Panchito took his departure, while I hurried back to the hotel, filled with alarm at the dangers hinted at by Fray Benito and the lepero. Both had warned me, in words almost identical, against the turquoise skull. And although I was not sufficiently superstitious to believe in the existence of this demon, yet the assurance that twelve men had fallen victims to the skull resolved me to warn Harry against accepting it from Lola. But my information had come too late, for when I opened the door there was the turquoise skull on the table, and over it bent my friend.

The sight fitted in so dramatically with the stories I had heard, that it was impossible to suppress an ejaculation of surprise. Harry looked up, and laughed at my staring eyes and open mouth.

"Well, old fellow," he said cheerfully, "you look a bit off color. Have you been sampling the wine of the country?"

"Where in the name of heaven did you get that infernal thing?" I stammered.

"Oh, this skull? Queer, isn't it? Lola gave it to me."

"I guessed as much; give it back to her at once."

"Come, now, Frank, don't try me too far; I thought we settled all that this morning?"

I dropped into a chair without making a reply, and stared at the blue object on the table. It was a man's skull, completely encrusted with rough turquoises, save the cavities of the nose and eyes, which were filled in with Durango rubies. Behind these the red eyes glittered in uncanny fashion, and this caused me to suspect the presence of tin-foil. I am fairly self-controlled, but when I remembered how that gruesome skull, with its blue scalp and winking eyes, had in some unknown way caused the death of twelve men, I own that I was unnerved. Shaking and white, I clutched the table, whilst Harry eyed me in angry surprise.

"What the deuce is the matter, Frank? This skull—"

"Will cause your death. Give it back to Lola."

"The sun has been too strong for you," said Harry, with a clouded face; "go and lie down for an hour."

He was about to lift the skull, when I sprang up from my chair and dragged him back.

"Don't touch it, Harry. Fray Benito says—"

"Oh, so that old monk has been gossiping to you about Lola, has he?" When I said that you knew him she told me how he hated her."

"Did she mention how this turquoise skull brought about the death of a priest?"

"No; nor would I have believed it if she had. How can this dead thing kill any man?"

"At all events it has killed twelve."

"Fray Benito again!"

"Yes, and not he alone; a lepero I met with but an hour ago spoke with horror of that skull and of its owner."

"This is becoming interesting," said Frank, drawing his chair close to mine. "Tell me what they say, Frank."

Glad of the opportunity, I recounted the conversations of Fray Benito and the lepero. Harry listened attentively, but made no remark until I had finished. Then he shrugged his shoulders and laughed.

"I never heard such nonsense in my life," said he disdainfully. "It is a wonder to me how a sensible man like yourself can swallow such monstrous fables. Twelve men killed by that skull! Twelve fiddlesticks; it is merely a curious relic of a bygone civilization; the head of some old Aztec or Toltec king embalmed and encrusted with gems. A hermit who knew Lola long before he retired from the world sent it to her as a present."

"Then why does she give it to you?"

"There is some secret connected with it, which she has asked me to discover if possible. Look here."

He handed me a slip of paper, on which were two lines written in Spanish. Having a fair knowledge of the language and a capacity for rhyme, I improvised upon them an English couplet:—

"Find out my secret, and you then shall win Eternal happiness from that within."

"In allusion to the beatitude of the victims, no doubt," said I bitterly. "Who is the author of these lines?"

"The hermit who sent the skull to Lola," replied Harry, taking back the paper. "She cannot discover the secret, so she has asked me to try."

"I trust it will not cost you dear, Harry."

"Nonsense! what possible harm can this skull do to me? Look at it. It won't bite you."

Taking no heed of his flippancy, I closely examined the bone of contention. The stones were roughly imbedded in a kind of cement, and some were missing, while the base was crudely fashioned of unpolished wood. Externally there was no evidence to show that this ghastly object was of a harmful nature; yet, so influenced was I by the warnings of the monk and the lepero, that I still regarded it with horror. For over an hour I discussed with Harry the advisability of having nothing to do with Lola or her barbarous curiosity. But my efforts were vain, for he obstinately refused to restore the thing to its owner until he had discovered its secret. Wearied out by continuous exposition, I ceased to argue further, and let him carry it to his bedroom. After all, I might be wrong. I must admit that the stories told by Fray Benito and Don Panchito were improbable, so that it was not surprising that a prosaic young man such as Harry should despise them. An imaginative strain, inherited from Highland ancestors, led me to accept with less hesitation these romances of a semi-civilized race. Nevertheless Harry's scepticism was not without its effect upon me, and I retired to rest a trifle ashamed of my championship. But in the morning—

When I entered his bedroom the turquoise skull was on the table, and seated before it, fully dressed, was my poor friend—dead! The number of victims was now thirteen.

PART II.

There is no need to dilate upon my profound grief. Harry Carstone had been my closest friend at Oxford, as at Eton. Constant companionship had bound us together by no common ties, and his unexpected death fell heavily upon me. I knew that it would fall more heavily still upon the old couple at Carstone Hall. To them I wrote all details of the death and burial, and then addressed myself to the task of punishing Lola, whom I regarded as the indirect cause of the tragedy. It is at this point that I assume the principal role.

I have mentioned the funeral as having taken place at Zacatecas; for although I wished to have the corpse embalmed for transmission to England, such a course proved to be quite out of the question. Whatever the cause of death was—and I was utterly unable to determine it—the state of the body was such as to necessitate a hasty interment. In twenty-four hours the remains of my poor friend were committed to the earth, and I returned from the funeral, to take the turquoise skull to Lola and compel her to confess by what means it had killed Harry. To my surprise the skull was gone.

"A Senora had come," explained the landlord, "and had awaited the return of Don Francisco in the sitting-room. But after a time she had changed her mind and departed."

I had no doubt that it was Lola who had visited my hotel for the purpose of recovering the turquoise skull. So long as it remained in her possession I could not hope to solve the mystery of Harry's death; and how to get it back I could not think. That the woman should dare to approach the scene of her crime angered me greatly, and confirmed my determination to remain for retributive justice. In turn Fray Benito and the lepero commiserated with me, but I took neither into my confidence. The first, a religious recluse, could be of no possible assistance, whilst I more than suspected the other of having an understanding with her whom I designed to punish.

Above all was it important that I should regain possession of this turquoise skull. If I could arrive at the secret hinted at in the couplet, I might succeed in discovering the cause of the thirteen deaths, and so bring Lola within the clutches of the law. If legal measures proved unavailing, I intended myself to mete out justice. She had killed Harry, and I would kill her. This savage resolve, entirely foreign to my nature, was the result of the terrible tragedy of the previous week. In some way I was determined to avenge the death of my friend.

Informed by Panchito that it was Lola's invariable custom to request her lovers to solve the secret of the skull, I hoped, by becoming one of these, to secure the instrument of her crimes.

Ignorant as I was of the way in which the thing accomplished its mission, there was the chance that I too might lose my life. But such a contingency did not deter me from prosecuting my design. With great care I might come off harmless; and, even did I not, I hoped before dying to destroy the skull, so that its list of victims should terminate with my death.

Thus prepared for good or evil, I called upon Lola, whom I found in the garden in a grass hammock, with her usual accessories of fan and cigarette. She exhibited no signs of confusion or fear, but, with an audacity which revolted me, openly lamented the death of Harry. An accident, she termed it, as though she did not know full well the hideous truth.

"Alas, Senor, that I should have given Don Henriquez the turquoise skull!" she cried, with feigned sorrow; "but I knew not that it would cause his death."

"Yet you had experience to go upon, Senora."

Lola closed her fan with a snap, and became alive to the situation.

"What say you, Don Francisco?"

"Those twelve friends of yours who—"

"Who died," said Lola, unfurling her fan with unnecessary violence; "and what of that? Am I responsible for their deaths? Truly no. Why should I slay those who love me? Oh yes, Senor, I know well that Fray Benito has been talking. Succuba, sorceress, demon, those are the words ever on his lips when he speaks of me."

"True enough; that turquoise skull has indeed gained for you no enviable reputation."

"And wherefore? It is only a skull."

"But one that kills. Don Panchito—"

"Eh! you know him, that scamp?" she interrupted hastily; "he could have prevented all these deaths, for he knows the secret of the skull. I do not; hence I have asked those who loved me to discover it. They have died, and so I bear the blame; but it is all Panchito's fault."

"He procured the skull from Fray Felix, I believe?"

"Yes, Senor; he has been talking, I see. Tell me," she added curiously, "do you think that a demon dwells within the skull?"

"You know best, Senora."

"Nay, Don Francisco, you talk foolishly. I am quite in ignorance of the matter. The skull is a dead thing. It cannot slay."

"Nevertheless it does slay."

"Ay," she answered with a shrug; "but how, I know not."

"Why not destroy it?"

"I dare not," said she, in a frightened whisper. "It is the head of a dead king. Who knows what curses the dead may send? Nay, I will not destroy it. All I wish is to discover its secret. But, alas! I cannot; and they who, to aid me, have sought this knowledge, have perished.

"Let me try, Senora."

"Thou, Don Francisco? No, no; thirteen have died in the quest. Let there be no more. Think of your poor friend. Ah me! how I have wept at his fate!"

This affected sorrow and feigned ignorance did not deceive me. I saw that in truth she was overjoyed at my offer, but feared to accept it too readily, lest she might fall into a trap.

When I thought of how she had caused Harry's death I could have slain her then and there. But I determined to punish her in more deliberate fashion. I therefore persisted in my offer; and after much hesitation she accepted it. Descending to the patio with the skull under my cloak, I heard a low laugh of satisfaction. It was Lola rejoicing over her success in adding a fourteenth victim to her list.

"Today to you, tomorrow to me," muttered I to myself.

On the way to my hotel I met with Don Panchito. He planted himself in my way, and, catching sight of the skull, touched it significantly with his finger.

"Does Lola wish you also to die?" said he. "Give it back, Don Francisco. There is death under those blue stones."

"Not if you tell me the secret, Panchito."

"Most illustrious Senor, you saved my life, and I would most willingly save yours. But I swear by the Virgin that I know not the secret. Who says so lies."

"Then Lola lies."

Panchito twirled his cigarette with a contemptuous smile. He had evidently a bad opinion of the lady.

"Does she do aught else but lie, your worship? Eh! and what says she of the skull?"

"Very little. But she asked me to search for a spring which opens it."

"Exactly, Senor. She is too wise to search for the spring herself."

"There you are wrong. She has done so and failed."

The lepero looked at me dubiously. My unaccountable defense of Lola led him to mistake my feelings toward her.

"Do you love Lola?"

"Nay, Panchito; I abhor the witch. I take this skull to learn its secret. I hope to punish her for slaying my friend."

"Good. Did I know the secret, the knowledge would be yours. But you are as wise as I, Senor. Yet, this much I will speak. In searching for the spring, should you feel pain or see blood, you die."

Before I could demand an explanation Panchito folded his cloak around him and disappeared. He had a way of coming and going which savoured of magic. On this occasion I resented his unexpected vanishment, for it struck me that he hinted more than he chose to tell. However, his advice was worth taking; and when I unpacked the skull in my sitting-room I was particularly careful to handle it lightly. The Angelus was ringing before I could persuade myself really to attempt the solution of this problem.

Before proceeding to an examination, I laid an axe on the table, for, if all other means failed, I was resolved to smash the skull open and thus roughly end the mystery. Thus prepared, I sat down and delicately fingered the turquoise scalp in search of the spring. My sense of touch is unusually delicate, but, though I felt line after line of the stones, I could find no projecting knob to press. Failing so far, I examined the ruby eyes, the wooden base, and lastly the ruby nose. The gems of this latter were particularly irregular in their setting. Being ambidexter, I held the skull with my right hand and pressed hard with the forefinger of the left. Suddenly I felt a thrill of pain, and withdrew my finger to see a tiny globule of blood swelling on the tip. In an instant I remembered Panchito's warning. It explained itself. Blood-poisoning! That very instant I chopped off my forefinger with the axe, before the venom had time to pass the middle joint, and, with my maimed hand wrapped in a handkerchief, raced out of the hotel in search of a doctor.

When I returned, white with pain and loss of blood, I found the room occupied. Lola, frowning and surprised, stood looking at the severed finger on the table. She had come to survey my body and to recover the skull. My unexpected entrance caused her to utter an ejaculation; but whether of regret, of wrath, or of surprise merely, I was too perturbed to notice.

"You see I am still alive, Senora; and I now know how my poor friend died. You know also, you infamous creature!"

"Why did you cut it off?" she stammered, still looking at the severed finger.

"To save my life. Else would I now be dead, and you would have taken back your accursed turquoise skull, until you inveigled a new victim within your toils. But this ends it; no more shall die."

Before she could guess my intent, I took up the axe and with one stroke cleaved the skull in twain. Lola screamed and hid her face. From the interior of the accursed thing poured a glittering stream of jewels. Diamonds, rubies, sapphires—all kinds of gems—tinkled out on to the table, and rapped like small shot on to the floor.

The Spanish woman stood aghast at the sight. With a pious exclamation she stooped to pick them up.

"No," I cried: "no, wretch! Look here—not there."

I thrust forward the right hemisphere of the skull, and displayed the wicked mechanism of the interior. A snake's fang, concealed at the back of the nose, curved itself to the surface, and finally emerged between two rubies. At the least pressure this spike, keen as a thorn, ejected venom. This, collected in a small bag, was attached to the root of the fang, so that the poison could trickle drop by drop to the deadly point. Never was there so ingeniously fiendish an invention, and I wondered what devil could have designed it.

"Felix!" she gasped, looking white and sick: "he then designed my death. Ah, what mercy that I touched not the evil thing!"

"It was a pity you did not," said I savagely, "for then thirteen men might still be alive."

"I did not know of this, Senor; I swear I did not. Felix loved me, and fled to a hermitage because I loved another. He sent me the turquoise skull as a gift, saying that I would find eternal happiness if I succeeded in opening it. I was afraid, Senor. I thought there was danger, and so touched not the thing, and asked my friend to open it. But you, Don Francisco, have discovered the secret."

"Ay, but at the cost of my friend's life and my own finger. 'Leave those jewels!' I added, as she again bent to pick them up."

"They are mine," she cried defiantly. "Felix sent them to me."

"He sent you death, not jewels," I retorted, angered at her heartlessness. "Leave them: you shall not take one with you."

She looked wrathfully at the floor and then at me. I was determined to punish her for her callousness, but I saw that I should have to resort to strong measures to do so.

"Out, you infamous creature—out!"

Lola saw the barrel of my revolver pointed at her, and, with a gasp of terror, fled from the room. That was the last I saw of her.

I took the skull and jewels to Fray Benito, and told him my story. He did not evince much astonishment at it. Being a Mexican and a confessor, he was well aware of the devilments of his countrymen.

"I knew this Felix," he said gravely: "he was a wild and reckless youth, and he vowed to punish this daughter of sin for her treatment of him. He became a recluse, and while in the mountains discovered a cave wherein the Aztecs laid their dead chiefs. This is the skull of some mummy, adorned with gems after their barbarous fashion."

"But the poisonous fang, Fray?"

"No doubt Felix placed it there for his revenge. He judged that the evil woman would take his advice and press the skull to find the supposed spring. One touch of that fang, and she would die. But she was too cunning to venture, Don Francisco. From her knowledge of the sender's character, she suspected danger, and so let others die for her."

"And the jewels?"

"Felix probably found them in the cave of the dead. They were of no use to him; doubtless he placed them in the cavity of the skull to embitter the dying moments of her he hated."

"I don't understand."

"See you, Senor. Felix concluded that Lola Tapeaca would touch the snake-tooth and thus open the skull and meet her death at the same time. Knowing her greed, it would be an additional pang for her to see these jewels which she could not live to enjoy."

"What a fiendish idea!"

"Ay, my son: human nature is very wicked. Do you intend to keep the jewels?"

"No," I answered, with a shudder; "they would constantly remind me of my poor friend's death. You can make what use of them you please, father. Yet I shall keep a few, with which to reward Panchito, without whose warning I had now been dead."

Fray Benito accepted the gift, and Our Lady of the Star now possesses a fine necklace of variegated gems, which is the wonder of all visitors. They would wonder still more did they but know the history attached to it.

I could do nothing to punish Lola further than depriving her of the jewels. The Mexican lawyer to whom I submitted the case assured me that the evidence was too indefinite to prove her guilty.

On moral grounds she surely merited death, but legally speaking she was as assuredly innocent. So she escaped with her life. I often wonder whether she went to the cave of Felix to cajole him into giving her fresh gems. If she did I have no doubt he killed her. A man capable of inventing such a death trap as the turquoise skull would not hesitate to do what it had failed to accomplish.

Once again I heard of Lola. It was from Don Panchito, who accompanied me to the railway station on the day I left Zacatecas.

"It is just as well you are going, Senor," said he significantly: "Lola is wild at the loss of the turquoise skull and its jewels. She asked me to knife you, but I refused. Did you not save my life, and have you not given me precious stones? Still, Senor, others may not feel as I do, and the cursed woman may cause you to lose your life as well as your finger."

I quite believed it. A woman who could doom thirteen men to death for the gratification of her curiosity would not stick at putting the fourteenth out of the way. I have often regretted I did not shoot her at our last interview, and so rid the world of a demon. But if she is in existence, the turquoise skull is not. Neither is the forefinger of my left hand.

Puritanism at Stanford

When the New York mob made itself ridiculous in the eyes of the world by its intemperate mouthings over the production of "Mrs. Warren's Profession" and "Salome," the supersensitive cultured ones in our midst salved the wound to their pride by explaining to all who cared to listen that only the vulgar, the prudish and the ignorant condemned Shaw and Wilde while the simonpure disciples of literature still exalted the two Irishmen on their appropriate pedestals. The horror excited in the breasts of the Wanamakers and the Comstocks by undraped statues and such books as the "Kreutzer Sonata" is but a pale emotion, we have been insistently assured, beside the horror of the cultured at the state of mind which renders such parochial outbursts not merely possible but rather generally popular. Despite their almost tiresome reiteration these protestations of devotion to pure art, no matter how startling the form it may take, have for some reason failed entirely to convince sceptical Europe whose raised eyebrows and shrugged shoulders express puzzled wonder at a condition which has long been impossible on the continent and is becoming increasingly rare in Great Britain. That this lack of faith in the liberality of American culture is not altogether gratuitous is evidenced by the petty imbroglio that has raised the temperature of the Stanford campus to fever heat and has divided that university against itself in a fashion not unusual, it must be confessed, but in the present instance more than ordinarily excitant of laughter. Because a college editor has seen fit to infuse the breath of passion into his magazine by the publication of a copy of exceedingly sophomoral verses, he has been denounced and boycotted by all the forces of conventional propriety from the associated co-eds to the university chaplain. Taking a theme from the Bible—a theme that has engaged the attention of artists from Kit Marlowe and Titian to Swinburne and Alma-Tadema—this youngster of metrical proclivities has tossed off a series of rhymed couplets which are not in any way more daring than the ordinary run of magazine poetry. But because their publication was heralded by press agent methods which one does not ordinarily expect to find on a college campus, prudery in all its flashing battle array flared forth to meet them. Sentence was passed before the crime was proven—quite the usual procedure in these cases—and the convicted criminal was condemned to the direst penalties within the power of his judges. Verses, let it be remembered, which, however little their literary merit, were at least seriously intended and free from all suspicions of meretriciousness, were condemned before being read by young women who had gathered at a big university to pursue that process of mental broadening which is the true purpose of the higher education. If this is not the cynic's cue for asking what value is to be attached to the university training which does not render such salad manifestations utterly impossible, then all our loud vaunts of culture are so much empty wind. What avails the bracing air of university life if the lungs are too weak to make deep inspirations? Is our art still builded on Plymouth Rock; our morality still hopelessly tangled in pruriency? The answer must be in the affirmative, if co-eds and university chaplains are to be permitted to make it.

What Stanford Stands For

Stanford University is a bountiful contributor to the gayety of the state. From the day that a smug Bishop, in his dedicatory sermon compared Leland Stanford Jr. to Christ down to the co-eds' boycott there has been no cessation of the carnival of absurdities inaugurated by the founders. The amusing egoism of those founders which is preserved in Stanford's tradition and some of its freakish architectural ornamentation appears also to have been infused into the very atmosphere of the place. The history of the university is a ponderous record of curious conceits, of fantastical ebullitions of the dominant spirit of self-importance. Palo Alto appears to be a place of turmoil and trouble rather than of quiet and study. It was thought a severe blow to the reputation of the university when Professor Ross was dismissed from the faculty for availing himself of his constitutional prerogative of free speech, but worse things have happened since, though none of more lamentable significance than the scandal of last week. From the aggressive prudishness of the co-eds we learn that Stanford is fostering a sentiment which is responsible for the main defect of our national temperament, and which in the opinion of scholars, must be eradicated before we can attain to the highest intellectual freedom and development. This sentiment we inherited from our sacrosanct Pilgrim Fathers, those dear old pious witch-burners, who believed implicitly in the externals of religion, who derived their religious beliefs from intellects of the third order and whom we have long revered for their zeal and forgiven for their fanaticism. Through their New England graves was sent a thrill of joy when the daughters of sweetness and light at Stanford took occasion to express their good, old-fashioned puritanical prejudices and attest the survival of that spirit which has made this a nation of Philistines. From the conduct of the co-eds we must infer that Stanford is absolutely ignoring the principal object of a higher institution of learning—the inculcation of the principles of true culture. We must so infer because we learn that their conduct was commended by members of the faculty. This circumstance points to the conclusion that Stanford University stands for a wax-doll morality and encourages Philistinism in its most virulent form. This is indeed lamentable. We have long eagerly looked to our universities to alter the pale complexion of the age, to bring to people's consciousness those truths which are considered of the highest importance as factors for social development, to expand their intellectual viewpoint and discourage the sanctimonious habit of arching the eyebrows in holy horror when confronted by the undraped realities, but obviously we must not expect the emanation of such wholesome influence from Stanford. Instead of educating us out of the puritanical delusion that there is only one great sin in the world from which all immorality proceeds Stanford is engaged in propagating that erroneous idea. At the same time Stanford denies the literary worker the privilege of drawing inspiration from historical incidents motivated upon that sin. It is such an awful sin that co-eds must hypocritically pretend to be unconscious of its existence, but these same co-eds would doubtless gladly attend a lecture on Commercial Honesty by John D. Rockefeller and be pleased to shake hands with that most conspicuous and most vicious of American transgressors. Stanford University is not engaged in the work of advancing civilization. It is not diffusing the knowledge by which both the moral and intellectual instincts are harmoniously developed. It is engaged in keeping us where we were when Mr. Lowell characterized his countrymen as "The most common-schooled and the least cultivated people in the world."

The Prejudice Against Whiskers

One of the inexplicable phenomena of the age is the entirely indefensible prejudice against whiskers which is spreading all over the country. It recently took shape in New York in the substance of a bill presented in the Legislature, providing for a tax on whiskers and making invidious distinctions. It was proposed to assess Dundrearies and lambrequins at eight dollars, Ministerial sideboards at ten dollars, Imperials or paint brushes at thirty dollars and red ones (all varieties), at twenty per cent additional. It is seriously to be doubted whether legislation of this character would be upheld by the courts, for it is in the nature of an infringement of personal liberty. If it were urged as a sanitary measure it might be upheld, but it was not solicitude for the public health that prompted the introduction of the anti-whiskers bill. The tax schedule is proof of the purely vulgar prejudice of the author of the bill against a facial ornament, which, every sensible man feels, is entitled to respect for its antiquity if for nothing else. The author of the bill attempted to disguise his prejudice beneath a pretension of zeal for the interests of the men who try to make an honest living with scissors and razors. The emptiness of this pretension is obvious. Few are the men that wear whiskers whose pride in them does not dictate frequent intercourse with the barber. Whiskers clamor for trimming, and it is only by the most scrupulous attention that their highest purpose is subserved. The highest purpose of whiskers is to minister to the self-contentment of their wearers. Whiskers are condemned by bigoted persons on the theory that they are superfluities of garniture and equipage that betray the vanity of a shallow mind. This theory is sheer nonsense. There have been and are men of great minds partial to whiskers. We need mention none other than Shakespeare who went so far as to swat the whiskerless in these lines:

He that hath a beard is more than a youth,
And he that hath none is less than a man.

If whiskers were an infallible indication of vanity then it would be reasonable to indulge a prejudice against them, not because an interest in one's personal appearance is abominable, but because there are so few to whom the particular brand of whiskers they wear is becoming. It is exasperating to meet a man with whiskers that shriek of his vanity and that cause one to study the points of resemblance between the owner and some unprepossessing animal. The misfortune is that every man is responsible for his own whiskers and that whiskers are worn by many mentally irresponsible men. They give offense to our sense of beauty and give whiskers in general a black eye, as it were. If we had a State art commission to which all whiskers would have to be submitted it would not be long before we should all be more tolerant. And the spirit of tolerance could be greatly encouraged by a penal statute making it a very grave offense for a man to caress or comb his whiskers in public. As matters now stand we have the most profound sympathy for the gentlemen that wear whiskers for their expediency rather than as a first aid to pulchritude. Some of them are judges who wear whiskers for the dignity which they cannot otherwise acquire, and some of them are doctors who wear whiskers to denote age and imply experience. This is the most innocent of the deceptions practiced by some doctors.

A Reassuring Pronouncement

Those who are not unable to detect the important currents of events because they run some depth below the surface realize more fully since the Merchants' Association banquet at the Fairmont Hotel that the prosecution of municipal graft stood recently in serious danger from the irrepressible lust of politics that forever possesses certain of the movement's most powerful sympathizers. Indications are that this menace is removed, but it still remains the part of wisdom not to abate watchfulness against the insidious evil. That the men who are furnishing not only the sinews of war but also the brains of the prosecution keenly apprehend all that threatens from this source was made evident during the banquet aforesaid by the insistence of Francis J. Heney and District Attorney Langdon on the utter dissociation of their work from any political plans or campaign logrolling. Again and again Heney harped upon this string, giving the impression that he saw the necessity of laboring hard to eradicate a deep-rooted notion from the minds of his hearers. "Mr. Spreckels and myself have agreed," Heney finally asserted after driving this same idea home in various other ways, "that this investigation is not to be used for the political advantage of anyone. When casting over in your mind who will be the next mayor or hold any other public office, you can count us all out with the exception of Mr. Langdon who will ask vindication by re-election to the office of district attorney that he may complete this work." The declaration of Langdon is just as positive. Thus he spoke, modestly putting himself in the third person: "He will seek to stay in that office until the work of this crisis is done and when it is done, gentlemen, he will retire to private life to be a plain citizen." These statements have the smack of ex cathedra utterances; it is not to be thought that they were born of the inspiration of the moment and thrown out at random, to gain a little applause and then be forgotten. It must be admitted that the time for these pronouncements was happily chosen and that the occasion won for them the attention and the wide publicity which they needed. It cannot be denied that politics was creeping from various sources into the camp of the warriors who are giving battle to civic corruption, but it is most reassuring to know that the men most vitally interested realize the danger and are prepared to front it in the proper spirit. Henceforth the vague murmurings of political ambitions will no doubt be silenced and the credit due the District Attorney for his share in the prosecution will not be marred by the ugly shadow cast before by the events of the approaching campaign. It is matter for congratulation among all honest men that the mouthpieces of the anti-graft crusade have had the foresight and the courage to repudiate unjust and damaging insinuations. As for the thieves, nothing could bode them more ill than those same speeches at the Fairmont.

Dementia Americana

Although the Thaw case laid bare the fundamental weakness of our criminal law system which makes the judge little more than a chairman presiding at the trial to enforce the laws of procedure without exercising any direct influence on the result, it was at least happy in adding two strong phrases to our language; and while we are not of that overenthusiastic artistic cult which considers the word more important than the thing it signifies, we can still appreciate the value to the language and to the race of a felicitous denomination for conditions hitherto only partially understood. The phrases referred to are "brainstorm" and "dementia americana," the first fashioned by Dr. Evans, the alienist, and the second wrought from the brain of our own Delphin Michael Delmas (as the Eastern press is so fond of calling him.) Although not exactly synonymous the two phrases apply to mental conditions that are very closely related. A "brainstorm," according to Dr. Evans, is a mental fulmination, a cerebral explosion which terminates in some act of violence. Whereas it may be said that "dementia americana" describes the conditions of one who is subject to "brainstorms." Careful examination of the mental processes of the average American convinces us that we are all afflicted (if it may be called an afflic-tion) with this peculiarly American dementia. The mollicoddle perhaps is freer than other men from the species of aberration which causes the brain to burst in periodical explosions, but even he gives occasional but startling evidence that he has not escaped what Delmas authoritatively pronounces the mental heritage of our race. The distinguished lawyer was undoubtedly correct in stating that Harry Thaw is the victim of this national dementia; all the rich illiterates from Pittsburgh suffer from it and it almost invariably leads them into scrapes with chorus girls and actresses. Delmas did not say that Stanford White was also unbalanced by "dementia americana," but this was undoubtedly the fact. How else explain the hankering of his mighty mind for the sickly flowers of evil that sprouted in the luxuriant garden where he might have plucked the rarest and most delicate blooms? And that even Delmas has not escaped the ravages of the insanity which he so aptly characterized none familiar with the eccentricities of his career can deny; his life in this state was punctuated with "brainstorms." The sagacious reader no doubt grasps the interesting idea that by this application of the term "dementia americana" may be applied to any condition which leads to violent outbursts of passion or coldblooded exhibitions of vice. The heady youth sowing his wild oats and the grizzled oldster indulging a senile antinomianism may each be allowed henceforth to plead this new species of abnormality discovered by Thaw's leading attorney. It is assured of wide popularity in the country and in an age which objects to such old-fashioned expressions as sin, dissipation or viciousness and regards every act, no matter how lawless (provided of course it is not vulgarly criminal) as the legitimate expression of untrammelled individuality. The spirit of the age tends to excuse every divagation from the conventional moral code on the ground of unbalanced mentality; the experts would have us realize that we all veer somewhat from the straight line of sanity, and it would be hard to find a more satisfactory sort of insanity to plead guilty to than the brand discovered by Delmas. It is true that "dementia americana" did not prevail strongly with the jury when they were considering their verdict; it may be that a higher court is equally scornful of the plea; but be that as it may, "dementia americana" is a pleasant name for a widely prevalent condition.

A Query

By E. H.

Two lovers walk in the old-fashioned garden,
Sweet with the perfume of old-world flowers,
With clipped yew-hedges, and marble edges,
And sun-dial marking the fleeting hours.

They pause to rest by the marble columns,
Down where the peacock's strut in the sun;
What sweet love-speeches the silence teaches!
And the maid who listens is almost won.

When they were mated, how were things fated,
Dear little people of long ago?
Did they find love pales when custom stales
The passionate ardor they used to know?

What with the dust of the "damndest finest ruins," and the laundry strike, cleanliness in very truth is here and now next to godliness; and godliness in San Francisco is, it seems, next to impossible.

Here and there in the politically sinless cities of the East, a critic now and then bobs up serenely to call the local press to task for so loudly crying San Francisco's shame to the four corners of the earth. The fear of being found out is the beginning of the reformation of the criminaloid.

The Chronicle says that Ruef was elected to high office in the order of Native Sons by men who could not have doubted that he was a scoundrel. This is probably true, and therefore the men by whom he was elected are as bad if not worse than the unspeakable grafter and there should be some way of ousting them from the order.

The Call of the Classic

By Harry Cowell

Though every attempt of writer, painter, sculptor, composer, to rape eye or ear or heart, is to be resented, it is well, no doubt, for Art, at times, to give us real life, rude and crude, to the end of stimulating such as have eyes and see not, ears and hear not, hearts and do not understand; but it is better—morally and esthetically better—for Art, as a rule, to refine upon life, to make the atmosphere rarer than the reality, the light less raw, for the refreshing—as Walter Pater has it—of the human spirit, ever in sore need of refreshment.

Especially is this true of literature. For myself, liking haste but little, and noise not at all, I am tired, very tired, of your hundred miles an hour stuff, type-writ slap-dash, in the physical force style, to meet a rush order, and printed hot off the linotype, obvious, so that who runs may read; the crash of harsh consonants that will be heard grating intolerably on the vowel-loving ear. My wont is, not to read as I run, but, sitting quite still, to sip as it were the wine of choice words, at my leisure, so as to miss none of the flavor; time-mellowed literature of a happy vintage being my taste.

To all who, with me, though loving life, hate noise no less than did Schopenhauer, how irresistible—coming as it does amid a clamor as of hotel runners—is the courteous invitation of the disinterested dead to share with them their home quiet!

Surely, gentle sir, or madam, unknown friend of mine, you too have heard it—and with no little joy—this "call" of the classic, to use the speech of the day. Low-voiced, it comes, not so much out of the ever peaceful past, as from some blessed isle or other, present abode of the undying lovers of loveliness who here, on this mad-whirling planet, served Beauty with singleness of heart, the dream domain, say, of Lamb or Montaigne; some tranquil garden spot of flowers set in fairest order, breathed upon by zephyrs blowing mild from the sundown corner of heaven, girt round about by the "innumerable laughter of the ocean waves;" far removed from the fret of the mainland, with its noisy literary mart, where the market-men of letters cry their wares raucously, each striving to outshriek the other, and the mud-rakers rage with more than heathen fury, and she who has taken the place of the Muse stands, conspicuously scarlet, shamelessly soliciting the passerby, an eye the while on the police; some the other side the grave retreat, where the ad-man is known, and the wicked trusts cease from troubling, and the weary reader is at rest.

What a peace is in these blessed isles of books! Here, the guest of genius has eternity wherein to partake of the refreshment offered him, and if there must needs be sad news for one's host to tell, and the sigh at the heart of things be now and then heard, one has joy even of his tears, so sweet a woe is it to weep a sorrow over and done with now centuries ago. Here is escape from the savage clutch of real life, the glare, the din. The twilight here rests the eye, the quiet the ear, and here the balm of beauty makes whole the bruised heart. Man's world-weary spirit is of a truth refreshed.

Refreshment, that is what one never fails to receive at the hands of the true artist. In the main, the art of today does not refine upon today, nor yet draw it as it is, but, all-unconsciously, caricatures it: fretful ambition, its characteristic feature, is drawn so as to dwarf the rest of the face, like a Bourbon nose made a proboscis of. What is the result? From the intensified unrest of such art, one turns again to life itself not without a sense of relief. Refreshment is still to seek; the desire of the spirit to escape from mere fact is in no wise satisfied.

This desire of the spirit of man to get away from mere fact is, on its positive side, but the olden desire of beauty; nor does it say, in effect, that the facts of existence are intolerable, and so argue in favor of the "philosophy of despair." Tired humanity may, I trust, turn in its leisure moments from the crude truth of restless life to the finer truth of restful art, without laying itself open to the charge of pessimism. To speak for a very small fraction of tired humanity, myself, if arraigned, should unhesitatingly plead "not guilty." Nor is he whom the storm of life drives to seek the classic calm rather than the hurricane of modern romance, on that account to be adjudged altogether disloyal to his day.

About the finest art-product of the day, representative of the day, the very zeitgeist as it were given body, made visible in the flesh, there inevitably remains an atmosphere suggestive of the crudity of nature, the coarseness of mere fact, the unrest of real life. In this art, when Time shall have toned it down, Death given it of his dignity, the human spirit may find rest and refreshment.

Though equally gifted, vainly the living writer—to take the art nearest to me—vies with the dead in the not unimportant matters of remoteness; reposeful charm; softness, sacredness, authoritativeness of inviting voice; and the like. The new book, being, at best, but new wine, is not likely to please the palate of the connoisseur of today, nor make glad his heart. Despite the seeming injustice of the figure, mellow the new book cannot well be, and that, be the style never so classic. The bouquet time gives, as naught else can give, is of necessity lacking. Write a "Study of Dionysus," as did Pater, reach a hand through the years to gather yon grapes on hillsides sacred to Bacchus, and how great a natural advantage your product must needs have over his who handles the murk of the wine trust!

Nelson's Nonpareil

By Rudolph de Cordova

As not only the whole of the British Empire but the whole of the civilized world still rings with the fame of Nelson, greater today even than it was a century ago, when in Trafalgar Bay he broke the naval power of France, and made Great Britain Queen of the Seas, it is natural that men's thoughts should turn to Lady Hamilton, whose name is indissolubly bound for all time with that of the greatest naval commander the world has known. But for Lady Hamilton, indeed, the supreme seal of greatness might never have been set on Nelson's fame, Trafalgar might not have been won as it was, and the history of the last hundred years might have been written otherwise. Nelson's fate lay in the hollow of her little hand, his action at the dictate of her lightest word.

Reynold's Painting of Lady Hamilton as a Bacchante

It was in May, 1803, that he was appointed to the command of the Mediterranean, and he left England, home, and beauty for over two years. He returned in the August of 1805, and went to the country house at Merton which he had bought and furnished just before he sailed. He had only been home three weeks when, all unexpectedly, he heard that the combined French and Spanish fleets, of which he had long been in pursuit, were at Cadiz. Should he offer his services to the Government at once, or should he enjoy his ease and leisure a little longer? That was the question which perturbed his mind. Up and down the garden-paths he walked, trying to decide. It was early in the morning. Presently Lady Hamilton came out. A glance told her that Nelson was disturbed. She asked the reason. He told her. "Offer your services," she said, without a moment's hesitation. "They will be accepted, and you will gain a quiet heart by it."

He looked at her in amazement at the words, for she had nothing to gain by his going, everything by his staying. Womanlike, however, she was not thinking of herself, but of him and his reputation.

"You will have a glorious victory," she went on; "and then you may return here and be happy."

Without delay his preparations were made. When he was going away, and the great ones came to bid him good-bye, as they sat at the farewell meal Lady Hamilton could not restrain her tears. She could eat nothing; when his health was proposed she was hardly able to swallow the sip of wine she took, and she nearly swooned. On October 21st, the night before the Battle of Trafalgar was fought, Nelson's thoughts dwelt with the woman who, as he said over and over again, was his wife in the sight of Heaven.

He added a codicil to his will: "I leave Emma Lady Hamilton a legacy to my King and country, trusting that they will give her an ample provision to maintain her rank in life. I also leave to the beneficence of my country my adopted daughter, Horatia Nelson Thompson. These are the only favours I ask of my King and country, at this moment when I go to fight their battles."

When the French shot had done its fatal work, and he lay dying in the cockpit of the "Victory," he forgot the pain of his own wound in the thought of "the nonpareil of his life."

The Mirror of Hachida

By John Munro

Admiring yourself?" said I, on finding Captain Hachida by the window of his quarters, gazing into a small mirror. "Vain fellow!"

"Not I," he protested with a smile.

"Ha, ha! Inspecting the mirror?"

"There's another face in it."

"Let me see," I replied, thinking he might be watching the reflection of somebody in the street. "I can't make out anything but my own handsome jib."

"Don't look straight. Look sidelong—this way."

Viewing the mirror obliquely, I saw to my surprise the face of a Japanese woman serene and beautiful, as though chased in silver.

"Very sweet," I exclaimed.

"It's my mother."

"Ah! There's a strong likeness."

"I'm glad to hear it."

"Well—when you're particularly good. But why doesn't it show in front?"

"I can't say. It's a trick of the engraver. It's a magic mirror, you know."

"Oh, indeed. I've heard of the magic mirror of Japan."

"They are quite rare," he said, handing the mirror to me.

It was a circular disc of bronze, about seven inches across, with plaits of bamboo on the handle. The front was convex and silvered, the back was concave and ornamented with a landscape in relief. There was a garden, with a pond of lotus, a quaint bridge, weeping willows, groves of cedar, mountains in the distance, and a row of Chinese characters against the sky.

"It is my home in the island of Awadsi, in the Inland Sea," explained Hachida. "The mirror was a keepsake from my mother when I left for college. The face in front reminds me of her, and the scene on the back of the happy days we spent together. I never part with it. When I'm on duty I wear it round my neck."

"Like a breastplate?"

"It's my luck, my talisman. Mirrors, you know, are sacred in Japan. They are an emblem of the Eye that sees all—even the heart. You may have seen them in the temples."

"Yes, on the altar, with flowers."

"They tell us to sweeten the heart—then shall we sweeten the face."

"The life?"

"Yes; for as we say in Japan, it's the heart that makes the world. My mother is as good and gentle as she looks. I only wish I was like her; but my father was different. He was a soldier, upright and fearless, but fiery, proud, quick to resent an injury. He committed hara-kiri for a point of honor."

"I often feel their two dispositions in me struggling for the upper hand. At first I was puzzled as to which side I should lean. Sometimes I thought my father's the proper spirit for a man and an officer. Sometimes it seemed that my mother's was the best. Again, I might on occasion have need of both. In short, I mystified myself, heathen that I was; but at last I resolved to unite their virtues, and without losing the rectitude or courage of my father, become as like my mother as I could."

"I thought you were pleased when I saw a resemblance."

"It is not easy, especially now I am fighting Russians; but the mirror helps me. It pictures the soul. It's a conscience you can see. When I'm troubled, or on going to bed, I'm in the habit of examining my heart, and comparing my expression with my mother's to restore my peace of mind. You laugh, but I believe it keeps me out of harm."

"Excuse me. We don't take the looking-glass quite so seriously in the West."

"It kept me in the right way as a cadet. It kept me from making a fool of myself when I fell in love."

"That's rather contrary to our experience. I suppose you began to look silly, and took it in time?"

"Silly! I was far gone; I was infatuated with the girl. She is remarkably beautiful—she reminds me a little of my mother—and she belongs to an old, high, family in Yeddo. My position as a lieutenant was too humble for her people, and I could only worship her at a distance. Nevertheless, I was vain enough to fancy that she took an interest in me. Among her admirers was a military attache of the Russian Embassy, a tall, blonde, fine-looking man of princely rank and large possessions. I only knew him by sight, but they all spoke well of him. Her family made a good deal of him, and I felt that unless Miss—I will call her Miss Arimaska—went against their wishes, I was out in the cold. Unhappily for me I was ordered to Formosa, and on returning to Japan I learned of her engagement to Prince—I need not give his name—Prince Vladimir will do. It was my first great disappointment. Had Miss Arimaska forgotten me? Had she ever cared for me? Or had her parents forced her into the match against her will? Perhaps my absence had made her think I was unfaithful. I was half mad with jealousy, regret, and chagrin. My excited brain hatched some desperate plans for preventing their marriage—carrying her off by stratagem, picking a quarrel with the Prince and killing him. I thought of taking my own life. I was no better than a savage, but in my calmer moments the gentle face of my mother brought me back to my old self. Luckily for me, perhaps, Russia began to threaten us, and I was despatched on active service to Korea, where, as an officer of engineers, I had plenty to think about, seeing to the telegraphs."

"You forgot Miss—Asterisk."

"No, but I forgot myself—my hurt. After the war broke out I was drafted to Manchuria for the campaign in the Liaotung peninsula. One day I and a sergeant named Tagouchi were sent to tap the wireless telegraph at Port Arthur. We got as near as we thought safe, and chose a hill facing the town for the operations. On the bank of a stream among the trees

Professional Regenerators to the Front

In the midst of most praiseworthy solicitudes for the future of our city indulged in consequence of the inextinguishable rapacity of the uncompromising labor cormorant the eye catches glimpses of a glorious El Dorado for faltering hopes. Behold! the local Democratic party is in process of reorganization. Let us hope that the Paradise of roses prefigured in the activity of the local patriots may not prove to be a wilderness of thorns. Perish the thought! Through the public prints came the glad tidings that the Hon. Porter Ashe, the Hon. Lewis Byington and several other past-grads of public office have undertaken the regeneration of the party that has never been false to the interests of the pee-pul. Unbribed, unbought, unttempted, involved in nothing but their own virtue, these ever-willing-to-be servants of the pee-pul met in amity and kindness, felicitated themselves on the triumph of their chastity and resolved to appeal to the unspotted of this ex-bedevelled metropolis to co-operate with them in their prodigious and holy task. Was it not an inspiring spectacle,—that of our self-sacrificing devotees of public office solemnly binding and obliging themselves to do endless good in this era of boundless evil? Even the hide-bound pessimist and habitual jeerer who gave vent to his feelings in hand-springs when he heard of the repentant men of trade applauding Heney's righteous sentiments in the Fairmont must have been profoundly impressed when he learned of the gathering of perennial honorables for the purpose of devising ways and means of vitalizing the immortal party of Jefferson.

The Sentiment of Devotion

A single motive actuates the professional renovators of the Democracy—that of providing the people with a medium for the vitalization of their noblest sentiments. It is the same motive that inspires the tireless Nebraskan in his endless peregrinations, burdened with his sample case of specifics for all the ills the body politic is afflicted with. That appears to be a fine spirit which prompts eternal devotion to party. I say, Appears to be, because men have always taken so much pride in it. They boast of it as though it were a touch of the divinity. They parade it as conclusive proof of patriotism, of altruism and of other vague and easily acquired virtues. Expressions of it are always pleasant to me because they remind me of my adolescent and unsophisticated enthusiasms, when I conceived that spirit of devotion to be absolute and undeniable proof of religious adherence to principle. I rather regret my emancipation from that delusion. That emancipation took place long before the chief of the Gallagher clan foreswore allegiance to the party of his patron saint Judge Maguire, which event occurred about the time that it appeared that this state had become hopelessly Republican. So it amused me very much when I learned that the Chief of the Gallagher clan took great pains to explain to his friends that it was a great principle that moved him to desert his party. "I couldn't stand," he explained, "for the plank in the platform against the acquisition of the Philippines." The chief of the Gallagher clan is the gentleman who is now helping to govern the city by indictment.

A Warhorse of Democracy

Probably one of the strictest adherents of party principles in the days of my youthful enthusiasms was Mr. A. C. Paulsell of Stockton, Democratic warhorse. While always deeply concerned for the welfare of his party there was never a time when he was not an available candidate for Governor with the understanding that he was open to compromise. He was one of the candidates for Governor in the convention that nominated Washington Bartlett. After being placed in nomination he mounted the bema and made a speech.

"Of course," he said, "you all know who I am. I am above all things a Democrat. I have always been a Democrat. The success of my party is all that I strive for. I feel highly honored in being placed in nomination in this convention. But while it would please me very much to become the standard bearer of the party in this campaign, if you prefer some other Democrat I will—

A Voice from the gallery,—“Take Harbor Commissioner.

Mr. Paulsell,—“Exactly.”

And that is what he got.

To Down McNab

Notwithstanding the dissipation of the enthusiasms of my youth I am not cynical respecting the zeal of the Hon. Porter Ashe and the Hon. Lewis Byington. Zeal is their strong suit. But my expectations have been so frequently disappointed with respect to the main consummation for which they are arming themselves that I have no taste for the enterprise. I allude to the expulsion of Gavin McNab from the Democratic sanhedrim. For many years Gavin McNab has been on the point of being thrust into oblivion. But cork-like he abhors the depths and with persistent regularity returns to the surface. McNab is a man of infinite resources, and of such great magnetism that it would not surprise me if the men who are now organizing to depose him were to be responding to his beck and nod a few months hence. Indeed I should not be surprised if he turned out stronger than ever, for he has lately changed the complexion of his political coterie and may find his popularity augmented as a result of the enmities he has been making.

Heney's Hostility to Politicians

But why speculate on the outcome of proceedings involving the affairs of the local Democracy? While fine resolutions are towering into their meridian altitude Mr. Francis Heney, consecrated to the task of giving us the true maximum perfection of social man, is intent upon driving all professional politicians into the dark, abysmal depths where the elective franchise is unknown. Mr. Heney expects to achieve something between the ideal form of civil policy urged by Plato in the ten books of his Republic and the practical form suggested in his Legislative System. But unlike Plato he makes no compromise; not even between his sense of duty as a Reformer and his sense of expedience as a shrewd lawyer who has probably unconsciously prosecuted the good as often as he has defended the bad. Mr. Heney, being a true disciple of Roosevelt abominates all political machines, and he is prepared to gird at all bosses,—except perhaps the labor bosses. This attitude is not altogether above criticism. It is not encouraging to reflect that in the present temper of organized labor in this city there is danger of an organized labor man being elected to succeed Mayor Schmitz. But there is no blinking the fact that we are threatened with that danger. And it is no inconsiderable danger. Even now Organized Labor holds the whip-hand over this prostrate community and it is a relentless hand, one that is quite as insufferable as the hand of graft. It is bad enough to be ruled by a Mayor, who, while affecting loyalty to union labor is never inaccessible to Capital; how much worse to be ruled by a Socialistic labor boss who would make the police department the body-guard of boycotters, and who would have the endorsement of a press that has but one opinion to express when union labor cracks the whip!

A Straight Tip From Steffens

Mr. Lincoln Steffens, the well known connoisseur in graft, uttering himself oracularly over the banquet board of the Men's League of the First Congregational Church of Oakland, affirmed the prerequisites of national happiness to be government ownership of public utilities and the teaching of Christianity "the way its Founder taught it"—as an economic religion. There has been so much futile speculation and abstruse metaphysical discussion of the groundwork of Christianity that it is most refreshing and gratifying to have the matter settled once and for all by the infallible dictum of the Socratic Steffens. It is also encouraging to learn that the panacea of our ills is so easily accessible as to be reached by putting Christianity on an economic basis and acquiring the ownership of public utilities. Hitherto I have been sceptical of the advantages of public ownership, but never before was it suggested to me that it should be made the handmaiden of Christianity as taught by its Founder. This suggestion presents the matter in a new light. Of late I have scoffed much at the advocates of public ownership. Whenever they pointed out the experience of Glasgow and other foreign cities, as is their wont, in proof of the golden expediency of government ownership I have chuckled in my cloister, meditating the while on the absurdity of wandering over seas in quest of material with which to bolster arguments in support of theories dealing with conditions peculiarly domestic. Why go to Glasgow, thought I, when Berkeley lies over the bay in the country that has been honored by Mr. Steffens. Berkeley is typical of American communities. It is governed by American politicians and is beset by Yankee captains of industry. Behold Berkeley!

How They Did It In Berkeley

In Berkeley some years ago the high-brows resolved to go in for municipal ownership of a lighting plant. They issued bonds, bought the necessary machinery and affirmed that there should be electric light under municipal direction, of candlepower equal to the intellectual light generated within the walls of the university. And there was light. And the people of Berkeley were proud of their achievement. But presently the serpent appeared in the garden. In this instance the serpent was a Captain of Industry who had the juice of a private plant to sell. About that time the politicians of Berkeley were persuaded that the town had outgrown its own plant. In Glasgow, perhaps, in similar circumstances, the peoples' servants would enlarge the plant. But in Berkeley the peoples' servants deemed it advisable to buy light from a private corporation. Thereafter the town kept growing, the private corporation kept increasing the supply of electric fluid, and the municipal plant gradually fell into a state of innocuous desuetude. Today the municipal plant is out of business. The wheels have grown rusty and some disappeared, and the people are paying interest on bonds which were issued for something which the people no longer have. The experience of Berkeley, by the way, has served as a warning to the people of Alameda township, who own their lighting plant. But despite the warning, prophetic ones predict that private juice will soon be infused into the wires of the encinal city. They have observed that the home plant does not give general satisfaction. It has been figured out that the home plant has not proved a good investment and it has been suggested that the home plant is becoming inadequate. Hence the predictions of the prophetic ones. It will doubtless be said that if such things happen in small and highly moral communities, where everybody knows everybody else how much more likely are they to happen in big cities where public officials are known only by reputation to a majority of their constituents. But now that we know the right way to teach Christianity let us abate our misgivings.

A Picture and a Joke

"This picture," said the Rev. Dr. Rader in the Bulletin, "will call your attention to the 'green-eyed monster' called Jealousy. It is the meanest of passions." The picture doesn't strike me as a passion at all, but rather as a night-mare, and one that should never have been realized in print. The artist's signature being undecipherable I am inclined to the opinion that he perpetrated the hideous and shocking misrepresentation of nature in a spirit of cynical glee and by way of a joke on the writer who was to take inspiration therefrom. This kind of humor is not to be encouraged. If pictorial monstrosities have not, as some authorities assert, left their impress upon the offspring of sensitive mothers, it is nevertheless true that great injury has resulted from the nervous anxiety which often follows the feeling of repugnance inspired by hideous sights. At any rate we have enough ugliness in nature, and if it is wrong for the literary artist to depict disagreeable passions it cannot be right for the artist in colors to shock us by a fiendish interfusion of the imaginative the abstract and the human. But it was not my intention to wax homiletic. Bad as the picture is the joke on my esteemed and reverend contemporary was not without merit. I enjoyed it, and I am sure he will when he comes to think it over. In emulation of Mr. Brisbane of New York he demanded a powerful picture to give emphasis to his profusely capitalized disquisition on Jealousy, a picture that would speak distinctly to the eye and effectively to the imagination. The artist gave him a picture of a dead female in the nude, by her side a bottle labeled with skull and cross-bones, departing from her side a huge anthropoid monster presumably emblematic of the green-eyed one. In this picture we are expected to read the story of a soul swept by the fierce passion of love, of love's heartaches and raptures and finally of the lethal dose that put an end to the torments of jealousy. But there are other interpretations of which the picture is more easily susceptible. One of them is that the lady never wore a straight-front corset and took poison because she was displeased with her figure. Another is that she didn't take the poison at all but died of shame. This interpretation renders the anthropoid one an entirely superfluous figure.

Passions Confounded

The joke on the Rev. Dr. Rader extends beyond the picture. Indeed to be fully appreciated one must read what Dr. Rader wrote to justify the pictorial monstrosity. And if for no other reason Dr. Rader should be read; though of course there are other reasons for in his fertile, live moments, the Rev. Dr. Rader is soothing. He is a man with views that are not altogether new and therefore he is not enervating, for he doesn't plunge you into profound thought on the wherefore or the why. He observes life as a gentleman observes the stars. He never confuses your feelings. But to get back to the joke—the jealousy that the Rev. Dr. Rader wrote about isn't at all the kind that is best suggested to the mind by a dead lady of abnormal girth with a bottle by her side. Dr. Rader makes the very common mistake of confounding jealousy and envy. He but cursorily touches upon the passion that turns love divine to joyless dread. This is the passion of which the green-eyed monster that doth mock the meet it feeds upon is emblematic. He dwelt principally upon the passion that is apprehensive of superiority, the passion that hates the excellence it cannot reach, and that is sometimes described as an ill-natured vice made out of meanness and malice. If there had been absolute harmony between the Rev. Dr. Rader and his illustrator we should have had instead of a nude woman with curvature of the abdomen a large naked hammer bearing the cabalistic inscription N. S. G. W.

As the Natives Do It

Now is the time of year that the distinguished citizens from all parts of our glorious commonwealth who are bound together by the great bond of having happened to be born, each and every one of them, in the same golden state, gather in annual Grand Parlor to justify the existence of their society by drafting laws which nobody is interested in, resolving against evils which are of no particular concern to them and incidentally by indulging in junkets, picnics, dances, receptions and all the rest of the affairs that make up the mad whirl of gaiety of which one thinks instinctively when the Bear Flag is waved or the gorgeous regalia and badges of the order are flashed in the eyes of a dazzled world. Now the wise politician works his right pump-handle overtime, glad-handing the callow, the impressionable and the enthusiastic. Now the peculiar temperament which loves to deck itself in barbaric splendor revels in pins, buttons and badges of surpassing and most conspicuous ugliness, going about all plastered over like a prize bull at a fair. Now the wife who has labored hard all winter gets her little round of dissipation in some strange town of our fair state and stocks her mind with news that will make her stay-at-home neighbors green with envy for six months to come. Now the bore whose life flows in a slow and untroubled current talks by the hour of the Grand Parlors of other years, recalling where "we went in '93 and what a time we had in Nevada City in '92." And now the man who would never be heard of if notoriety only waited on brains and achievement, gets his imposing likeness into the paper because, forsooth, he has been chosen Grand Outside Sentinel or for some other equally tremendous honor vouchsafed him by his brothers.

Gallagher Did Not Pray

Napa has the honor of receiving the Natives this year, but one great feature of the annual Grand Parlor which no doubt the little town that made the mineral water famous—or was it the other way round?—would appreciate as much as any, was unfortunately lacking to the first day of the convention. For Holy Jim Gallagher was not on hand to open the session with prayer. So to do is his duty as junior past grand president of the order, but this year, with a sensitive feeling for the fitness of things never credited to him before, Jim absented himself and the prayer was intoned by another. To hear Jim pray were a treat indeed, especially to those of us who saw him, in the days before Heney and the Grand Jury, assume a psalm-singing attitude in the supervisorial chamber and prepare to chant, not the hymn of the day, but the praises of the United Railroads or some other favored corporation. They say Jim Gallagher was one of the most impressive prayers the Native Sons have ever known. But alas those who never had the honor of bowing their heads while he implored a benediction from on high, must rest content with a second-hand appreciation of his proficiency in this regard. For it looks as though the order is determined to get rid of Jim and that all his fervent prayers at Grand Parlors and elsewhere will not avail to save him.

There Were Thirteen at Table

Members of the legal profession are not usually inclined to superstition and yet not a few of our local barristers have admitted themselves deeply impressed by a story that is going the rounds in connection with the untimely demise of "Billy" Alford. On New Year's Eve Alford attended a party in this city to which fourteen guests had been bidden. At midnight when those who had gathered to celebrate the birth of another twelvemonth seated themselves at table to hail the newborn child of the ages with meat and drink it was noticed that just thirteen chairs were drawn up. Laughing allusion was made on all sides to the ill-luck in store for one of their number during the new year and then nearly everyone forgot the incident. Not so with "Billy" Alford's sister who was there with her brother. She was visibly affected by the discovery and her spirits were gloomed for the rest of the evening. And now her brother is dead, stricken with awful suddenness. Haps such as these cannot be explained satisfactorily to those upon whom omens make a deep impression; and though the story is being told as illustrative of the curious coincidences with which life abounds, there is often to be discerned a deeper and more sombre feeling which the narrator tries to conceal, lest he be accused of superstitious leanings.

The Happy Return of the Day

A reed in the wind, an unthinking reed, at that, despite here and there a Pascal, is mud-sprung man, especially woman. Of women round about these precarious parts, Mother Earth alone spent the memorable eighteenth in sublime forgetfulness of yesteryear. Matter pursued the even tenor of its way, preserved its equanimity; mind quaked. The unfortunate Mrs. Beasley was not, by any means, the only San Franciscan to believe that disaster would return with the day. The preposterous opinion was held by no small minority of our best balanced citizens, and expressed in various ways, amusing, pathetic, and other. Reassuringly many to one were the chances against a coincidence so strange and terrible as that dreaded. Life in this our city on the anniversary of the great earthquake was in no unusual jeopardy. The least rational of reeds might have known that, and saved themselves no little inward shaking. The late Herbert Spencer tells somewhere in his "voluminous writings" how, while typhoid was epidemic in London, he called on a woman of his acquaintance and found her all a-quake. Now, it so happened that, despite the deadly fever, the death rate in London was the lowest in years. Life there was then remarkably safe. This the philosopher told the lady, shook her hand reassuringly at parting, and left her still a-quake. A none too rational world this, made up, as Carlyle says, of mostly—ladies.

but on the high seas, headed for Honolulu; aboard it Jack London, literary adventurer, on his seven years' cruise in quest of copy and recreation. Awhile back, struggling for existence, engaged in piracy—for or against it, as the case might be—like many another struggler, both pursuer and pursued; today, master of his own fate, of his own yacht, and of a yet more unmanageable craft, California's most successful young business man of letters has every reason in the world to be proud of his self-made self—and in his heart no doubt he is, but outwardly, not an offensive bit. What is Jack London's place in literature? Has he any place? These are questions which it will be easier to answer seven years hence, when he comes back from many a place that's underneath the world. In the meantime one thing certain, there is in the author of "The Call of the Wild," in the creator of "Kit Larsen," something akin to genius. It is to be expected of him that southern seas will inspire phrases happy as the "white silence" inspired of northern lands. The luck of the daring be thine, Jack London.

Cautious Eastern Financiers

The Eastern financiers who are in town examining the affairs of the United Railroads Company have not found local conditions prepossessing. Indeed they have found them far from inviting. They have received the same impression that other visitors with money to invest have received—an impression of commercial instability and of a parlous outlook due to the imperious greed of organized labor. There is no great flood of Eastern money pouring into this city at present. The Eastern capitalist with money to invest has assumed the characteristic attitude of the man from Missouri, and local financial interests are getting sicklied o'er with the pale cast of anxiety. It is considered the height of impropriety to discuss such matters, but I have always had a prejudice against emulating the ostrich after the manner of our merchants at the Fairmont banquet when they felicitated themselves on the gallant chin fight being made against the unspeakable employers of labor and owners of public utilities who shamefully corrupted the humble representatives of labor in public office, and said nothing on the subject that most concerns them, nothing of the source of their worst misgivings—the tyranny of labor.

Calhoun Unfrightened

I am not advised as to why Patrick Calhoun and the men whom he represents are disposed to sell the traction system of this city, but I think it somewhat significant in view of the fact that running railroads is their business and that they are not negotiating for the sale of their several Eastern systems. But I should not be surprised to learn that they were eager to be relieved of their anxieties. Perhaps it will be said that on account of the circumstances attending the grant of the trolley privilege they deem it advisable to get the franchise into the hands of innocent third parties. Perhaps it will be said that they are only bluffing; that they have no intention of selling so lucrative a property, but hope to create the impression that it is not such a good thing as it seems. It would be interesting to penetrate their motives and designs, but the curious will have to wait for developments. Pat Calhoun is not the most communicative of men; nor, by the way, is it easy to throw him into a state of panic. Not even the awful prospect of facing Francis Heney before the Grand Jury inspires him with terror. I am told that he is entirely unmindful of the precariousness of his position, seeming to be quite sure of the impossibility of establishing the criminality of his conduct. I am also told that his sentiments respecting the nature of his relations with our city officials are shared by the greatest lawyers in the country. It has been suggested by one of them that if the crime in the French restaurant cases was extortion why should it be something else in the case of Calhoun's trolley franchise. And the same lawyer suggests that the difference might arise from the circumstance that the waiters' union is not as strong as the carmen's union. But this lawyer is a scoffer who wishes us to believe that Heney has been so generous with his immunity bath, so eager to conciliate union labor sentiment, that he is in imminent danger of achieving a fiasco. But my faith in Heney is still strong; also in Langdon who has promised faithfully not to run for Governor until after the people select him for district attorney a second time.

a good interest on their investment and the sale of the furniture on hand and that already contracted for will furnish them with approximately $450,000 ready cash. An option of renewal clause gives the Palace people the opportunity to continue the lease for another ten years at a rental of $10,000 a month, with the taxes and insurance additional. A fair proposition all round, according to real estate experts. By the terms of agreement the Laws will rush the completion of the six hundred rooms on the upper floors and turn them over to the new management as rapidly as possible.

Turned Gaping Walls Into a Great Hotel

The Laws acquired the place, a gaping, uncompleted structure, at a time when nearly everyone regarded it as a colossal business mistake on the part of the Oelrichs family. Hotel people one and all declined tempting lease inducements and the property seemed doomed to become a monument of disappointed hopes when the famous trade was made and the Laws took hold of it with their indomitable energy and began the tremendous task of rushing it to completion. The great fire did not for a moment check their ardor. Before the ashes were cold they had let new contracts to replace the million-dollar loss they had sustained. Despite the almost prohibitive rise in certain lines of building material, the lost time in freight congestion, the labor troubles and the thousand and one ills and disappointments which beset a building of that size under the present confusing local conditions they stuck grimly to their task. They had every idea of completing it as the most magnificent hotel in the country, when the Palace people, forced by their utter lack of proper hotel facilities, came forward and made them the tempting offers which led to the signing of the present lease.

The Pet Ambition of the Laws

The Fairmont has always been something more than a mere hotel with the Laws. It has been a sentiment. They designed to make it the great pride of San Francisco and a monument to the spirit of the New West. The Palace people knew this and argued along the lines that the Laws were past masters as constructors and had very creditably carried the Fairmont through one period of its existence but now came the period when consummate hotel management to conduct it on superior lines was absolutely necessary. They pointed to their own world-wide reputation acquired through thirty-five years of exceptional experience and guaranteed to make the name of the Fairmont as great in the hotel world as the Laws could wish. So it is that the men who virtually constructed the great edifice leased it to the very best managers to be had. They still own it and will strive to make it what they always intended: the pride of San Francisco.

The Palace Management at Its Best

If the ambitious plans of the Palace Hotel Company carry they will soon stand in the very front rank of the greatest hotel managements in the world. The magnificent Fairmont is simply the nucleus of their projects. They will take possession May 1. All their old

Douglas as Editor

Strange indeed has been the revolution of public opinion toward Oscar Wilde, but "startling" is the only word which adequately describes the latest bit of news concerning one whose fate was miserably tangled with Wilde's and for whose personality all who have read Robert Sherard must have the greatest repugnance. Lord Alfred Douglas has become the editor of the London Academy, the weekly which shares with the Saturday Review and the Athenaeum the most cultured field of English literary and artistic criticism. That this notorious pathic should be placed in charge of such a periodical seems utterly, shockingly incongruous. Not that Douglas has not exhibited literary ability of a decadent kind; he has published a volume of verse called "The Placid Pug, and Other Rhymes" and his translation of "Salome" from the French of Wilde is so well done that most readers imagine it was the work of the playwright himself. Douglas's wife, by the way (he married Miss Olive Custance) also woos the muse with more or less success. But those who know from the pages of Sherard, Gide and La Jeunesse, of the malign influence which Douglas exercised over Wilde's last hopeless years, can never regard with anything but extreme disfavor the policy which has placed him in the editorial chair at the Academy office.

The Incorrigible Versesmiths

Ere the smoke of conflagration had died away a year ago the poets descended upon us, and in many meters sang the song of devastation. They got in some thrilling descriptions of the fire fiend licking up whole streets at a time, and two-thirds of them worked in a few lines about the argosies that sailed the seas toward the queen city of the Pacific. After so great a calamity all this was comparatively easy to endure, but as time went on it became a burden, and there was a sigh of relief when at last the poets had written themselves out and the deluge ceased. But our sighs were premature. We did not perceive that the anniversary of the fire would inspire them to songs of triumph, and that that poor old bird, the phoenix, would be worked to death all over again. Some of this verse is good, some bad and some worse. It has been my misfortune to run across the very worst. "Out in 'Frisco" is the title of it, and it is printed on postal cards, a fact that the postal authorities should not ignore. There must be a law somewhere against making Uncle Sam stand for such gross perversion of a public utility. The author does not sign his production but it is copyrighted by S. Levy. Without further proof than this, I do not care to openly accuse Mr. Levy of having written it, for it has many imperfections. It is perfectly evident that the author went at the task without having first secured a poetic license. The only thing that can be admired about him is his utter disregard of conventionalities. The fact that words which are supposed to rhyme must bear some resemblance to each other in sound does not bother the author, who, indeed, shows his independence in many instances by discarding rhyme altogether. He lets meter go to pot with a consistence that leads me to believe that he is a thorough disbeliever in it. Under no other circumstances could he have so thoroughly avoided it. While the song is optimistic in the main, there are notes of pessimism in it which denote anarchistic tendencies. For instance:

"Where street cars carry crowds
Much more than law allows
Out in 'Frisco;

Interrupted travel manifold Causes misery untold
Out in 'Frisco.

Where corporations with impunity
Viselike squeeze the whole community
Out in 'Frisco."

It would not be fair to judge the thing by the lines I have quoted—decidedly not fair, for they are the best ones in it. If I thought you really wanted to hear some of the worst I might quote:

"There the people are rebuilding
A city counting millions,
Where the miles of devastation Changed like magic to habitations."

I guess that will be about all. I will not further butcher this poet to make a paragrapher's holiday.

Agnes Tobin's Petrarch

Miss Agnes Tobin's latest volume of verses consisting of her adaptations of Petrarch's sonnets and canzoni is now in the local book market. It was printed by Heinemann of London but is being distributed by Paul Elder. It was the verses in this volume that evoked from the Saturday Review the comment printed in these columns some months ago to the effect that Miss Tobin's is often more human and more imaginative than Petrarch, and that in this book we find a man's sorrow gushing forth through a woman's tears. All of which I find to be quite true. Miss Tobin exhibits in these verses a wonderful sympathy, a profound sense of the feelings and moods of the distracted lover. She makes us feel something of the poignant grief of the romantic poet, and despite the protracted mournfulness of the sonnets they never grow monotonous. One of these sonnets will serve as a sample of the chaste workmanship of all:

When I am looking at the swift-foot years
That scatter, as they run, my perfumed dreams,
And trample on the torchlight where it streams
From passionate moments that affright my fears;
And when I see them through my rushing tears,
Divide my treasure roughly, as it seems,
And take one-half to Heaven's door that gleams
With welcoming heads, the other where Death peers:
I try to rouse myself, look at my hands
To see if they are real, and sadly see
That I am stripped and stricken and alone.
Then do I suffer the worst pains that be:
Fear of myself and tightening of the bands
Of my imagination gagged and thrown.

Perhaps the most spirited and tender lines in the whole volume are those contained in a canzone addressed as an invocation to the Blessed Virgin. These are the final stanzas:

And when, O Virgin, I shall come to die,
Remember that the poet is but a child,
And hush me with the little drowsy song
That soothed Him when His eyes with dreams were wid

And the vague mystery of the night was by.
He was a frightened child. . . Nay, your eyes throng

With memories . . . and let it not be long,
The drowsiness; but croon,
And bring deep slumber soon.
And now it seems to me—oh, is it wrong—
I feel your tears fall on my tired head.

Laura-Medusa, see!

The blood you turned to stone is warm, is red.

O Virgin, you were human, mortal, near,
Cleaving to Earth in your humility:
Have pity on this sentient heart, and wake
And make it yours; you know and you did see How it could hold a mortal woman dear.
Think, O you lovely thing, for your white sake
What it will do—what fastness it will take.
So, Virgin, bless my arms,
And keep me from all harms;
And I will serve you sleeping and awake:
Bless my poor weapons—all my rimes and stresses,
My strong fourteen-fold shield,
My lithe canzoni strung with your bright tresses.

And when I fall, seeing I wear your sleeves,
Succour me, Holy One,
Sun that outshines the sun!
Permit not that I faint alone and grieve.
Commend me to your Son that, when I cease
To breathe this air, He may,
True God and Man, plunge deep my soul in peace.

Piazzoni "Arrives"

Maurice Del Mue, the painter, tells me of receiving a letter from Piazzoni who says that he has had a picture hung in the Salon in Paris—the big Salon, to gain access to which many a student has starved. Piazzoni, who is distinctly an impressionist, was quite prominent here a few years ago, and had a big following. Under his guidance an exhibition was given five years ago by a flock of artists who wished to enter a protest against the conventional in painting. Among those who showed pictures were Matteo Sandona, G. Leslie Hunter, Xavier Martinez, Maynard Dixon, Maurice Delmue, Blenden Campbell, who has since become a very successful illustrator in the East, and several others. The pictures were shown in a hall on Bush street, near Montgomery, and attracted considerable attention. Sandona became a fad as a portrait painter shortly afterward, and limned the features of a number of prominent society ladies. Piazzoni, who is wealthy, and who looks like anything but an artist, being averse to wearing his temperament on his sleeve, continued with the class he was teaching up to two or three years ago, and then went to Paris, where he had studied before.

My Variable Friend

I have two newspaper friends whom I will for the purpose at hand call Smith and Jones. Smith is a wit and Jones is a spendthrift. I met Smith the other evening and suggested that we go to dinner together.

"All right," he said, "but let's wait for Harriman. He promised to meet me at the corner."

"Who is Harriman?" I questioned.

"Jones," he said.

"I didn't know that you called him Harriman."

"We call him that only on pay days," said Smith.

"The rest of the week we call him the Common People."

Some Unpleasant Suppositions

A San Franciscan who has just returned from the Southern part of the state tells me that there has been a decided falling off in the tourist business this year. A Los Angeleno, telling my informant of this, confessed that he was at a loss to understand the situation. Then the San Franciscan flung at him a hypothetical question, something like this: "Suppose that tourists coming to California had more than one part of the state in mind, looking with pleasure toward visiting San Francisco as well as Los Angeles; and suppose that San Francisco were wiped out by fire, restricting her hotel accommodations to some extent, though not to the extent that the tourists imagine; and suppose that the tourists should think to themselves, 'Well, if we can't go to San Francisco, it isn't worth while to make the journey to California merely to see the Southern part of the state;' supposing these things, might not they be advanced as a reason for the falling off of the tourist business?" And immediately the Los Angeleno had a brainstorm.

Peace, Mr. President

Should Mr. Carnegie continue to think for himself, and hold opinions in the matter of peace between nations at variance with those held by Mr. Roosevelt, there's no telling how soon war will be declared upon him from the White House, nor what new kind of liar, nor how many new kinds, he will prove to be. A difference of opinion between individuals is still casus belli. Some day we may have neither warrior nor poor man with us, but the end of war and poverty is not yet. Congresses to the contrary notwithstanding, the world is ready neither for peace nor plenty. Let this nation, for instance (not to mention nations less happily situated), seek peace, ensue it, and find it. What, then? It is as hard for us to keep it, our peace, as it is for our President to keep his, who, not content to play second fiddle to Washington, must needs be first in the Philippines, first in Portsmouth, and first in the ears of his countrymen. The root of the question of war is not justice nor yet righteousness, but egotism. What time your Roosevelts and Carnegies come to be able to discuss peace from opposing points of view, with never a thought of self the while, but solely of principles involved, rumors of war shall cease. That gaudy flower, national pride, will have blood for its watering (if one may so speak), or know for what. Here in California, is it justice that White thinks of as it looks in sidelong scorn on Yellow? or of righteousness that Yellow thinks as it looks in like scorn on White. I trow not.

John H. Gibson of Des Moines drove his Model K Winton twenty-two thousand miles with great enjoyment, thereby adding fresh evidence of Winton reliability. "Another twenty-two thousand miles on top of this," says Mr. Gibson, "will not hurt her any."

"THE EPILOGUE"

There was a young man with a critic's eye,
Who fell in love with a maiden shy,
And this, you see, was the reason why,
She bought her things

AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

Her suit was of the latest shade,
You could see in a minute 'twas Paris made;
By the style it gave to the pretty maid,
You'd know it was bought

AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

Her waist beneath her cutaway coat
Of exquisite taste and elegance spoke.
Her belt and real-lace collar denote
That they also were bought

AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

As the man and the maid walked past the door,
He said, "I am told that in this big store
They've furniture, bric-a-brac, rugs galore.
Such lovely things you ne'er saw before,
Let's buy ours now

AT THE WHITE HOUSE."

The maiden blushed and made reply—
"Oh! this is so sudden! but I think that I
To resist the temptation will not even try,"
And so they stopped

AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

In the haberdashery he found a tie,
And then other things so pleased his eye,—
"For the happy day," he said, "I'll buy
My things right here

AT THE WHITE HOUSE."

Quoth the maiden shy, "Here above every place,
I am suited in silks, gloves, ribbons and lace,
For no other store can as yet keep pace
With the stock that they have

AT THE WHITE HOUSE."

Brushing aside a lock of hair,
She said—"Did you ever see linens so rare?
Such patterns and texture so fine! I declare We'll have to buy ours

AT THE WHITE HOUSE."

Spoke the man and the maid as a single voice
To Raphael Weill—"Such a line and so choice!
You surely have cause, indeed, to rejoice
At the unequaled stock

AT THE WHITE HOUSE."

He replied—"In Europe twelve buyers we keep,
Who, alert and keen, are never asleep.
For fifty-two years these mysteries deep
Have been solved by them

The Casserlys Have Deserted Us

Mrs. Jack Casserly has deserted San Francisco for good and all, I hear. She has not yet made up her mind whether she will make her future home in New York, Chicago or Washington. Mrs. Casserly is fond of the higher Bohemian set, and likes to be surrounded with great musicians, actors and literary people. She would like to have had a salon in San Francisco but she thought this town too small to get a very distinguished circle about her. In New York she sees a great deal of the Walter Damrosch's, Emma Eames-Story, Bessie Abbott, Margaret Anglin and Henry Miller.

The Tale of a Coat

At least one of the evening coats lost in the scuffle at the Promenade Concert which was given at the Fairmont Hotel has been recovered by its fair owner, though not without the exercise of strategy. The night of the concert the ladies managed the hat and cloak rooms and by midnight it was just one big grab bag with a hit or miss chance of getting the wraps in which you started for the affair. A society woman who wore a beautiful coat of apricot colored cloth trimmed with real Irish lace and all the other "fixings" that go to make an evening coat a thing of beauty had to go home without any wrap, as no amount of search unraveled hers from the tangle of silk and cloth and velvet. Although she advertised her loss in the papers the coat did not put in an appearance and she decided that the person who had taken it meant to keep it. On Monday night of this week she attended the opening performance of Lillian Russell, and fancy her surprise and indignation when she saw a woman come sailing down the aisle in her coat. Her husband had to restrain her from rushing up to the woman and then and there divesting her of the costly garment. Instead he quietly dispatched an usher with a note to her telling her to leave the coat after the first act at the box office for Mrs. So and So or she would immediately be arrested. He stationed himself at the door to apprehend the woman in case she tried to escape but she acted as one who might have felt that she was entirely innocent of criminal intention. She slipped into the coat after the first act and left it at the box office, where the rightful owner claimed it after the play. And now those in the secret are wondering how it all happened, and if possibly it was not all a most unfortunate mistake.

The Interesting Whitneys

The Vincent Whitney automobile was one of those wedged in the crush of vehicles which blocked the squares surrounding the Fairmont the night of the opening dinner and as a result the dainty little bride made a conspicuously tardy entrance into the dining room. She certainly has the art of dress mastered to a nicety, and although the simplest gowned young woman at the dinner she was far and away the most picturesque figure there. A quaintly beflowered poke bonnet gave a piquant touch to her costume and was alone sufficient to lift her out of the commonplace. After dinner, young Whitney spied out an isolated chair in a corner of the crowded foyer and shared it with his wife with charming disregard of the cut and dried conventions. It was as pretty a rebuke to the self consciousness of the prigs as I have ever witnessed.

The Greenway Party

The Greenway dinner party did not run on ball bearings owing to the delayed appearance of half the guests. Mrs. Fred McNear, with pretty Mary Keeney, arrived first and helped upholster the foyer until the last stragglers had found their places at the tables. Greenway, usually most placid, and polished of hosts was jolted out of his chronic calm and kept the telephone buzzing. Finally he darted out into the night to round up the derelects. Mrs. McNear and Miss Keeney grew tired of decorating the foyer and they had the steward show them to the table reserved for Mr. Greenway. Of course these two women sitting at the big, round, flower laden table reserved for eight, came in for abnormal attention. Mrs. McNear wore rather a demure while lace gown, with a huge white hat topped with nodding black plumes. The chapeau was worn well off her face—a distinctly new angle in recent millinery. Both Mrs. McNear and her pretty young companion looked duly relieved when the smiling Ned finally appeared with the rest of the party whom he had rescued from a tangle of automobiles.

A Vanderbilt Crowded Out

An interested observer of western festivities was Miss Gladys Vanderbilt. The Vanderbilt party arrived during the after dinner promenade and unobtrusively hurried to their apartments but in passing through the foyer they almost brushed sleeves with Mrs. Walter Martin who was with the Herbert Mofatts. Evidently Mrs. Walter has not a nodding acquaintance with the Cornelius Vanderbilts who are said to be very friendly with Mrs. Peter Martin. Miss Gladys did not disappear like the rest of the party but sat down on the mezzanine floor and smilingly watched the rainbow tinted crowd below. She was evidently having a snug, lovely time all by herself—probably for the first time in her life viewing such a scene instead of being on view herself. She was routed out of her corner by a newly rich matron who, with a friend, made her perfumed way to the mezzanine floor and finding a severely tailored young woman occupying the one available seat, said in an airily disdainful way: "Kindly move along so that we can sit down." The daughter of Cornelius Vanderbilt "moved along" and as she turned into a corridor the San Francisco woman spread her silken skirts on the settee and drawled, "I suppose she is the wife or sister of some employee come to 'rubber' at the crowd." And I, who had watched the scene from a shadowy corner wondered at the mistake of a woman who could not see Newport and New York written large in Miss Vanderbilt's manner and tailor-made.

Progress of Mrs. Spreckels

Mrs. C. O. Alexander is with Mrs. Gus Spreckels at Cannes. Miss Berger whom Mrs. Alexander is chaperoning is making a big hit socially I hear, and is included in all the affairs that Mrs. Gus attends. In Europe it is generally believed that Mrs. Gus is in exclusive control of the Spreckels's fortune and so she is a great favorite with the poor but aristocratic noblesse. Mrs. Spreckels has her energies concentrated on English society. She has penetrated as far as most Americans into the Fairbourg St. Germain, and now she is cultivating everything English. Mrs. Alexander, by the way, is spoken of in all the Continental society journals as the "rich Mrs. Alexander."

The Josselyns In Paris

I hear that the Josselyn sisters are cutting a wide swath in the Bohemian society of Paris. They are living on pension and are cultivating the society of musical and art students. In San Francisco the Josselyns prefer "to do the grand" but I am told that when abroad they love to make excursions into Bohemia. Pater Josselyn is promising another book and San Francisco society may soon expect to be regaled. I hear that a few of his resonant haired daughters pose as having never read any of the father's works. It is said that Mr. Josselyn is anxious to write a work on some French historical subject that will win for him a decoration.

Off To Europe

Mr. and Mrs. Santiago Arrillaga left San Francisco on April third for a six months' trip to Europe. They will visit the Arrillaga home in Spain and all the European capitals. Mr. Arrillaga has been for more than thirty years one of the most successful piano instructors in America. Many of the piano virtuosi in San Francisco society are indebted to his superb instruction.

He Is So Democratic

Charles de Loosey Oelrichs's marriage to Miss Turnbull in New York last week (April 15th) was a very quiet affair. I hear that the Oelrichs family were rather disappointed that Charlie did not chose a girl of more wealth but they are thankful that the young lady is of good social standing and of a manner that is comme il faut. These Oelrichs's are so democratic in their tastes that everyone said that should Charles be smitten with a manicure he would not hesitate to marry her; hence there is rejoicing in the family of Oelrichs. When he was out here several years ago in a tentative business venture he quite worried the Martin clan by his decidedly democratic tastes, which were even more democratic than those of Mere Martin herself. At the Mardi-Gras which he attended with his sister Lily Oelrichs Martin he shocked several dowagers by his marked attention to some pretty women who were not in the holy of holies.

Geraldine Bonner is rapidly becoming as prolific a writer as Gertrude Atherton. She already has a new book ready for a New York publisher and has begun on a new novel. Miss Bonner I hear is to spend the summer in Europe.

Mrs. Walter C. Jones, wife of First Lieutenant Jones of the Thirteenth Infantry, U. S. A., and her little son arrived on the transport Logan from Manila April 13.

She will visit her twin sister, Mrs. Percy H. O'Brien, in Alameda until October, when her husband will arrive with his regiment, which will be stationed at Fort Leavenworth.

At Del Monte

"Once more automobiles are spinning over the roads between San Francisco and Del Monte" writes my correspondent. "Several of the Doctors who came for the State Medical Convention motored down. Among them were Dr. J. A. Black, who brought Mrs. Black, Mrs. George Tyson and Miss Tyson; Dr. and Mrs. H. M. Pond, of Alameda, Miss Pond and Miss Palmer; and Dr. and Mrs. J. Underwood Hall and Francis Spencer Hall." * * * Captain and Mrs. Lawrence H. Westdahl are spending their honeymoon at Del Monte. Mrs. Westdahl was Miss Alma Irene Sevensen, whose pretty wedding took place last week at the home of her sister, Mrs. Franz Collischon, of Alameda. Captain Westdahl has not received orders as to his assignment, so the future home of the young people is as yet undecided. * * * Dr. Genthe, Porter Garnett, Xavier Martinez, Charles Sedgwick Aiken and Miss McCormack were down for the meeting of the jury and hanging committee of the art exhibition. Of course the event of the week was the opening of the Art Gallery Saturday night. About a hundred pictures were hung in the beautifully toned and decorated ball room. The work of the artists shows to great advantage upon its carefully toned walls, and neither thought nor expense has been spared in lights and fittings. The artists represented are William Keith, Charles Rollo Peters, Xavier Martinez, Maynard Dixon, Joseph Greenebaum, Eugen Neuhaus, Charles Dickman, G. Cadenasso, Will Sparks, Harry Stuart Fonda, Evelyn McCormack, Bertha Stringer Lee, Sophia Brannan, Lucia Mathews, DeNeale Morgan, Chris. Jorgensen, Carl Dahlgren, Anita Ghirardelli, Sarah Park, Olga Ackerman, Mary Curtis Richardson, C. Chapel Judson, H. R. Bloomer, Maurice Del Mue, Isabel Hunter, Anna Frances Briggs, J. W. Cantrell, H. C. Best, E. W. Currier, Edward Curtis, Jennie K. McElroy, Mary C. Brady, Frances Soule Campbell, and A. M. Best. Some others will send work a little later. One corner of the room is given up to a collection of photographs. Dr. Genthe has a large number of delightful studies, and Laura Adams Armer is well represented. The artists and management are most fortunate in the choice of a curator who will be in charge of the Gallery. Frederick A. Woodworth is a man who has spent much of his life abroad, and his knowledge of art makes him specially fitted for this responsible post.

Oakland's Charity Fete

The leading charitable organizations of Alameda county will have their annual festival at Arbor Villa, Saturday afternoon of next week. Arbor Villa is the beautiful home of Mr. F. M. Smith, the grounds of which are well worth a visit. It is reached by the Fourth avenue or College avenue cars. Great preparations are being made for the affair, one of the features of which will be a battle of flowers. It will be given under the auspices of the Ladies' Relief Society, Fabiola Hospital, Oakland Social Settlement, California Girls' Training School, West Oakland Home, East Oakland Free Kindergarten.

The Verdier Ball and Banquet

The ball and banquet given by Mr. Paul Verdier to his employees, last Wednesday, the eve of his departure for Paris, was a most enjoyable affair. It was marked by evidences of the most cordial relations existing between Mr. Verdier and his employees. As a token of their esteem for the young manager of the City of Paris his guests presented him with a silver loving cup. The presentation was followed by enthusiastic felicitations. The ballroom was beautifully decorated with French and American flags. Dancing was enjoyed until midnight.

The following are among the arrivals during the past week at Byron Hot Springs: Mr. and Mrs. Geo. E. Starr, Mr. and Mrs. L. R. Larzelere, Dr. J. H. O'Connor, Mrs. Wm. H. Wolf, Judge J. E. Barry, T. H. Goodman, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Hosmer and C. S. Laumeister, of San Francisco; Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Scott, of Burlingame; Mr. and Mrs. John B. Metcalf, Geo. D. Metcalf, Berkeley; Lee L. Gray, Fresno; Mr. and Mrs. P. C. Hunt, of Buffalo, N. Y.; Mr. Joseph Steffens, Sacramento; Mrs. A. R. Bowen, Miss Bowen, Berkeley, Dr. J. C. Hutton, Berkeley.

The new Mass composed by Dr. H. J. Stewart for the Easter services at St. Dominic's Church will be given again, with specially augmented choir and full orchestral accompaniment, on Sunday morning, May 5. On this occasion the new church will be formally dedicated.

The ladies of the Forum Club will give their annual luncheon at the Paris Tea Garden this Saturday.

Auto Notes

"It is interesting to note," says General Sales Manager Shanks of the Winton Company, "that the A. A. A. is now taking the step that manufacturers took two years ago, i. e. the abolition of track racing. That branch of the sport died in 1905, when the big makers withdrew their racing cars. All that remains of track racing is a dare-devil driver here and there, bent on getting a few dollars at the risk of his neck."

In Cleveland a dealer who handles a Western-made car employs an old two-cylinder Winton for towing purposes. He has disguised the old timer as much as he can, but the familiar chug-chug of this two-cylinder advertises its genealogy and the fact that the dealer in question picked out a good one for the purpose of bringing home his cripples.

Cuyler Lee reports recent sales of Cadillac cars as follows: Frank H. Johnson of San Rafael, a Cadillac Touring car; Dr. Charles Howard Miller of San Leandro, a Cadillac Runabout; Ye Liberty Candy Company of Oakland, two Cadillac delivery cars, and Miss E. Murray of Kentfield, a Cadillac Touring car.

Having been for many years the heaviest shippers of motor cars from Cleveland, the Winton Company has had no difficulty in securing railroad accommodations during the freight car shortage. The result is that Winton buyers are securing prompt deliveries, which is an important item now that the riding season is opening.

The Actors' Fair

At 8 o'clock on the evening of Monday, May 6, President Roosevelt, in his executive library at Washington, will press an electric button which signals the opening of the Actors' Fund Fair at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Afternoon and evening during the entire week the great auditorium will be converted into a busy and brilliant bazaar that promises to eclipse in magnitude any previous charity affair in the world's history. Its object is to replenish the treasury of the Actors' Fund, which annually disburses some $40,000, an amount considerably in excess of its income. It does not maintain the idle, nor does it encourage improvidence. Its work is purely charitable—the care of the sick, the burial of the dead, the support of a home for infirm and worn-out veterans no longer able to follow their profession. And the Actors' Fund makes public appeal with every claim to generous consideration. If a private or public charity is to be assisted, if an immense relief fund is to be raised in time of fire, flood, famine or other overwhelming calamity, the actors are the first called upon and the first to respond. One year ago they were playing all over America to raise great sums for the San Francisco sufferers. Without the actors it would be impossible to organize benefits. Now the profession makes a national appeal that it may relieve its own afflicted members. The Actors' Fund Fair will be the first of its kind in fifteen years. It has aroused great enthusiasm, not only in New York, but from ocean to ocean. The newspapers have encouraged it. The theatres and their people everywhere have banded together in promotion work. Over one thousand women of various organizations, some in no way affiliated with the stage, have combined as members of active committees. Generous response has been made in the way of cash contributions and costly donations. There will be no lack of goods and novelties, practical and artistic, with which to equip this great exposition universal. The decorative scheme, devised by the well-known scenic artist, Edward G. Unitt, of the Lyceum Theatre, is dignified and distinctive. It involves the reproduction, upon the main floor, of the village of Stratford-upon-Avon—or rather its principal thoroughfare, lined with historic buildings—the Shakespeare house, Anne Hatheway's cottage, the Guildhall, and dozens of quaint Warwickshire structures, all fitted up as booths for the sale of antiques, curios, souvenirs and up-to-date novelties never dreamed of in Will Shakespeare's time. At the end of the street, with cunningly devised perspective, the old Stratford Church nestles in luxuriant foliage upon the bank of the sluggish Avon. Not even this immense floor space will be sufficient to accommodate all attractions. The spacious ante-rooms and club rooms upon the second tier will be utilized for booths and entertainment halls. But not a single exit will be obstructed nor anything allowed to hinder the free movement of the enormous crowds that will circulate from 2 o'clock every afternoon until midnight. Scores of actors and actresses, including many famous stars, will work earnestly in various fields of activity.

A Comedienne of Distinction

"The Butterfly," a comedy by Vellet Chambers, is the means of presenting Lillian Russell to us as a comedienne. It is a silly little playlet, but contains enough jollity to save it from severely adverse criticism and it really serves a laudable purpose in showing us this remarkable woman in a new light, in which she shines to an even greater degree than as a comic opera queen. For about twenty years Lillian Russell has fascinated us by her sheer charm of personality, and though that charm is not one whit less, she now develops into an actress of distinctly admirable talent in whom the comedy vein is unmistakably apparent, and who brings to bear a delightfully ripe art and a skillful manipulation of the comedy tricks of stage craft. In a play worth while Lillian Russell will achieve distinction. At present the mob is not inclined to enthuse over her in straight comedy because the mob knows her only as a prima donna and as a famous beauty who was in recent years identified with a burlesque company. But Lillian Russell is a woman of intelligence and of considerable artistic ability and she will compel recognition in the new field which she has entered under rather unpropitious circumstances. Excepting Eugene Ormonde who struts through his role after a most actor-like and unconvincing fashion, Miss Russell's support is all that could be desired, and Isabel Richards gives a particularly clever impersonation of the Irish girl who develops an extravagantly Latin temperament while studying singing in Italy.

Robin Hood at the Novelty

At the Novelty Theatre on Monday night the San Francisco Opera Company will open a special season of two weeks, singing the final performances of its stay in this city at the playhouse, corner O'Farrell and Steiner streets. This excellent organization will be augmented by two artists who have been secured for the production of "Robin Hood" and "The Serenade." "Robin Hood" will be sung during the first week with matinees on Saturday and Sunday. The DeKoven and Smith opera is probably the most popular work of all American composers and has a record in this country second to no other. The San Francisco Opera Company is splendidly equipped for the presentation of the tune-ful Bostonian successes and the management will stage the operas on a very elaborate scale. The three acts of "Robin Hood" call for some picturesque stage effects and nothing will be left undone to make the productions notable ones. The cast of "Robin Hood" will include Aida Hemmi as Maid Marian, Florence Sinnott as Annabel, Maude Beatty as Alan-a-Dale, Carl Hayden and J. Francis Abbott alternating as Robin Hood, Aimee Leicester as Dame Durden, Teddy Webb as the Sheriff of Nottingham, Oliver LeNoir as Will Scarlett, J. Wallerstedt as Little John, George Kunkel as Friar Tuck and Melvine Stokes as Sir Guy.

A Midsummer Night's Dream

Direct from her metropolitan triumphs at the Astor Theatre, New York, Miss Annie Russell comes to the Van Ness Theatre on Monday next for a two weeks' engagement, appearing as Puck in Messrs. Wagenhal's and Kemper's beautiful production of "A Midsummer Night's Dream." It was said in New York that this presentation of Shakespeare's comedy was unique in the history of the play in this country. In this production the spectacular features usually associated with the play have been greatly augmented and enlarged upon. The fairy world of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is a rounding of playfulness, in which imagination is the substance and in which hard fact runs into fantastic shapes that mock reality. A fairy company surrounds the mortals with its joyous ring and leaves happiness in its wake. It has been the earnest effort of the management to realize all this in the present production so that the fairy spirit will be present with all its life and sunshine and fantastic revelry. In the role of Puck Miss Russell is said to be a perfect embodiment of the merry household fairy. There are one hundred members in the company supporting Miss Russell, chief among them being Oswald Yorke, John Bunny, Lansing Rowan, Lionel Adams, Thomas Coffin Cooke, Catherine Proctor, Richard Lee and Ina Brooks. The usual Saturday matinee will be given.

"La Belle Russe"

Izetta Jewel and the other members of the Colonial Stock Company will have an unusually fine opportunity during the coming week in David Belasco's revised edition of "La Belle Russe," the highly emotional drama in which Jeffries Lewis, Clara Morris and Rose Coghlan starred with much success. The play has been brightened up and under the direction of George Lask will receive a most artistic presentation. "La Belle Russe" was written by Peter Robert son and David Belasco and was first produced at the old Baldwin with Jeffreys Lewis, Osmond Tearle, Gerald Eyre, John W. Jennings and Jean Clara Walters in the cast. It scored such a tremendous hit that it was immediately put on at Wallack's Theater, New York, with Rose Coghlan as Geraldine. During its New York run the great emotional actress, Clara Morris, saw it and became so impressed with the merits of the production that she closed a deal whereby she secured the road rights to produce it, and she toured in it for several seasons. Two years ago it was rewritten by David Belasco for Leslie Carter.

"The Admirable Crichton"

One of the greatest triumphs of the old Alcazar—"The Admirable Crichton"—will be essayed by the New Alcazar company next week with Bertram Lytell and Laura Lang in the leading roles. Those of the old company who will be in the new cast are Adele Belgarde, John B. Maher and Ernest Glendenning. They will assume their old roles in which they gave most gratifying performances. "The Admirable Crichton" is one of the most artistic of Mr. Barrie's fantastic comedies, and in addition to being good drama, it teaches a wholesome lesson in a most alluring fashion. The mechanical accessories essential to this play are a very pleasing feature and their success will depend much on the genius of Stage Manager Butler, which was vindicated in the original local production.

"El Capitan" at Idora

Sousa's comic opera masterpiece, "El Capitan," is delighting the patrons of Idora Park across the bay with its spirited melodies and its amusing story. The merry singers of Idora give a fine performance of this old favorite, and several individual hits have been made. The next offering will be Victor Herbert's charming work, "The Fortune Teller."

Her One Profane Moment

There has been a discussion in New York recently about profanity on the stage. Most of the leading players of the day have been interviewed, and about the only one whose opinion on the subject was not made public is Annie Russell, although an interviewer did go to see her between the acts of "A Midsummer Night's Dream," when she was making her remarkable success as Puck. Miss Russell would not be interviewed about profanity, but she told a story under seal of secrecy. The interviewer dared not print it, but he told it to a friend, and now it's out. Here it is:

"I don't remember ever having used profanity but once," Miss Russell said, "and that was in England a few years ago. I had been down to a country house in the middle counties, during the shooting season. The morning I left to be driven to the station a young man was also taking his departure. We rode down together. When we arrived there I entered a first-class coach and waited for the train to start.

"Leaning back in my seat I became aware of loud and angry talking outside the window and, looking out, saw my young companion standing on the platform. He was using strong language to the porter who, it seemed, had mislaid his gun case. The young man was angry and his language was violent. Just then the signal was given and, opening the door, the young man jumped into the carriage. He was apparently shocked to find that his language had evidently been overheard and at once apologized.

"I really beg your pardon, Miss Russell," he said, "but I am a plain sort of fellow and call a spade a spade."

"Indeed sir," I replied, "I should have thought from what you had just said that you would call it a damned old shovel."

Clever Elizabeth Murray

Elizabeth Murray who will appear at the Orpheum next week is one of the cleverest women on the vaudeville stage and in no city is she a greater favorite than San Francisco. She makes one feel that life is worth the living. Her coon songs and Irish ballads are gems in their way, or rather in her way. With few gestures and no exaggerations or facial expression she gets more real humor in a quiet way out of her yarns and ditties than half a dozen of the average boisterous caricaturists put together are capable of. Her Irish brogue is delightful, her negro dialect is natural and withal she dignifies her calling by her poise and costume. Among the other novelties will be The Max Tourbillon Troupe, Bicycle Acrobats and staircase jumpers and the Kremka Brothers. The holdovers will include the four Harveys, the most marvelous wire act performers in the world; beautiful Bessie Wynn in her quaint and charming songs; Linton and Lawrence for the first time in "A Doctor's Patience." The Rialto Comedy Four and the famous Fadettes Women's Orchestra will contribute to one of the most excellent programmes in the history of The Orpheum.

In the Limelight

Lillian Russell will give the final performance of her engagement on Sunday night at the Van Ness Theatre. The star has won a distinctive triumph for her work as a comedienne in this production of "The Butterfly."

Henrietta Crosman is to follow Annie Russell at the Van Ness Theatre and will present two plays entirely new to us. They are "All-of-a-Sudden Peggy" and "The Almighty Dollar." The latter has a three years' run to its credit in Berlin.

Although her engagement is yet several weeks in the distance, the box office of the Van Ness Theatre has had hundreds of requests for the Maude Adams production of "Peter Pan." Miss Adams will bring her entire New York cast and stage effects.

we found a sort of cave to hide in. We fixed a wire to a nail in the trunk of a tree upon the heath and put the other end to earth. In the wire we joined up a small transformer and connected it by fine wires through the bushes to a coherer, battery, and telephone in the cave. The tree caught the electric waves of the telegraph as they passed over the hill, and the fine wire carried them to the coherer, making signals that could be heard in the telephone. Well, one night when Tagouchi was gone with an important message to our commander, and I sat upon a boulder inside the cave, with my ear at the telephone, I was fairly startled by hearing a little stone rattle down the rocks into the brook. I listened intently, but heard nothing more, and began to think some rabbit or other wild animal had dislodged it. However, to make sure, I was going to look outside, when a loud voice called in Japanese:

"Come out, or I'll shoot."

"I didn't move or speak. I turned my eyes to the mouth of the cave, but could see nothing, for it was very dark. The man cried again, and then he fired into the cave, but missed me. I leaned back on the wall and drew my revolver. A third shot grazed my arm, but I gave no sign. Perhaps he thought there was nobody in the cave, for he struck a match. I suppose he saw me, as he uttered a cry. At any rate, I saw him, and sprang to my feet. We both fired. I felt his bullet strike the mirror on my chest. I heard him fall with a deep groan upon the rocks. The spirit of my father was up. I rushed from the cave to finish him. What a surprise! It was Prince Vladimir, the man I had wanted to kill. I might do it now without murder. He did not know me. 'I'm at your mercy,' 'I have a wife,' he added, and perhaps it was for that I spared him. After dressing his wound I laid him on a couch of heather in the cave. He told me that his regiment had occupied the hill that afternoon, and he advised me to fly before I was taken. Evidently his wound was not mortal and he began to feel strong again. 'I shall soon be able to walk back to camp,' said he. 'Don't mind me. Go at once.'

"Adieu, Prince," I replied, with a salute.

"How—you know me?" he exclaimed.

"Well, yes—by sight," I answered. "I've seen you in Yeddo. I knew your wife's family—the Arimaskas."

"My wife," he rejoined. "You are mistaken. My wife is a Russian. May I ask your name?"

"Hachida. Lieutenant Hachida."

"Of the Engineers?"

"The same."

"I've heard of you," said he. "Then you don't know that my engagement was broken off owing to the war?"

"No, I was in Korea."

"Oh, yes; my wife is in Port Arthur."

"This was glad news for me. We shook hands, and I made the best of my way to the Japanese lines."

"I've heard of that adventure. It was mentioned in dispatches."

"Yes. It got me promotion. The Mikado sent me the Order of the Chrysanthemum."

"And Mademoiselle Chrysanthemum—the lady in Yeddo?"

"In one of the assaults on Port Arthur I was severely wounded, and invalided home. I renewed my acquaintance with her family, and she has promised to be mine."

"I wish you joy," said I, handing back the mirror.

"Take care of Lady Hamilton," he said to Hardy; and with his last breath he whispered to the chaplain who stood by his side: "Remember that I leave Lady Hamilton as a legacy to my country."

When she heard of his death, she cried: "My heart is broken. Life to me now is not worth having. I lived but for him. His glory I gloried in; it was my pride that he should go forth; and this fatal and last time that he went I persuaded him to it."

"The last time that he went I persuaded him to it." Through a whole century those words have rung, proclaiming through the years the devotion of a woman who thought more of the glory of the man she loved than of herself and the love she bore him. Yet there was little in her birth and early life to give assurance of such self-sacrifice to a world which looks elsewhere than in the humblest for great qualities of soul.

Emma Hart, as she once called herself, was by birth a peasant, the daughter of a blacksmith named Henry Lyons. She was born in Preston; and when, but a short time after her father's death, her mother moved to Hawarden, in Flintshire, they were so poor that when Emma was only twelve or thirteen she was sent to service as a nursemaid in the family of Dr. Thomas, a physician of such advanced ideas for those days that he made a specialty of inoculating for smallpox.

Three or four years later she went to London, still as a nursemaid, in the family of Dr. Budd, one of the physicians to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, where among her fellow-servants was a girl who, afterwards, as Jane Powell rose to eminence as an actress.

Years after, when the little nursemaid had become the wife of the British Ambassador at Naples, and Jane Powell was queening it on the stage at Drury Lane, Lady Hamilton went one night to that historic house; and the attention of the audience was equally divided between the two women whose careers had started so apparently inauspiciously.

From Dr. Budd's Emma went to Mrs. Linley, the mistress of Drury Lane Theatre; and it was her duty to take messages from the manageress in her private box to the actresses on the stage which first brought her into contact with the theatre, and induced her to develop those powers of mimicry she possessed, and incited her to sing and act, arts in which she later on excelled to so great a degree that on one occasion, after she was married, when Romney had heard her at her husband's house, in the presence of several people of fashion, he wrote to a friend: "She performed both in serious and in comic to admiration, both in singing and acting; but her Nina surpasses anything I ever saw, and I believe as a piece of acting nothing ever surpassed it. The whole company were in an agony of sorrow. Her acting is simple, grand, terrible, and pathetic."

Her grace and elegance, combined with her beauty, made her the admiration of the painters and sculptors of her time; and no one needs reminding that in those qualities Romney found an unceasing source of inspiration. The wonderful command she had over her features, and her exalted powers of mimicry, enabled her to represent any character she chose, and account for the fact that he painted her in the most opposite, not to say contradictory, characters, now as a wood nymph, and as a Pythian goddess on her tripod, as a bacchante and a Magdalen, as Calypso and Miranda, as Circe and Joan of Arc, and in the score and more of other characters which the genius of the artist has bequeathed to the admiration of posterity.

It was in 1782, when she was only eighteen years of age, that she first sat to Romney, having been introduced to him, for the purpose of having a portrait painted, by Mr. Charles Greville, the nephew of Sir William Hamilton. It was a three-quarter length, and she was represented with a little spaniel lapdog under her arm. Later on, this portrait was acquired by Sir William Hamilton; and at the sale of his effects it was bought by Mr. Lister Parker. In those days, the price Romney obtained for his pictures was not large, for his son, the Rev. John Romney, wrote of the unfinished "Circe" that, had the artist been offered a hundred pounds, "I have no doubt that it would have been completed.

The exquisite picture of "Sensibility" owed its origin to the poet Hayley. One day in 1786 Hayley went to Romney's studio, and saw him looking at a head on a small canvas. "You've never painted a head with such exquisite expression before," he exclaimed. "You have only to enlarge the canvas, introduce a mimosa growing in a vase, with a hand approaching its leaves, and you call it the personification of Sensibility." The idea stimulated Romney. He decided to begin at once and Hayley went off to get him a mimosa plant. So enchanted was he with the picture that, later on, he managed to acquire it.

While the beauty of her face and the exquisiteness of her figure undoubtedly first served to draw Sir William Hamilton's notice to her, it was also the brilliancy of her voice which attracted him; and he offered to send her to Italy to have it cultivated.

To Italy she accordingly went for a time, and, returning to London, Sir William married her on September 6, 1791, at Marylebone Church. Even then her musical education continued; and so exquisitely did she sing that she had offers to be what she called "the first woman in the Italian Opera at Madrid" at a salary of £2,000 a year for three years. Subsequently Galini offered her £2,000 a year to sing in opera in London, but Sir William would not permit it.

Hers was evidently not a dilettante life, for she wrote to a friend from Naples: "I have my French master, I have the Queen's dancing-master three times a week, I have three lessons in singing a day. I give up one hour in the day to reading, and for all this there is now five painters and two modlers at work on me for Sir William, and there is a picture of me going to the Empress of Russia."

To the end of her life, indeed, Lady Hamilton, in spite of the money spent on her education, never could spell. On one occasion she wrote to a friend: "How tedious does the time pass a whay till I hear from you!"

Within a fortnight after her arrival at Naples as the wife of the Ambassador, she was dining at the Court; and Lady Malmesbury, one of the "grandes dames" of the world of that time, was compelled to admit that she "really behaved as well as possible, and quite wonderfully considering her origin and education."

It was not long before she became the intimate friend of the Queen of Naples—so intimate, indeed, that she went in and out of the Queen's rooms without any ceremony. One day she wanted to see the Queen. The Ladies-in-Waiting said her Majesty was engaged. Lady Hamilton knew that the Queen's guest was a woman she did not like, and particularly wished to be present at the interview. She walked straight into the Queen's apartments. The Queen resented the intrusion. There were high words. Then the Queen raised her hand and slapped Lady Hamilton in the face. Without the slightest hesitation Lady Hamilton slapped the Queen's face in return. For a moment there was a scuffle. The outraged Ladies-in-Waiting had to separate them. When the King heard of the incident, he roared with laughter. Naples gossiped for a day or two; then the two women were reconciled, and everything was as pleasant as before.

It was in the September of 1793 that Nelson, then captain of H. M. S. "Agamemnon," arrived at Naples. He had been sent by Admiral Lord Hood with dispatches to Sir William Hamilton, relating to the recent surrender of Toulon to the British forces.

Sir William naturally invited Nelson to the Embassy, and said to Lady Hamilton: "I am going to introduce to you a little man, who can't pose as being very handsome, but he'll become the greatest man that England has ever produced. I know it from the few words of conversation I have had with him. I pronounce that he will one day astonish the world."

Nelson was fascinated by the sweetness of Lady Hamilton's disposition and by her beauty, though it may be questioned whether she was, at the time, equally attracted to him.

In a few weeks he went away; and five long years were to elapse ere they met again. Before that, however, Lady Hamilton was destined to play an important part in his life. Charles IV., then King of Spain, wrote to the King of Naples that he had determined to drop the alliance with England and join France. The Queen of Naples got the letter, and showed it to Lady Hamilton. Lady Hamilton sent a copy of it to Lord Grenville, then our Minister for Foreign Affairs, who forthwith informed the Admiral in command of the Mediterranean Squadron.

The Spanish Fleet was strictly watched; and in the battle off Cape St. Vincent the maritime power of Spain was crippled. For this victory Sir John Jervis, who commanded the Fleet, was created Lord St. Vincent, and Nelson was made Rear-Admiral of the Blue and Knight of the Bath.

In the following year the French fleet, of two hundred and fifty vessels, started from Toulon, having on board Napoleon and a large army. Its destination was unknown, but it was thought probable to be Malta or Sicily.

The French Envoy at Naples demanded the release of certain members of the French Republican Party who were imprisoned in the city, and succeeded in obtaining it. The Queen, who played a great part in politics, determined to invoke the aid of England to circumvent him. So Lady Hamilton wrote to Lord Nelson telling him what was going on, and to Lord St. Vincent, who replied with more enthusiasm than caution: "I am happy to have a knight of superior prowess in my train, who is charged with this enterprise (the succour of Their Sicilian Majestoes), at the head of as gallant a band as ever drew sword or trailed a pike."

Nelson set out in pursuit of the French fleet, but could not find it. At last he arrived at Sicily, and anchored in Syracuse. The fleet wanted provisions and water. Nelson applied to Sir William to get the Royal authority for him to obtain the necessary supplies. This was impossible, in consequence of a treaty between France and Naples that not more than two English ships-of-war could enter any Neapolitan or Sicilian port.

Treaties, however, never yet stopped a woman's actions. If they had, the history of the world would have been written differently. Lady Hamilton went to the Queen. She begged her Majesty to authorize supplies being furnished to the fleet. At first the Queen hesitated. Then she wrote an order "To all the Governors of the Two Sicilies" to water, victual, and aid the English Fleet.

Nelson was enchanted. He wrote to Sir William and Lady Hamilton: "My Dear Friends,—Thanks to your exertions we have victualled and watered, and surely, watering at the fountain of Arethusa, we must have victory. We shall sail with the first breeze, and be assured I will return either crowned with laurel or covered with cypress."

He sailed next day, found the French fleet at Alexandria, and won the Battle of the Nile.

It was a month before Lady Hamilton heard the welcome news. When she did she fell down "like one who had been shot." She encircled her forehead with a white bandeau embroidered with the words "Nelson" and "Victory," and drove through Naples. Wherever she was seen the people shouted themselves hoarse with joy.

Two weeks later the "Vanguard," Nelson's flagship, returned to Naples. She and Sir William went to meet the hero of the Nile in their State barge. She rushed on deck, and, crying, "Oh, is it possible?" she fell into Nelson's arms, more dead than alive.

Nelson was wounded, and suffering greatly. She nursed him back to health with the tenderest solicitude.

The result of the admission of the English ships into Syracuse, and of aid being given, was naturally a breach of the treaty. The French Envoy protested, and the French were preparing to march on Naples. Nelson advised the King to break with France and attack her on land, to follow up his own victory which he had won on sea.

Emma Hamilton urged the Queen to follow the advice. An army was raised; but at the first skirmish the Neapolitans deserted in crowds, and the King returned to Naples. In their extremity they turned to Lady Hamilton for advice. She suggested flight. Nelson's flagship was ready for them, and would take them to a place of safety. She arranged everything, even to the secret rifling of the palace of its treasures, conveying money, statues, and pictures to the value of about two million five hundred thousand pounds on board the English ships. The night resolved on for their flight there was a ball. Lady Hamilton went to it to prevent people suspecting that anything was going to happen, while the King and Queen with their family went on board the "Vanguard."

They set sail, and presently a storm arose. Lady Hamilton was the good fairy of the situation. The little Prince Albert, the youngest child of the King and Queen, a boy of six, was terribly ill. Lady Hamilton herself attended him, and he died in her arms. At length they reached Palermo, and the King and Queen were safe.

Lady Hamilton's further services later on resulted in the expulsion of the French from the Neapolitan territory, and the return of the King and Queen, the latter of whom wrote to Lady Hamilton calling herself "her tenderly attached and grateful friend," and sending her her miniature set with diamonds, and the words "Eterna Gratitudine" engraved on it, a cartload of magnificent dresses, and a richly jewelled picture of the King.

The Queen wished to settle £1,000 a year on Emma, but Sir William refused, fearful of what would be said of such a thing at home. The part taken by him and Nelson at the instigation of Lady Hamilton was disapproved by the Government, and he returned in 1800 and died in 1803.

After Trafalgar things went badly with Lady Hamilton. Expecting that the Government would compensate her for all she had done, she lived beyond her means, and, her creditors growing rigorous, she was thrown into the King's Bench Prison, where she remained for ten long months.

When she was released she had to flee. In 1813 she went to Calais. There she fell into the utmost distress, and on January 15, 1815, she died, ignored by the country to whom she had been left as a sacred trust.

"Trail and Trading Post"

This is the sixth volume of Edward Stratemeyer's Colonial Series. It continues the history of the Morris boys, and the quaint frontiersman, Sam Barrington, brings in White Buffalo, and clears up the mystery of the twin boys found by Barrington in a previous adventure. There is an abundance of action such as boys love, hunting, trailing, and Indian fighting, as well as travel through the woods and mountains. The period is between the two conspiracies of Pontiac, when there was nominal peace with the redmen, but when neither life nor property was safe. Mr. Stratemeyer has endeavored to be as historically correct as the exigencies of story-writing will permit, and has succeeded in giving a stirring picture of the life of early American settlers and the responsibilities which were cast, of necessity, on very young shoulders. The Morris lads, still in their early teens, were expert marksmen, experienced soldiers and hardy young Americans whose example is inspiring, and the boys who have followed their fortunes in print thus far will be glad to know that in time they became soldiers in the Revolutionary army. Stories like these make history vital and animate the dull pages of school text-books. Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

"Shorty McCabe"

Those readers that have enjoyed "Chimmie Fadden" in his variety will turn naturally to "Shorty McCabe," and probably prefer "Shorty" to the other for the ex-pugilist is clean and square all the way through, upright and honorable, and it is not through any hankering after a perch on the top of the social stepladder that he finds himself occasionally at close quarters with high society. Shorty's chronicle of his doings is given artlessly enough to an old schoolmate who has taken up the profession of story writing, and though he is assured that "nothin' ever happens to me," the fifteen chapters which are the result of the confab must have made their chronicler pray fervently for glimpses of other such uneventful existences. After leaving the ring, Shorty opened a Physical Culture Studio, and the outcome of the adventure was not only financial abundance but such little insignificant episodes as becoming joint keeper of an elephant, having a whole asylum of little girl infants and a British lord left in his keeping, buying "a pig in a poke," and discovering that "The Toreador" was a steam yacht instead of an apartment house, falling into the hands of a lot of Italian brigands, and eventually releasing an Italian princess from the clutches of the Mafia, and such tame, everyday affairs. Shorty is slangy enough but never profane. His language is picturesque and his figures of speech expressive, but his stories are clean. There is not one of the fifteen which could not be read aloud in a Sunday school convention and the humor is spontaneous and compelling. Though belonging to the same classification as "Chimmie Fadden," "Shorty McCabe" is not Chimmie with a change of clothes, but a distinct character who borrows nothing. It is a rollicking narrative which men, especially will enjoy, a cure for blues. Sewell Ford, the author, is another of the new writers whose future work cannot be predicted from his past. His first volume was "Horses Nine," followed by "Truegate of Mogador," neither of which bears the slightest resemblance to "Shorty McCabe," nor is that any indication of what his next will be. Published by Mitchell Kennerley of New York.

A Skat Manual

Devotees to card playing will find Foster's "Skat Manual" a welcome addition to their libraries. Mr. Foster has already put forth a "Whist Manual" and "Complete Bridge," both of which are accepted as authorities. Some idea of the painstaking which he has expended on the work may be gained from his deprecation, in the introduction, of the usual method of teaching card games. "The general idea of teaching a person Skat is to make him play, the one who has no cards in each deal sitting behind the beginner and giving him ten different pieces of advice about ten different things in one hand, and then ten ifs and buts in the next hand. It is worse than having all the declarations and honor valuations and leads hurled at you the first time you sit down to the bridge table." It will be surmised from this that the author has adopted a different plan of instruction and that he has some reason for his assertion that notwithstanding the German opinion, it is not impossible for English and Americans to master this game. There are some two hundred pages of explanation and elucidation, with illustrative hands for all the variations of the game, and the terms employed, as well as a history of its introduction. It would appear to be a comparatively simple matter for any one really interested to master all the intricacies by a study of this exposition of the diversion. The decorative cover and full gilt edges, together with the brilliant binding makes "Skat" worthy of a place amongst the special holiday books. Published by McClure, Phillips & Co.

A History of The Catastrophe

"The History of the Earthquake and Fire in San Francisco," which has been put forth as the joint work of Frank W. Aitken and Edward Hilton is not to be confused with the numerous booklets and pamphlets which were on sale as soon after the catastrophe as there were found printing establishments and presses to undertake the work, and which were largely made up of the personal experiences of the authors, and "human interest" stories more or less apocryphal, but which were made worth while by the excellent pictures which accompanied the somewhat insignificant letter press. This new book, for it is a real book, not merely a book form, is what its title purports it to be, a history of the events of the three days of disaster. It describes the earthquake from the scientific point of view and gives the progress of the conflagration day by day, the nature of the efforts made to stay its march, the probable reasons why they failed, and the possible precautions which might have resulted differently. I say possible and probable because there is no means of proving positively except by experiment under precisely similar conditions that the precaution which was not taken would have proved effectual, or that the condition which seemingly saved the situation in one instance was not really modified by some factor, like, perhaps, a propitious air current. In addition to the descriptions of the fire while burning, the authors have also included a discussion on its effects on different so-called fire-proof materials, and on the heavy steel and iron beams, girders and columns in buildings which were not wholly destroyed, showing the buckling of the metal, as a result of the great heat and the weight of the superimposed structures. The Appendix sums up the result of the investigations and gives a brief account of the Relief measures and the insurance situation. Illustration has been subordinated to text, yet it is almost a pity that all the pictures have not been accorded a full page. These include not only those subjects already familiar to everyone in the form of post cards, but others showing the interior of buildings, the condition of floors, supporting columns, etc., which will interest architects, builders and prospective owners of new sky scrapers. The authors have made one serious error in their topography. Hayes Valley was not "known as Happy Valley until Thomas Hayes began to exploit it." "Happy Valley," is long since forgotten by any but the Pioneers, not the Pullman Palace Pioneers, but those who made the wearisome journey by prairie schooner and sailing ship around the Horn. It was approximately at the junction of what is now Mission and Second streets and was, in its time, described as a promising suburb of Yerba Buena. Happy Valley had passed out of existence before Hayes Valley, which lay out beyond the cemetery, was thought of as a possible place of settlement. It is a minor matter which does not affect the value of the "History," but old timers are jealous of their memories. Published locally by The Edward Hilton Company.

The Paul Elder Company are offering some choice new publications as their spring production. "The Ministry of Beauty," by Stanton Davis Kirkam, a companion book to his former volume of philosophical essays, "Where Dwells the Soul Serene," will be one of the first to appear. Professor David Starr Jordan has revised the text and also the title of his "Philosophy of Despair." The second edition was lost in the fire of a year ago. The third, which will appear at once, is to be called "The Philosophy of Hope," a title which better fits the work than the former one. Another series of Janet Young's "Psychological Year Book," and a philosophical poem on Christian Science lines, "The Weaving of Life's Fabric," by Agnes Greene Foster, are also listed.

American Class Division

Many years ago Lord Macaulay predicted that the United States must come in time to just the same state of things as existed in England; that the cities would fill up and the lands become occupied, and then, he said, the division between rich and poor would establish itself on the same scale as with the people of England and become just as embarrassing. Matthew Arnold, after visiting this country in the eighties, took occasion to discuss the Macaulay prediction. He pronounced us a homogeneous people, and said that Lord Macaulay forgot that this country is without what certainly fixes and accentuates the division between rich and poor,—the distinction of classes. Arnold was most optimistic in his views of this country's future. He said that we had solved the social and political problems, but deserved no credit because when we attained our independence we had not the elements for a division into classes. At this time it is somewhat interesting to ponder the prediction of Lord Macaulay and the philosophic comments which it evoked from the learned apostle of culture. Both are of considerable significance. Macaulay based his prediction on his knowledge of the uniform experience of all nations. Arnold permitted his judgment to be influenced by what he had observed during a brief sojourn in this country, and gave no heed to the teachings of history. The difference in their views was exactly what might have been expected from men of their habits of mind. One was purely a man of letters, versed in the philosophy of religion; the other was a man of letters, versed in the philosophy of history. The latter was the better equipped for speculation on the subject of a country's future, and we see that he did not hit wide of the mark. He knew something of which Arnold was ignorant: that the elements of class distinction exist in all states; that ignorance and cupidity are the twin sources of all the torments of man; that by them turmoil and trouble have been fomented in the bosom of every state that ever existed, separating citizen from citizen, dividing society into jealous factions and leading it into a labyrinth of errors and calamities. He knew that when time and industry generate riches, complicating the relations of men, invariably do demagogues arise to stir up discontent; to stimulate the avarice of one class, to inflame the resentment of another and finally to insulate all by distrust. It was because he knew all these things that he was able to predict the present embarrassment of this country which finds expression, locally in such conditions as prevail in this city, and nationally in such a disgraceful imbroglio as that which has grown out of the efforts of the lawfully constituted authorities of a state to determine the guilt or innocence of men charged with a cowardly murder. There is a serious and embarrassing division in this country today; one that is more apparent than real but none the less portentous. It is not the result of a logical antagonism between rich and poor; for never was nation more prosperous or people more blest; industry pervades all ranks, employment fills the hands and exercises the powers even of the weakest; the poorest are not in distress, exuberance and abundance swell the furrows of every state. But with a public mind preoccupied with the love of gain there has sprung up the opposition against many of those who wish to have more money than they could get by legitimate effort. This opposition is most cunningly incited by private ambitions disguised as public motives. Under pretense of dissatisfaction with capitalistic greed that has corrupted our government and robbed the people, selfish demagogism has artfully contrived to provoke the hatred of organized labor against all employers of labor and to diffuse a spirit of cynicism and discontent and a sentiment of revolt and spite throughout the ranks of wage-earners in all departments of industry. "When the immigrant from Europe strikes root in his new home," said Matthew Arnold, "he becomes as the American." That was so in Matthew Arnold's day, but nowadays we do not assimilate the immigrant from Europe. Nowadays the immigrant from Europe is a socialistic propagandist who makes many converts among American workingmen. And to this class strong appeal is made by journals whose tone in the discussion of political and industrial question is one of preeminent unscrupulousness, journals that serve as the channels of the prejudices of their owner, of his revenges and whims; mouthpieces for the spite and ambition of a single vain mortal. A high national feeling is what we very much need, and a sentiment against the diffusion of asperity by heartless pretenders to public purity. It is time for us to learn to express our political views with moderation, candor and forbearance. It is time for us also to have an American Party, one that will know no distinctions of race, creed or birthplace, but that will stand for the constitution and for American principles of government and affirm the iniquity of such organized sentiment as may be prejudicial to the obligation of public officials to serve the whole people.

Universal Peace

According to a religious contemporary a sentiment inspired by the gospel in favor of universal disarmament is spreading over all civilized nations, and there are indications that the reign of truth and quietness will soon be ushered into the world, and that war, cruel, atrocious war, will be forever stript of its barbarous fascinations. This is a pleasant outlook, but the dictum of our religious contemporary bears something of an extravagant aspect. While there is a good deal of talk of the advisability of substituting the arbitrament of the tongue for that of the sword we see no external indications of an early realization of Isaiah's prediction: "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Within the range of our vision are not to be observed signs of an abatement of those restless elements of ambition, greed and jealousy which have so long kept the nations of the earth in a state of commotion. We believe with our religious contemporary that under the influence of Christianity the people of the earth are coming to a sense of the follies of war and its enormities, but we are inclined to the opinion that not until Christianity shall have gained an ascendancy in the world will war disappear. By the ascendancy of Christianity we do not mean the general acknowledgment of its fundamental principles as true, but rather the general absorption of the spirit of the gospel. Not till the law of love shall spread its melting and all-subduing efficacy over the children of man, not till the jealousies and preferences of a narrow, selfish patriotism be given to the wind shall war cease to be prosecuted as a trade. As yet we have far from absorbed the spirit of the gospel. We observe that there is yet much love for the poetry which lends the magic of its numbers to the narrative of blood and transports by its images of nodding plumes and successive charges; also, for the music which thrills with its martial strains; and we are conscious of the growing importance of supporting standing armies for the sole purpose of preserving peace at home, and when we contemplate these more or less significant phenomena we yield to the notion that the time is yet far distant when the gospel shall bring its virtuous and its pacifying influence to bear to induce warriors to beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks.

Anxiety Over the Future

Are we approaching the end of our resources? is the pessimistic query of some statistician who sees a sad time in store for posterity. In 1950 there will be no more iron, he says; long before that time the forests will be exhausted, and two centuries hence there will be no more coal. While there is no common sense in wasting recklessly, there is reason in the answer of the so-called curmudgeon who refused to be influenced by considerations of posterity's welfare because posterity had never done anything for him. We can very well afford to let the unborn generations look out for themselves, for if experience is a trustworthy prophet we may feel confident that by the time iron, coal, and the other contemporary essentials to comfort and happiness are exhausted posterity will have discovered satisfactory substitutes. If our ancestors of the stone age were at all concerned for our welfare they must have worried over the diminution of the supply of quartz and flint. We know with what care our immediate progenitors hoarded linen and passed household goods on from one generation to the next and even the third and fourth, never dreaming that for all ordinary uses cotton would come to be cheaper and just as serviceable. There are men and women still living who, in their childhood helped to make the fallow dips which furnished light, and who can recall the rigid economies practiced, the knitting and sewing and studying done by firelight and fat-pine torches in order to save candles. Then came the whaling industry and the crude and evil-smelling lamps, and just as the worry club began to be seriously alarmed lest the whale be exterminated and short-sixes become unavailable, there was the discovery of petroleum to relieve their anxiety. Gas followed and now we have electricity, each an improvement on the other and each little more than a dream until it was needed. Coal succeeded wood as fuel; oil is taking the place of coal, and gas and electricity are used almost as much for generating heat and power as for light. By reflecting occasionally that the world "do move," and that it doesn't appear to be moving altogether in a haphazard fashion, we shall spare ourselves a great deal of unnecessary anxiety.

Our Crack Marksmen

A new rule of the Navy Department forbids the disclosure of the scores made in gun practice, and the newspapers are loudly protesting against this secrecy. It is suggested that if, as the President says, the surest guaranty of peace is a fleet of first class battleships, that guaranty would become stronger if other nations knew that our gunners were the champion marksmen of the world. The logic of this deduction is not to be disputed. But the purpose of a fleet of battleships is not merely to scare other nations. We know that nations unequally matched have often made war upon each other; that inferiority of equipment is not alone sufficient to deter a nation from going to war. As a matter of fact it is pretty generally known that our gunners are the best marksmen in the world. That should be sufficient to inspire foreign powers with a proper degree of respect and to restrain them from rushing into trouble. It would not be wise for our gunners to constitute themselves pace-makers for the gunners of other navies. Nor would it be to our advantage to incite foreign gunners to reach the highest possible degree of skill. Therefore we should assuage our curiosity respecting the recent exploits of the gunners of the Atlantic fleet at the Guantanamo range, and persuade ourselves that the secrecy enjoined by our Navy Department is dictated by sound judgment. Suffice it for us to know that Rear Admiral Evans is jubilant over the scores that were made at Guantanamo. The only news that has been given out is that the least improvement by any ship was seventeen per cent. compared with the last year's totals, and that on one ship the improvement was one hundred per cent., although five feet had been cut from the top of the target, which previously had been seventeen feet high by twenty-one feet wide. The range was two thousand yards, and the firing was done as each steamed by at a speed of ten knots. We know that the battleship Illinois carried off the honors, and that officers stationed at Washington assert: "There is no navy in the world that, ship for ship, can shoot as straight and as fast as the American navy." What more ought we to know?

Purification of the N. S. G. W.

Considering that the Native Sons is a society theoretically dissociated from politics, it is strange that the first act of its history to commend it warmly to that great body of Californians who have never felt entire sympathy with the purpose of its organization should be the preparatory step toward expelling men who have used their membership for the furtherance of their unscrupulous political ambitions. This of course is a tacit admission that politics has hitherto been excluded only from the constitution and by-laws of the society and not from its Grand Parlors or indeed from any of the lodge rooms where its ordinary sessions are held. That being the case it might be argued that the predominant purpose of its existence—the drawing together of men who were born in the same state and who find that not very significant fact a tie transcending politics, creed or descent—has so far entirely failed. It would seem that in their desire to wield power in municipal and state affairs numerous men have entered the order and have hoodwinked the guileless into believing that only motives of fraternity have actuated their interest in its progress. These deductions, it may be added, are not so subtle, so far beyond the ken of the ordinary intelligence that they have remained unstated up to present time. Far from it. The action which the delegates to the Grand Parlor at Napa considered necessary has only made these propositions a little more obvious than they were before; also, be it said, a little less controvertible by members of the Native Sons, for that characteristic unreasoning esprit de corps which is one of the most obtrusive outgrowths of secret societies and which is not infrequently so irritating to outsiders, has always prevented the acknowledgment by any Native Son of the fact that politics entered into the councils of his order, that men joined it for purely political reasons and left it when it could serve their political purposes no longer and that political considerations exercised a governing influence on the election of its officers. These things have been known, but never until the Grand Parlor made open confession of them have they been even tacitly admitted by the men whom they particularly concerned. Now that frank concession has been made to the rectilinear vision which sees things as they actually are and not as dreamers would have them or as fools imagine them to be, the Native Sons' order may begin to command more respect from the uninitiate who can only judge of its merits from outward manifestations. Under the newly elected regime there is no doubt that great progress may be made toward that rather ideal goal which hitherto the order has pretended to attain without difficulty. Let politics and the politicians be kicked out at one and the same time and let them both be kept out; then the Native Sons will justify the purposes for which it was founded, something which hitherto it certainly has never done.

One Optimistic Doctor

When members of the medical profession find time to indulge in generalizations anent the matters of life and death wherewith they are concerned, their voices are usually raised in accents of the most depressing pessimism. Their studies seem to supply an inexhaustible fund of theories that startle and paradoxes that surprise and nearly always their pronouncements are as discomfiting as their medicines are unpalatable. What could have been more cynical than the implication that lay in the background of Doctor Osler's unfortunate joke at the expense of old men? The medical journals fairly bristle with thorns that not only prick but poison the credulous lay person who is simple enough to consider them overseriously. One physician announces that the toothbrush is a deadly instrument wherein lie ambushed millions of microbes. Another brings his microscope into focus on the American whisker in its wonderful variety and discovers such danger there that he insists man must go clean-shaven. Still another asseverates gravely that sunlight is bad for the health, especially of blondes, and pictures the towheads, the flaxenpolls and the "bricktops" dying off by scores under the fierce glow of a vertical sun. Every week brings another and more bewildering crop of these unhappy medical pronunciamentos. Bizarre in the extreme, aimed at our most cherished traditions, these pessimistic teachings are apt to breed great uneasiness with the unthinking vulgar while they force the thoughtful to speculate why it is that the profession which prides itself on the conservatism of its practice becomes so radical when it falls a-theorizing. But here as everywhere else there are happy exceptions. After Dr. G. Frank Lydston, looked upon as an expert in the difficult study of degeneracy, has gloomed our whole mental outlook by his dark declaration that America is turning out decadents at a rate that will one day stagger the world, it is pleasant to turn to Dr. W. J. McGee of the St. Louis Museum who holds stoutly to quite a contrary theory of the future of our race. The world, thinks Dr. McGee, is growing better, not worse and America in particular is undergoing a racial improvement that will continue for many, many years. Dr. McGee will not hear of race suicide; he says that America is obeying an immutable law which makes the number of offspring decrease with the increase of the average length of life. One hundred years ago, he says, the average length of life in this country was twenty-five years; now it is twenty-nine. And not only are we improving in this matter of longevity but in other qualities also. Owing to the continued blending of types, this refreshing optimist promises that the American of tomorrow will be taller, stronger, more intellectual and more humanitarian than the American of today. 'Tis a consummation devoutly to be wished, especially in those items of intellect and humanity, qualities wherein our vaunt is not altogether justified just yet by our endowment. If only because he breaks the almost universal gloom that covers like an undertaker's pall the world that the doctors look out upon when they pen their dicta of woeful prognostication, Dr. McGee is welcome to continue his optimistic forecasting of our future. When a profession admits of such diversity of theories it would be folly to accept any that do not gibe with our constitutional antipathy for pessimism and unhealthy brooding.

local newspapers for all that they have accomplished in the revivification of the dying spark of municipal patriotism, but at the same time let us not forbear to blame when the decent boundary is passed, when enterprise is transformed to impropriety and feelings deserving of respect are violated to make the sensation of the flying moment. At such times the mind revolts at the long reaches of mistaken newspaper alterness, and intellectual nausea intervenes to turn us from sympathy with the thing that was intended to command our approbation. Just such a condition has been engendered by the too insistent dwelling of our newspapers on the ugly story of attempted criminal assault now before the courts of this city. In their frenzied efforts to intrigue attention the local dailies have passed the by no means exacting limit of reticence set by usage for the treatment of such incidents and have served up the repellant affair day after day with more and more intimate relations of its most unsavory details. Consideration, either for the unfortunate young woman or for those newspaper readers whose turn of mind disinclines them from curiosity about police court nastiness, has been completely swallowed up in the gaping maw of sensationalism. Newspapers are not wont at any time to reckon more than casually with any personality other than that of what they term the "average reader"; and judging from the treatment of the crime in question the "average reader" is a person with a macaberesque passion for horrors and an inhuman indifference to the means by which it is glutted.

Perspective Impressions

Seeing that the way to perfection is through a series of disgusts, who can doubt but that San Francisco is on the high road to municipal perfection?

According to the testimony of Mrs. P. H. McCarthy there was not a weapon in the house. In other words McCarthy was speechless.

However much one may agree with the opinion that the social evil is a necessary one, to be suffered for the sake of our wives and daughters, one cannot, I fancy, but hold with Captain Mooney that the scarlet clothed servants of the public good must be taught to keep their place.

William J. Bryan's inextinguishable childlike faith in his own destiny is not entirely without justification. It has enabled Mr. Bryan to figure as a distinguished banquet guest year in and year out from one decade to another, hearing himself addressed the while as "The peerless leader of the Democracy."

An old saw re-set: As the bud is grafted, so is the twig inclined.

In Alameda the other night members of the Milk Wagon Drivers' Association raided wagons that were driven by their owners and dumped the milk into the street. Why should owners be permitted to drive their own wagons when drivers are on a strike? That sort of thing must be discouraged, for it might lead to bloodshed, since American workmen are not likely to permit any such bold infringement of their rights.

The arbiters of the elegancies of club life in San Jose are trying to solve the question, Does the inadvertent dealing of an extra card to a gentleman by himself in a game of pedro afford the loser sufficient pretext to welch? This question is one of many subtleties, not the least of which is of a purely psychological nature. It may not be amiss to suggest that the welcher who doesn't make up his mind to welch until after spending two or three days in meditating on his losses is not a sound judge of pretexts.

The San Francisco That Was

By Harry Cowell

Of San Francisco, the Greater, so-called, not a word from me now. She is too near for me to see, too new for me to know, too real for my matter-of-fancy pen to depict. My San Francisco is no longer here. She has gone hence, and is no more seen, save of the mind's eye. She is a dream that vanished abruptly one dawn a year ago; and in a little while her innumerable haunting headstone will likewise be but a memory.

Strangely sad and disconcerting—to me, at least—such monuments of her as still remain to us; and the familiar names of the unfamiliar streets are a noise in the ears, a mist in the eyes, and a mockery in the heart.

Vain talk of rebuilding her. Scarcely more rebuildable than Babylon, my San Francisco, she whose pavements, by I know not what magic of theirs, took at a touch the fever out of feet troubled of the wander-lust while yet cradled and quite incapable of any the least wandering whatever.

Nothing short of a miracle it was that the city of St. Francis (by his intercession, was it?) wrought for me now nearly twenty long years since. That evening I saw for the first time the sun go westward by way of the Golden Gate, and for the first time in my life I watched him out of sight with no will to follow him. Doubtless, beyond the horizon were cities fair to look upon, many of them, each worth any man's journeying thither to see; but now, strangely enough, I was ready to take the word of travelers in the matter of their several perfections. Before the day of my falling in with my San Francisco, it was far otherwise with me. What beauty there was anywhere in the world I must needs see for myself. To see it with the eyes of others would not suffice me. I must from city beautiful to city beautiful.

Why did I love her so well, the San Francisco that was? How came she, who herself had so little of it, to teach me love of domesticity? I know not. 'Tis with cities as with women. We men love them, in the main, for their femininity, which is synonymous neither with beauty nor virtue. We love them most when we least know why we love them. There are but few reasonable friendships, no reasonable loves. Enough to say that I did not love the San Francisco that is dust and ashes because I deemed her beautiful and love-worthy above all the cities of earth. I loved her, no doubt, because she was so much a woman; so fond of frills and furbelows, and the infinities; so enamored of virtue, so addicted to vice. Like Paris is, my San Francisco was the very personification of the eternal womanly; so much so that even strangers, whom she had housed awhile, returned each to his own home city, fell sick of that strange malady, nostalgia, and died, not a few of them, of broken hearts. This only I do know, that I loved her well, the San Francisco that was, for all that I knew her to be but a daughter of joy, with the maidenly dream still left her, to be at one and the same time her purgatory and her peace; loved her, looking the while unmoved upon that beauteous virgin of the upper classes, Berkeley, and that immaculate milkmaid, Alameda, upon Oakland, that flat-chested femme honnete of uncertain age, and all the reputable rest.

Over me, from first to last, the San Francisco that was exercised a charm indefinable as that of a woman in a dream, and as irresistible. I had for her what is termed by one's irreproachable relatives an infatuation. Her unworth was not unknown to me. Good people, with my welfare at heart, were at no small pains to point it out; and the result, be sure, was immediate and natural. That so inexplicable fascination which sin in the abstract has for imaginative youth, be it never so pure, was hers in memorable degree. Her Chinatown had witcheries all its own, not to be met with elsewhere; no, not in the Orient itself. The glamor of the days of gold hung over her like a glittering mist. Matter-of-fact she was, and not unmodern; but a tinge of the fabulous, a touch of the olden romance, remained to the end, to make colorful the dun things of her existence; ideal, the everyday.

Seen from the far withdrawn, disinterested point of view of art, she was fascinating in the extreme, was my San Francisco; not so much by reason of her beauty, great as was that, as because, from the nearer, more immediately concerned point of view of morals, she was a Magdalene, loving all manner of men, come from no matter what incredible clime; and not wholly for gain's sake either; a Magdalene quite capable of the adorable extravagance of spending her very costly nard upon the head of the once-come Christ, to the utter disregard of the poor, whom we have with us always; of kissing his dusty feet with her very costly lips; of washing them with her tears, drying them with her hair. Yes, the San Francisco that was could bow her head to kiss Good upon the feet, and lift it to kiss Evil upon the mouth; and yet, in that she loved much, one must needs forgive her her sins, which were many. Lukewarm, so as to give Heaven mal de coeur, she never was. Every now and then there was joy in the presence of the angels of God over her so picturesque repentances, and anon, renewed weeping over her so scarlet sins. Who lost their souls because of her blest her as they went hellward. Many a model citizen of New York, or other of the ninety and nine just places which need no repentance, has died with her name on his lips, her lover again in the lucid moment before the endless dark. There was in her beauty that un-earthliness which gives birth to legend. In days to come they will tell how she sat, a siren, on rocks of crystal by a gate of gold, and how mariners from everywhere and nowhere yielded to the sweet of her singing, and found death by drowning not unpleasant.

Such moving atmosphere as old world cities have—places like Paris where artists are wont to foregather—was hers by some special grace of God. Not possibly could Bret Harte's brief sojourn within her gates have done much toward the making of it; nor yet Stevenson's briefer. No, she had it, a gift from on high, or if she had it not, then her lovers endowed her with it, as is the way of lovers. She lacked nothing of having a Quartier Latin to rival that of Paris, save a real live

San Francisco's First Masonic Funeral

By James Linen

Prefatory Note.—With the destruction by fire of many libraries and the almost total effacement of reminders of the past arose a sentimental demand for the works of California authors and for books printed in the long ago dealing with subjects of local interest. To respond to this demand dealers in second-hand books have conducted their quest in the East and in Europe and have come into possession of many rare and some curious volumes. Among the latter is "The Poetry and Prose of James Linen," printed in this city by A. Roman & Co. in 1865 and dedicated to the author's friend, William Cullen Bryant. From this volume, which contains nothing of literary value, but much that is of quaint historical interest the following article is excerpted.—Editor T. T.

In the contemplative hour of retirement, how many thrilling reminiscences of the past crowd upon the memory! Some of them are of a pleasing and others of a peculiarly painful character. The year 1849 will ever be a memorable epoch in the history of California. The commercial and gold-seeking adventurers "met on the level" in those days. There were no granite buildings to trade in, nor were there splendid palaces to live in, such as now adorn the surrounding hills of San Francisco. Thousands of people, who had been long accustomed to all the refinement and luxuries of Eastern life, had to doff their fine linen and put on the red shirt of the hardy miner. Pride was unknown for a time. Gentlemen had to stoop from their dignity and awkwardly wash their own clothes. They had to kindle their own fires and do the menial work of a cuisinier. Some reposed at night in a canvas tent, while others closed their eyes in sleep among the sand hills, with no covering but the canopy of heaven—

"Bespangled with those isles of light,
So wildly, spiritually bright."

Exposure and disease rapidly peopled the kingdom of death. The Ayuntamiento had not yet set apart any ground for burial purposes. The consequence was that many were rudely buried in the suburbs, and were afterwards removed to Yerba Buena Cemetery, where the remains of eight hundred lie huddled together in one immense, dismal grave. There is not even a common board to mark out the remarkable pit in which sleep so many unfortunate pioneers of Upper California. In those eventful times men were found dead and no one could tell whence they came. They passed away to their graves unhonored and unknown. Distant friends and relations were never informed of their fate. Anxious parents in foreign climes still cherish the hope that their sons are yet in the land of the living, and may return to the domestic roof. Vain hope! Their eyes are sealed in death, and the grave has closed over them forever!

The Fraternity of "the mystic tie" had not yet organized their legal information, which craftsmen only know and properly understand. A wonderful instance of Masonic identity occurred in the month of August, 1849. A much respected citizen and Mason was quietly wending his way up Happy Valley, very early in the morning, when he beheld the corpse of a man stretched upon the pebbly beach. All was soft and still. The strangely mingled population of the tented city was wrapped in deep repose. The mists still lingered on the suburban hills, and the morning star shone clear in the sky. The waters of the bay were smooth and calm, and gently laved the feet of the stranger who "slept the sleep that knows no waking." The great Disposer of human events, in His inscrutable providence, seemingly had determined that the tide should bear his lifeless body to the shore, where, discovered by a passing brother, it would assuredly be carried to the grave in becoming solemnity, and deposited therein with all the honors and ceremonial rites of the Ancient Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons.

"There's a Divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them as we may."

Some of the inmates of the neighboring tents were roused from their slumbers and speedily repaired to the spot. The Alcalde was immediately sent for. He promptly attended, and acted as coroner. The body was removed to a tent, where it was carefully scrutinized. No indications of violence were visible. The man had evidently been drowned. His face was manly and intellectual. His hair was long and curly, and of a dark auburn hue. He was neatly dressed, and had a superior air of respectability. The jacket and pants on his person were blue pilot cloth, and a black silk handkerchief was tied in a sailor's knot around his neck. There was nothing found in his pockets that could possibly lead to his identity. However, in removing the flannel from his bosom, a silver mark of a Mark Master was discovered, upon which were engraved the initials of his name. A little further investigation revealed to the beholders the most outre exhibition of Masonic emblems that were ever drawn by the ingenuity of man on the human skin. There is nothing in the history or traditions of Free Masonry equal to it. Beautifully dotted on his left arm with red and blue ink, which time could not efface, appeared all the emblems of the Entered Apprentice. There was the Holy Bible, the Square and Compass, the twenty-four inch Gauge, and the common Gavel. There were also the Mosaic pavement representing the ground floor of King Solomon's Temple, the indented Tressel which surrounds it, and the Blazing Star in the centre. On his right arm, and artistically executed in the same indelible liquids, were the emblems appertaining to the Fellow Craft degree, viz.: the Plumb, the Square, and the Level. There were also five columns, representing the five orders of architecture—the Tuscan, Doric, Ionic, Corinthian, and Composite.

The Shadow of Good Fortune

(A Servian Superstition)

By Nellie K. Blissett

I.

The woman sat by the bed, a figure of beautiful despair, with her long black hair streaming over her shoulders, and her head bent. Her hand held the burning fingers of little Sava, as he tossed about in uneasy sleep, broken by cries of pain, or terror; the shrill, complaining voice went to her heart. She did not understand all he said, and her very failure to comprehend those half-delirious words hurt her as nothing else in her short, hard life had done. It seemed to her that the one thing which fate had left her was escaping from her grasp into a land into which she could not follow it. Again and again came the cry she could not understand—the start of terror which puzzled her.

"Oh, mother, make them give it back—they have stolen it—they have put it in the ground! Oh, mother, I want it so—make them give it back to me! The boys laugh at me—do not let them laugh any more. I want it back—I want it back!"

"Sava, my darling, what have they stolen—what is it that you want?" But he did not seem to hear her voice, or to understand what she said. Still the little figure tossed to-and-fro under the shabby carpet coverlet which she vainly tried to keep over it; still the fretful cry rang in her ears. Since sunrise she had sat there by the bed, motionless, terror-stricken; it was sunset when the door opened, and Madame Nikolich thrust her grizzled black head into the darkening room.

"The boy is sick, Militsa—eh?"

She looked up, with a gesture almost of relief, though Madame Nikolich was no friend of hers, but merely a very worldly landlady with a very sharp eye fixed upon the not always rosy possibilities of rent.

"Oh, he is very sick—I do not know what to do for him!"

Madame Nikolich came forward and stood at the foot of the bed, looking down not unkindly on the small, restless figure.

"Yes, he is certainly very sick. I will tell you what is the matter with him, Militsa. My Mika has just been talking about it. He says the workmen at the big house round the corner caught Sava two days ago and made him stand in the sunshine while they built his shadow into the foundations—you know, it brings a house goodfortune when a living shadow is caught and built into it. But the person who has lost the shadow very often dies—so many people have told me that." Militsa shrank nearer to the bed. Sava lifted his ruffled curls from the pillow, and raised once more that beseeching cry.

"They have stolen it and put it in the ground. Oh, give it back to me—give it back!"

Militsa shivered; Anna Nikolich nodded in dismal triumph.

"There—do you hear what he says? That is what I told you—they have stolen his shadow, and put it into Bora Jovanovich's fine new house. It will bring Bora Jovanovich good fortune, no doubt, but I think you will lose the child."

Militsa turned upon the other woman like a tempest, with a swift, passionate, protective movement towards Sava.

"No—no—not that!" she said. "He is all I have—there is nothing else in the world for me. I will not lose him—I cannot."

Anna Nikolich turned towards the door. When she reached it, she paused for a moment, and looked back.

"I will send Mika up with some supper for you," she said; "and—and the rent may stand over for this week."

Militsa sank down beside the bed without a word of gratitude. The other's kindness struck her like a curse—if Anna Nikolich could be generous, Sava must indeed be far gone.

The darkness came down upon the miserable little room; Mika, shy and solemn-eyed, brought the supper Militsa could not eat, and went away again. Still she crouched by the bed; still the child's restless cry went on.

"Oh, give it back—make them give it back to me!"

She rose suddenly, and bent over the child for a moment.

"Sava, you shall have it back if you will lie quite still until—I bring it to you. Do you hear me—do you understand? You shall have it if you will lie still, and go to sleep."

For the first time that day her voice seemed to reach him. His great black eyes rested with a look of comprehension on her face as she bent, lamp in hand, over the bed.

"You will bring it back?" he murmured sleepily, and sank back almost contentedly upon the pillow.

As she stole down the narrow stairs, for the first time that day the restless cry was still.

A Threatened Visitation

Once more is the rumor current of the contemplated descent of General Otis of Los Angeles upon San Francisco with all the vast equipage of his trade; not the trade in which he won the trophies that adorn the walls of his home and that attest his glorious triumphs in the imminent deadly breach and the shock of arms, but the more gentle trade which engages his peaceful, philosophic moments, and the conquests of which are hardly less distinguished than those by which he enrolled himself among his country's heroes. For General Otis is a hero in journalism as well as in war. And whether armed with pen or bayonet he is equally to be dreaded by the foe. The greatest fighter is he who chooses the right with invincible resolution, and General Otis has established a reputation for doing that very thing. Indeed he has made a great financial success of doing it, and his paper, the Times, is perhaps the most influential daily paper in California. Much of its success may be ascribed to the attitude of its proprietor toward labor unions. Otis has never truckled to organized labor after the fashion of the more timid and strategic newspaper proprietors of San Francisco.

His Attitude Toward Labor

A journalist of the capitalistic class he is true to his own sentiments and has never been converted to the expediency of sophisticating the truth in the interest of the forces of unrest. He professes sympathy for workmen but has never vindicated it by showing a willingness to justify their conduct to whatever extent they might be led in their aggressions by intemperate bosses. Nay, he has persistently refused to approve some of the principles by which labor unions justify their troublesome practices. For example, while he does not challenge the right of union men to go on a strike, neither does he hold up to obloquy non-union American citizens who take the places that have been vacated. In short General Otis objects to any distinction being drawn between union and non-union men. Such is the obliquity of his vision that he holds the Constitution of his country to be more deserving of reverence and allegiance than the by-laws of McCarthy's Building Trades' Council, an opinion that in these days of the apotheosis of the walking delegate savors most pungently of rank and offensive heterodoxy. But General Otis has been so successful in grafting his ideas on the benighted public sentiment of Los Angeles that prejudices against strikes abound in the community and organized labor in that city is far less arrogant and aggressive than in San Francisco. And many citizens of Los Angeles who are given to reflection and to study of conditions in San Francisco have formed the opinion that their great militant journalist is entitled to much respect and admiration. Moreover they believe that what San Francisco needs more than anything else is an Otis. Whenever they hear anybody from San Francisco bewailing the tyranny of labor and lamenting the sad plight of the city they recommend Otis as though he were an infallible balsam. And that is why the report gets into circulation every little while that Otis is coming to do the Moses stunt. The latest report is to the effect that he has been urged by some prominent citizens of this city to start a paper here and that they have agreed to give him financial support. It is also rumored that he has ordered a press shipped to San Francisco.

They May Be After Him

Though a very puerile and shallow conspiracy that which is said to have had for its object the abatement by shanghaiing or some kindred process of the Hon. Pin Head McCarthy, it was nevertheless pregnant with suggestion of a most sinister character. It miscarried because of the appalling awkwardness of the conspirators, but they have pointed the way to a consummation the desirability of which is not to be questioned. McCarthy cannot always count on the stupidity and ineptitude of his enemies. He is persona non grata with persons in all walks of life, many of whom doubtless feel that the motive of the conspiracy was adapted to the needs of this McCarthy-ridden city. Eager to supply a pretext for a day of general rejoicing and thanksgiving, some of these men, who perhaps may be more ingenious than those who failed, may take it into their heads to render the boss of the Building Trades innocuous. From now on McCarthy must shudder at the prospect. He is conscious of the prevalence in labor and other circles of the opinion that he might advantageously be dispensed with. He knows that he is taxed with a large share of the current infernality appertaining to industrial conditions, and he will feel that he should be constantly on the qui vive for a conspirator intent upon performing a great public service. In view of this highly charged situation I wish to go on record as affirming that the shanghaiing of McCarthy would be as great a crime in the eyes of the law as the shanghaiing of Mayor Schmitz. While realizing that misguided men conceiving themselves to be animated by the best of motives might enter into a conspiracy against the personal liberty of the McCarthy I cannot but reprobate so manifestly an unlawful design. At the same time I feel that sooner or later, by some means or other, industrial affairs must be rid of the pestiferous labor agitators, and the property owners and peace loving and industrial citizens, who constitute an enormous majority of the population, must be assured that their enterprises can go on in safety and without danger of interruption. But the accomplishment of these blessings should not depend upon the skill of men of the character of those charged with having conspired against McCarthy. A matter that so vitally concerns the whole community should receive the attention of all patriotic citizens.

The Case of McDougald

Far be it from me to lift my voice in reproachful protest at the ways of the honorable gentlemen who are engaged in the herculean task of spring cleaning in the Augean Stables of this metropolis, but I would induce them to pause if that were possible, in their extraordinarily beneficent labors, to consider the case of poor, unhappy John McDougald. It is a case, in my imperfect judgment, that calls for compassion and charity rather than for the scales and the knife and the pound of flesh. To me it seems a most curious perversion of justice to pursue unrelentingly the pathetic victim of the corrupt political powers that have governed this city for some years, especially at a time when immunity is being so generously distributed for the benefit of faithless public officials. McDougald was distinguished for his honesty during his four years in public office. A poor mechanic, elevated to a political position of great responsibility, he discharged his trust faithfully, and his conduct was so conspicuous in contrast with that of his associates that a strong sentiment developed in favor of making him the leader of an opposition to Mayor Schmitz. This threatened opposition gave Schmitz and Ruef considerable uneasiness, and a conspiracy was entered into for the purpose of subjecting McDougald to humiliation and ridicule. The man employed to execute the plans for the undoing of McDougald was the Hon. Pin Head McCarthy, a faithful henchman of Schmitz and Ruef, whose efforts were attended with great success. McCarthy was not the only person to bring misfortune to McDougald. The latter was one of the victims of Tax Collector Smith who fraudulently obtained fifteen thousand dollars from McDougald's office. The loss of that money was a severe blow to McDougald. The sum stolen was considerably more than he had contrived to save out of his official salary, but friends came to his rescue and made up the deficiency enabling him to settle with the city in full. He finished his term without a cent in his pocket and in debt to his friends, but with the sympathy of all that knew him. During his official career he paid out, under an Act of the Legislature, commissions for the collection of inheritance taxes, and as it is now alleged that the Act is unconstitutional he is to be sued for the money paid to his attorney. By employing the very mildest of characterizations it might be said to be a most unedifying anomaly that which is presented by the noble instruments of justice granting immunity to the crooked supervisors whose pockets are bulging with bribe-money and pursuing honest John McDougald with unrelenting zeal as if resolved to punish him for his imbecility in exercising too scrupulous a vigilance over the city's money bags.

The Vulgar Drama at Stanford

Is there no way to open the mind of Stanford University to the fact that this is the twentieth century? Such opening to me doth seem a consummation worthy of the best efforts of the zealous friends of that obviously archaic institution. If zealous friends will not take up the task then the State should give it some attention. It is a matter that vitally concerns the State, for Stanford University is a California institution and it should not be permitted to become a reproach. Enjoying as it does certain exemptions from the operation of the tax laws it is in a measure obligated to the State, and when it perverts the cause of education it should be called to account. As was said in these columns last week there is always something happening at Stanford to bring it into ridicule. These happenings are growing monotonous. Scarcely had the echoes died away of the Puritanical eruption caused by the publication of a poem dealing with one of David's sins when the announcement was made that the senior class was preparing for the production of Dion Boucicault's "London Assurance." Now this is a frank but nevertheless discreditable confession of the debased character of the literary ideals of the Palo Alto University. Boucicault was a dramatist whose writings were of a most mischievous consequence to the public inasmuch as he catered to a low and vulgar taste. He was not a man of literary ability. He wrote crazy-quilt plays made up of scraps culled from works that he had read. In "London Assurance" there is a little of Goldsmith, a little of Sheridan, a little of Terence and a little of Plautus which had reached him by way of Moliere. A fair sample of his skill in developing character is found in the speech of a girl in "London Assurance" who had been brought up in the wilds and who replies to the first compliment paid her: "It strikes me, sir, that you are a stray bee from the hive of fashion. If so reserve your honey for its proper cell. A truce to compliments." The play trips from vulgarity to vulgarity, from absurdity to absurdity, its principal incidents being a melodramatic abduction, a comic duel, and a silly marriage all in the most implausible sequence. Were Stanford as abundantly supplied with dramatic critics as with guardians of students' morals Boucicault, the parent of the crack-brained drama, would never have been summoned from what should be his eternal resting place to revive for student consumption the extravagant claptraps with which he contrived for years to entertain an illiterate public. Boucicault flourished in England in the days when literature scorned to assume the dramatic form; and since then education has done much for public taste. Between the highest art effects of the Greek festivals and the drama of Shakespeare the difference is not much greater than between the potboilers of Boucicault and the plays that today appeal to people of cultivated discernment. If the Puritanism of Stanford is afraid to meddle with the strongest specimens of the new drama it ought to have no scruples against taking a hint from Berkeley respecting the best versions of the old classics. In those old classics are to be found the fundamental laws of construction which will probably remain in force for all time, and though Boucicault heeded them, it should be remembered that there is constant development of artistic means of producing effects, and what is more that there is constant improvement in our notion of the beautiful. It were interesting to know whether in the Department of English Literature at Stanford the novels of Laura Jean Libbey are mixed in equal parts with the plays of Dion Boucicault to serve as the staple of mental pabulum for the students.

A Victory For Anderson

Governor Gillett has succeeded in rendering the State Board of Medical Examiners almost entirely harmless. He has appointed to the Board men from distant parts of the State and has not appointed a single resident of this city. Heretofore most of the members were San Francisco physicians and it was not inconvenient for them to get together and conduct their examinations and investigations. An office was maintained here, an attorney and detectives were employed, and there was vigorous prosecution of quacks and of medical colleges that turned out doctors while you wait. As a consequence the doctors of the state board excited a great deal of hostility. They were nearly always at war with the College of Physicians and Surgeons and they gave Dr. Winslow Anderson of that institution many a bad quarter of an hour. Dr. Anderson is better than a raw hand in the game of politics, and it would not surprise me to learn that he is in the confidence of Governor Gillett and that he pointed the way of making the State Board of Medical Examiners more ornamental than useful. At any rate Dr. Anderson must have been highly pleased at the removal of Dr. Dudley Tait from office, for Dr. Tait has always been very suspicious of graduates of the College of Physicians and Surgeons.

Some Tart Criticism

Dr. Anderson, however, was not the only person interested in seeing our State Medical Examiners rendered harmless. The scientific gents who have been sitting up aloft guarding the medical fraternity from an influx of quacks, have in consequence of their methods and their great zeal occasioned a deal of bitterly hostile criticism. They have been censured especially for conducting their examinations in a way to make it almost impossible for a physician from another state to hang out a shingle in California. One of the disgruntled, a German physician, recently voiced the sentiments of the critics in a letter to a German paper in which he questioned the honesty of the examiners. He said there was graft in the medical profession as well as in the politics of San Francisco. "This sovereign state," he says, "acknowledges neither a testimonial of the best universities nor years of long and successful practice as a proof of ability. This exclusive point of view is absurd on the face of it because the colleges of this state do not stand at the head of wisdom, nor have the Native Sons a patent on intelligence. We have here an example of the same stupid, local patriotism as it existed in the small German States years ago and which was the cause of American censure. Nevertheless, one could make allowances for such an examination, if the reason for it were really to prove the ability of the applicants, and to bar out incompetent people, but that is not the idea. The real object is to keep the high class physicians out of the state as their presence might represent competition to the local practitioners. The examination is merely theoretical; merely a memory test; and has reference to things which are of no practical value—things which one has long forgotten, or perhaps has never known."

Calls Them Extortioners

This German physician discusses in detail the nature of the tests to which physicians are subjected when they apply for a license to practice in California, and points out the absurdity of them. "Were not the results so serious for those who fail in the examination," he says, "the whole thing would be highly amusing. A thing of that sort could not take place in pedantic Germany; the examination of Hieronymous Jobs cannot be compared with it. One of my partners in woe was a specialist in a New York hospital,—and had directed an institute of his own. He failed in the examination the second time. The most renowned oculist in Europe could not pass the examination without first going over a-b-c studies and filling his mind with useless stuff which one does well to forget as soon as possible. In this way the business is monopolized by the members of the faculties, as the young people fresh from the college who can pass the examination are not to be feared as competitors for some time to come. If the proper answering of such questions were necessary to successful practice all physicians would have to be re-examined every ten years and ninety-nine per cent. should have their license taken from them. I have a diploma of a German university to which the local colleges cannot measure; have practiced in St. Louis; was a physician in a hospital; and for years surgeon for a large mining company in Mexico where I had to attend alone to the many severe injuries. I think I can, without hesitation, point to my success as proof of my ability. I thought that this knowledge achieved through practice together with studies of the newest literature was the best guarantee which I could offer to those who entrusted their life and health to me, but the examination has taught me that California thinks otherwise. All that which seemed essential to me does not count here; it is of no avail to know how to bandage wounds; to set broken bones; to treat displacements; the important thing is rather to know how much alcohol is in whiskey; where asafoetida comes from, and so on. * * * Should a colleague of mine make up his mind to settle in this free state I would advise him to first see certain members of the Board of Examiners, but in the right way taught by the city government. If any one has in his possession a medical encyclopedia and reads the examinations two hours before the examination, he can answer them all, even if he has never stepped inside of a college. If a parrot had sufficient memory he could repeat the questions and answers. Instead of Medical Board of Examiners it would be more fitting to say Board of Medical Extortioners."

The Profits of Big Hotels

A group of full waisted, contented hotel guests were lounging in the heavy, red-plushed easy chairs of the Fairmont and discussing the recent lease of that hostelry by the Palace Hotel Company. "Yes," broke in a big, bronzed Nevadan, carefully flicking the ashes from his Havana. "This looks like a splendid proposition in profits, but the splendor in profits is simply comparative after all. The Palace Hotel cleared $480,000 the year before the fire. It looks big and sounds better. 'Nigh half a million profit! Alluring isn't it; but remember the company had a nice pile of capital invested in their great caravansary. Then the chances one takes in hotel management are enormous. If things go wrong you lose money faster than in carrying a galaxy of high salaried sopranos and tenors in a ragged opera season. Then come sleepless nights and cold sweats lest your capital is on the financial quicksands. Take Senator Nixon sitting over there. He's in many a good thing up in Nevada but he has to do a deal of scheming and maneuvering to keep the percentage of profit climbing; so does Billy Booth of Tonopah, sitting near him.

Gold Mines in Saloons

"Their schemes, like the Fairmont and the Palace, may be made to pay well on the investments but they're all puny babies in their line when it comes to the cold cash returns regularly and profusely ground out by a fairly well patronized Goldfield saloon. I suppose if the Palace people get 10 per cent. per year on their investment they'll feel they've made the hotel coup of the decade. As I said before, profits are comparative after all. A second rate saloon proprietor in Goldfield who doesn't net 10 per cent. per month profit would begin to figure on his own probable insolvency. I happened to be in the Great Northern saloon, last week, when the owners, Tex Ricard, Ed Highley, Billy Hoig and Ray Holbrook were going over the figures with a view to declaring the monthly dividend—monthly dividend, mind you. The net winnings from the gambling tables for the month totaled $30,431 and the bar profits yielded $15,029, a total of $45,460. They claim to have invested $100,000 in the business, but a big part of it is still to be paid in. But even on this sum they declare a dividend of forty per cent. for the month. You see their $100,000, even on such a dividend, more than quadruples itself every year. I laughed when I saw the figures and said joshingly to Tex: 'Is a measely little forty per cent. a month all you can squeeze out of this shack?' 'Oh,' said Tex, without the slightest embarrassment of riches. 'Times were dead in Goldfield last month. We had the labor lockout, half the people left town and there was nothing doing. Now that the labor troubles are over and business is opening up again we'll add another bar, put in a few more card tables and run up the profits a bit.' 'How much?' I hazarded, curiously. 'Oh,' he said, 'we ought to get something over fifty per cent. a month all right.' The Palace people, as I said, have got a splendid thing here, as hotels go, but I leave it to you, gentlemen, aren't profits simply comparative after all?"

Professor Guthrie, Poet

California abounds in poets—products of the soil—who have sung their way to fame despite the present indifference of the world to the charms of rhyme. With the native poet and the characteristics of his verse the local lover of the music of language is familiar, but with Professor William Norman Guthrie, who but recently came hither, only the elect of literature are on familiar terms. Professor Guthrie is lecturer in general literature in the University of Chicago, but at present he is lecturing in Oakland on the drama. Professor Guthrie is above all things a poet, and of prolific muse I should judge from the bulkiness of a volume of his verse that is now to be found in the local bookshops. Poetry of the kind that Professor Guthrie writes does not enthrall me much; but for that reason I am not prejudiced against it. I am mindful of the advice of Edmund Burke: when we find ourselves disposed not to admire those whom all the learned admire, abstain from indulging our own fancies and study them until we know how and what we ought to admire, and if we cannot arrive at admiration through knowledge, believe we are dull rather than that we have been imposed upon. Now while it is quite evident to me that Professor Guthrie is a poet with the gift of speech, it is hard for me to expound him, the reason being that my vulgar ear has not been trained to many of the harmonies which he produces. Obviously the fault is mine, not Professor Guthrie's. Candidly, I am no lover of the Wagnerian in verse. Which is perhaps, a shocking confession for me to make, as it betrays lack of cultivation. However as there is much in Browning and Whitman that I admire, there is also much in Guthrie that appeals to me, for it cannot be denied that he has the knack of transmuting the metal of common speech into pure gold. How delightfully suggestive are the following excerpted at random from different poems:

"Bare hickories and white oaks waded
In stealthy drifts of fog."

"A glorious tempest of passionate notes."

"And the drear woods ache in a death-cold swoon."

"Into the the sea of Night, Day's wine hath poured, Stain'd it a moment—then gloom billows roar'd."

The sky with clouds is strewn,
A sea with its isles asleep.
Thou sailest fast, dear Moon,—
Thy love is across the deep!
But one whose life is wrecked
Would rather believe thee cold,
Unloving, unloved, erect—
A queen with her crown of gold!

Some Strange Harmonies

It does not require a very sensitive or practiced ear to catch the melodies of the foregoing syllables, but there are other combinations of cadences and pauses that are entirely too subtle for me. As for example in these from a sonnet:

Prepotent wizardry of bygone joys!
often have I beheld thy faraway smile and marvelled what thy vision-over stile athwart field, beyond stream:—what thing might poise, Mother midair,—invisible to a boy's penetrant sight,—that so could thee beguile, grief-haunted, thee? Tho' sweeter than erstwhile,— in memory sipped, no golden honey cloy.

I miss in those lines the pleasant ripple of verse, rolling honey-sweet words and sparkling phrases in its eddies. There is much that Professor Guthrie has written from which that ripple is missing, but there is a stately procession of rhetoric. He writes at times of "confluent torrents of praise," of being "rapt to vertiginous pitch" of a "brook with its hurdygurdy roars and its sturdy wordy brags" and of a pool the surface of which children "Kick to yeasty sheeny lather." But enough. To be a great poet nowadays one must create a new atmosphere and a new temperament in the world of readers and hence the occasionally strange workmanship of Professor Guthrie who, despite the oddities of his whimsical verse, is a true poet. He sings as blithely as if he enjoyed the music of his own voice, as did Theocritus in the refreshing air of

When Knight Gets Intimate

Miss Adeline Ricks of Eureka, whose engagement to a wealthy young Eastern lumberman has been announced, comes of a family that has had much to do with the history of Humboldt county. Her paternal grandfather was one of the first white men to settle there, and his descendants have all been prominent in one way and another. Her father, Lemuel Ricks, is one of the wealthy men of the county, interested in various big enterprises. The Ricks family has had much litigation during the past few years. Tom Ricks, after the death of the mother and a brother, sued Lemuel for a settlement of the family estate along lines which to him seemed just. But Lemuel wanted things as they were, so resisted. George Knight became Tom's attorney and there have been two or three trials, the jury disagreeing each time. This in spite of the heart to heart talks made by Knight to the jurors, most of whom he knew personally, Humboldt being his native county. Knight did not "orate," but got right up against the jury-box railing and grew confidential. "Now, Jim," he would say, "you know me, and you know that when I argue here for Tom I do it because I know it is right. I wouldn't lie to you. I didn't lie when I sold papers in Eureka, did I? Or it would be, 'Bill, you know Tom Ricks. You know Tom wouldn't sue for this money unless he thought he was entitled to it. I know we can depend on you to do the right thing, Bill. You remember when we used to go up to Mad river fishing"—and so on. But it didn't work, and Lemuel still has the upper hand. Still, Tom Ricks is independently rich. His present wife, a woman who is greatly beloved in Eureka, was the widow of a brother of Frank MacGowan, the San Francisco attorney. She is Ricks's third wife.

A Matter of Millions

What part money plays in the Comedie Humane has been so fully and inimitably set forth for us by Balzac that nothing remains to be said on the subject. Let us say it, however. He speaks to Frenchmen, of France; we, of America, to Americans. Here, as there, in every drama Money has a speaking role at least assigned to it. No scene so solemn but it will enter, talking at the top of its voice, like the vulgar thing it is, to call attention to itself. Into the very chamber of death it hesitates not to obtrude itself noisily, and there is no man to say it nay. Not all the dignity of the angel of the inverted torch can awe it into going on decorous tiptoe, into holding its peace. Scarce, for instance, has James Henry Smith gone into the silent land he loved ere the usual unseemly noise begins. How much did he leave, more millions than he had seen years, or less? To which of two did he leave the greater share, to the Lady Cooper, his sister, or to a nearer one yet and a dearer one still, namely, the lady, his widow? There is a stage whispering to the effect that the bird of birth is hovering over the house of death, and open wonder expressed as to how the finale will be effected thereby, if at all. No privacy sacred enough to give pause to the arch-intruder. The wretch respects nothing, nor allows grief a moment wherein to weep disinterestedly; but must needs drag the unborn into the discussion, and divert the widow's eyes from their weeping to where the will is kept. ### A Woman's Winning Way

The irrepressible "Scotty" knows how to guard the secret of his gold cache if he knows nothing else, according to a story that has just come to town via Death Valley. After the big temblor Mrs. "Scotty," mindful of the ups and downs and upheavals in life as then illustrated, began to badger her husband as to the location of his famous secret mine. She insisted that she ought to know how to reach it in case "anything happened" to him. At last, Bluebeard like, he consented to let her have her own way and promised that on his next trip he would take her to the spot where "the twenty-dollar pieces are mixed up with the rocks." Accordingly, last week, instead of leaving her as usual at the railway station nearest the mine he harnessed four mules to a well stocked wagon, lifted her to the seat beside him, and drove blithely off into the sun-baked desert. Out in that rolling waste, however, "Scotty" weakened and right in "the middle of nowhere" he planted his resentful spouse beside a pool of water, hedged her in with a plentiful stock of beans, bacon, coffee and crackers and the protection of a faithful shepherd dog to scare off the coyotes and drove off by his lonely self to the mysterious mine.

Mrs. "Scotty" Explains

Six days later Mrs. "Scotty" awoke in the dawning light to find her husband standing before her. In the wagon was an assortment of bags filled with something heavy which "Scotty" explained was "the stuff." Mrs. "Scotty" tooled the four mules some hundred miles to Rhyolite, near Bullfrog, where the twain proceeded to spend money after the approved "Scotty" style. Then the disappointed woman commented to a friend, "Six years the man has been promising me a sight of that mine—for its six years since he married me in New York—and that bake-bean camp in the desert is the nearest I ever got to seeing it. Of course I can't even guess where he gets his picture ore from, for he seemed to jump off the earth right in the middle of the desert. Next time—well, the next time maybe I'll do some sleep walking. I can't understand why a man wants to be so contrary for anyhow. Can you?"

Stage Money Versus the Real Thing

"Scotty" tried to repair the error of his way by giving his wife a pocketful of money, a railroad ticket and a trip East "for a good time." Then he proceeded to turn nuggets into wine and the wine into anything but water. He paid for everything and nobody in camp objected. At the liquor laden banquet he gave to several friends some one chaffed him on his recent appearance as an actorman. "There's nothing in it," declared "Scotty," with his old-time meaningless grin. "It's like the stage money, you can pass out great wads of it but all the time you know its no good and so does everybody else. The liquor they give you is

Some Notable Pictures

Of great interest to all lovers of art—workers as well as laymen—is the exhibit at Del Monte. The most conspicuous picture in the exhibit is by the most conspicuous personality from the purely spectacular standpoint, in the local art colony—Mr. Xavier Martinez. It is a picture of unusual size and shape, being just a yard square, but of space you are oblivious, after a few moments spent before Piedmont Hills; you feel yourself out upon those hills, with a big sweeping spring sky above you. The wind-blown clouds are touched with the glow of late afternoon. The long grass shivers and bends in the breeze. You have a sense of fertility, life, youth and hope. The spot is the one that Martinez sought while San Francisco was in the throes of its awful chastening; and the consolation he found, he gives to those who look on this picture with sympathetic eyes. The human touch is not lacking; for two figures, not at first visible are seated on the hill, watching the glory of a sun-touched distance. While the effect of light is strong, it is a softened light-glow and fire without high color. How easy it is to fancy those beings tried by fire, beginning a new life, filled with a primitive joy—Nature's children, come back to her. In striking contrast to this out-of-door appeal is the collection of Charles Rollo Peters on the opposite wall. Here are his "Portals of the Past," the moon rising above all that remained of the beautiful Towne residence, those columns that seem a part of the Forum. "The Guardian of Nob Hill"—the disfigured lion of the old Colton house—the calm stars above the devastation, the glow of a burning city on the steps that lead to nothingness. Then there is his "Refugee Camp" with lights shining from tents huddled close to the Hollidays' home, from whose windows the moon light is reflected. In one of the tents a lamp has been placed close to the canvas, and its cheerful radiance shines to offset the depression that comes when one looks at the glare from the furnace below that momentarily crept nearer this place of safety. "The Streets of Despair" is well named. The best of this record of those days of horror is the picture of a warm hazy moon rising above the lights of Oakland. One looks down California street—upon the picturesque ruins of Grace Church—resembling an ancient moss covered Cathedral of the old world. All is enveloped in mellow moonlight and its reflection makes a bright pathway on the waters of the bay. It is to be hoped that some generous person will purchase these five pictures and present them to San Francisco. They should be in a museum where future generations may read their eloquent story. Without doubt, the best picture exhibited by Mr. Peters is the one he now calls "Warren's Home." His friends knew it once as "Chez Nous," a small canvas of a white house in the moonlight. A light in one of the windows sends its gleam down the hill. Where this light shines Mr. Peters' second boy was born, and one feels a personal touch—as if we were taken into the artist's confidence as one reads the title. This gem of the collection will never be sold. It is to be presented to the son whose name it bears. Mr. Keith has a characteristic wood scene, the technique of which is beautiful. Like a Diaz it possesses a glow as of jewels. This canvas shows more of the poetical nature of the man than does his "Glacial Meadows" which deals with "Facts that are" rather than "Fancies that might be." A little to the left of Mr. Keith's pictures are two faithful and delightful representations of Nature by John Gamble. Each exhibition of this artist marks a great improvement—and it is a question whether he has ever before shown anything so good as these. In his field of Lupins near Lake Merced there are beautiful gradations of color and his trees are a tender green—live with atmosphere and reflection of sky. There is much discussion as to which is preferable, this lovely bit of spring, or "Moonrise on the Seventeen Mile drive" where the moonlight shimmers behind cypress trees, full of feeling and charm.

Dixon Lost a Sale

Joseph Greenebaum is another artist who has taken long strides forward. Not in the two fancy heads he sent in this shown but the sea in his "Golden Sunset" and "Gray Morning near Catalina," is rippling, moving sparkling, almost speaking. Both are delightful, but the smaller canvas, the gray one, is the favorite. Maynard Dixon has some powerful desert pictures. In "The Open Range" one looks over miles of plain to blue hazing hills. "A Desert Shower" deserves a more poetical name, for the lone figure on the vast expanse if she would but lift her eyes could read much meaning from the great brilliant cloud which seems peopled with fancies. "La Pulqueria" and the head of a Navajo are exceedingly good, and "In Navajo Land" would now be on its way East had Mr. Dixon but left his prices with his work. A lady stood with check book in hand waiting to make out the required amount. There was telegraphing and telephoning to the city, but Mr. Dixon was not to be found and the would-be purchaser was obliged to leave without the picture. Eugene Neuhaus has a number of strong canvases and a great deal of interest is shown in his medium—a tempora—similar to that used by the old masters. He has painted with much freedom and surety of touch, and he is especially happy in the reflections in two lake scenes. The most poetical of his eight pictures is "Ebb Tide" which was painted from his own doorstep in Pacific Grove. Mrs. Mary Curtis Richardson has a dear old fashioned child standing beside a dog which is handled as if Mrs. Richardson were an animal painter. There is always tenderness and poetry in Mrs. Richardson's work. One senses the delicacy of the woman in her brush strokes. Three portraits of Olga M. Ackerman are beautiful in tone. There is the picture that once gained the two hundred dollar prize at Hopkins. Will Sparks has two small canvases with much charm of tone and color. One from El Paso and the other of the beach at Pescadero. Charles Dickman's "Cypresses on the Seventeen Mile Drive" is strong but not so interesting as most of his work. Evelyn McCormack shows her "Old Custom House" and two other Monterey scenes vibrating in color. "The Old Convent" is aglow with sunshine and is a most interesting subject. One sees the blue hills through broken, crumbling walls and windows, the roof is covered with moss and the fence casts a shadow that seems not made of paint but really caused by interrupted light. Arthur Matthews sent a powerful picture of cypresses. He, more than any of the painters who haunt Monterey, has caught the spirit of those curious trees, their strange lights and darknesses. Lucia Matthews has a delightful water color of Monterey trees and bay which has the charm of a Hiroshige print. Some Pacific Grove trees by Anna Francis Briggs is another that has been likened to a Japanese print, and in a Del Monte Beach scene she has caught the tender light of Dawn. This is the beginning of the much-talked-of exhibition at Del Monte. Every two months the jury is to meet, so before long we may have a change of pictures on its walls. Frederick A. Woodworth, who is in charge of the gallery, waxes enthusiastic as he talks of the interest shown by the guests and visitors. Most fortunate are both the artists and the management to have found a man so thoroughly artistic to give his time to this work. Mr. Woodworth has traveled largely and knows pictures as do few who paint them.

The Reformed Duke

There is no doubt that the Duke of Manchester has practically retired from the unprofitable business of sowing wild oats. Several years ago when he was out here on his honeymoon trip most of the time he stood knee deep in a field of oats and poppies, plentifully irrigated with the vintage of France. The Duchess had a sore throat and could not leave her apartment, so local society did not have an opportunity to glimpse a newly-made Duchess. The titled pair were deluged with invitations to the cotillions and the rest of the festivities which flame across our social horizon but the Duke and Duchess were otherwise concerned. A newspaperwoman who interviewed Manchester at that time told me that he greeted her like a long-lost sister. Having at one time eked out his own slender income by allowing the New York Journal to stamp his name on the Brisbane variety of editorial, he had a fellow feeling for newspapermen and women. The Duke is a ripping good fellow who does not take his title seriously and he shows keen contempt for Americans who lug in by the heels "Your Grace" at every turn in the conversation. He confided to my friend that he found American society the most undemocratic in the world, and to prove that he himself had not the taint of snob-bishness he told the newspaperwoman that he was so sorry his wife was indisposed as he knew she would have enjoyed meeting her!

The press representatives who interviewed him this time found Manchester the same genial, cordial, unassuming fellow but they were delighted to note that he does not show signs of over dalliance along the primrose paths. He has happily "settled down" and as he is a big, fine looking, good natured fellow out of joint with the ubiquitous picture of a puny duke dangling on the gilded knee of an American heiress, the daughter of the house of Zimmerman is probably reasonably happy. She is rather a plain looking woman but is said to be very popular in English society owing to her sympathetic, unassuming manner.

Ellis Was His Secretary

Manchester numbers several Californians among his most intimate friends. When he first came to New York and took a flier in the Bohemian set he annexed Melville Ellis to his train of satellites. Young Ellis left a San Francisco music store to conduct an orchestra in New York and has since essayed various parts in the musical and dramatic world. He has a neat sense of nonsense and managed to keep the Duke highly amused. When Manchester married Miss Zimmerman he at once appointed Ellis his private secretary and in that capacity the San Franciscan accompanied them on their wedding trip. A younger son of an English Lord bobbed up somewhere in the Middle West and Manchester generously bade him also join the party in the capacity of private secretary at a snug salary. Ellis decided not to divide the honors and gracefully withdrew though Manchester assured him that enough old bills would surely come pouring in the mails to keep two secretaries busy answering his creditors! But all this happened several years ago and from the way the Duke and papa-in-law Zimmerman "chummed" it around the Palace Hotel the day they spent in town, Manchester has evidently braaced up to the Zimmerman standard. He has an ample allowance, and if the rumor that he is a large beneficiary under the Smith will be true he will be able to indulge his fancy without a "by your leave" to his "in-laws."

T. A. Driscoll of the Burlingame Polo Team

A Costly Pall

The pall of orchids which covered the casket in which the body of James Henry Smith was taken east taxed the resources of the orchid growers of three counties. Only once before has an entire pall of orchids been ordered at a San Francisco florist's, and that was when Mary Crocker Harrison's remains were brought out here for interment. While orchids, on account of their expense, are a favorite gift flower here, very few of our fashionables have the passion for orchids which expends itself in conservatories devoted to this exotic bloom. The Coryells are about the only people I know of who raise orchids extensively. Their conservatories at Fair Oaks are the wonder of the country side and Mrs. Coryell seldom even appears on the street without a bunch of orchids pinned to her coat. Their friends are frequent recipients of these cherished blossoms. Everyone in the party the Coryells entertained at the opening dinner at the Fairmont Hotel wore great clusters of wondrously beautiful orchids.

An Obdurate Husband

Burlingame is to be shorn this summer of most of the personages who still uphold its aristocratic traditions against the influx of villagers. It is considered such "bad form" to summer in these parts this season that everyone is straining and pulling to make inelastic incomes stretch across the pond. I heard the other day of one young matron who had appealed to her father to save her from the ignominy of casting her lot with the stay-at-homes. "Daddy" lent a pliable ear to her pleading and she gleefully announced to her friends that she was going to join the hegira and she cheerfully went on making preparations to leave, in spite of her young husband's determination to stay at home and "make good" with the business he has recently embarked in. The husband has remained obdurate, importunities and his wife's threats to go alone having no effect on his adamant resolution. The young wife has tried nervous prostration and even that has not moved him so now she is trying to adjust herself to a husband who "means business." And her father, who was perfectly willing to buy them a trip to Europe, or to the moon, for the matter of that, is so proud of his son-in-law's stick-to-itiveness that he has been telling his club cronies that his daughter drew a lucky number in the matrimonial lottery.

The Walter Hobarts are already in Europe and of course Mary Eyre is with them. Mrs. Hobart and Miss Eyre are inseparables. The Josselyns also started early and avoided the rush. The Joe Tobins, the Frank Carolans, the Henry Scotts, H. M. A. Millers and several other prominent people leave this week. Mrs. Miller was one of those who endeared herself to Mrs. Peter Martin during the latter's frequent visits out here and she expects to spend much of her time in Paris with the dashing Mrs. Peter who has a charming apartment in the French capital.

Society Girls as "Collectors"

A new code of gift giving and taking has been established by society girls. Books, candy and flowers, the Triumvirate which marked the boundaries that a young lady could not overstep when a gentleman acquaintance was the donor, has been cleverly deposed. Time was when a girl could only accept precious gifts from a man to whom she was engaged, but the modern maiden has outwitted conventions. She starts a "collection." It may be a collection of pearls or emeralds or of any other stone save diamonds, which still betoken engagements to the general public. Man, being only a shade less clever than woman, knows better than to present to a young woman he admires, without the matrimonial slant, a ring or conventional pin. He has her favorite stone set in some bizarre way, in the modern "antique" jewelry style and she may then add it to her "collection" as a "curio." I know a society girl who started collecting turquoises. She has a marvelous collection of necklaces, bracelets, pins, unique rings and hair ornaments, all of them tributes she has levied on "platonic friendships."

An Innovation in Recitals

An innovation in the way of piano recitals will be the concert of Mr. Warren D. Allen, who announces a Sonata Evening for Wednesday, May 8th, at Lyric Hall. Affairs of this kind are keenly enjoyed by the more serious musical element in European capitals, particularly in Berlin, but San Franciscans have not yet had an opportunity to judge of their attraction. Mr. Allen is a University of California man whose musical ability is warmly vouched for by Hugo Mansfeldt, who has directed his studies for some time and who predicts great eminence as a pianist for the gifted young musician. Mr. Allen's programme will consist of the beautiful Brahms sonata in F minor (its first performance in San Francisco), the Liszt B minor sonata, and the Schumann F sharp minor sonata. This selection at once stamps the pianist as a musician of lofty ideals and one who intends to develop his individual bent to the fullest extent.

It Was Not a Love Tangle

It turns out that it was not because his passion for a fluffy haired chorus girl was unrequited that a young society man committed suicide a short time ago. His friends have learned that he was involved in financial difficulties, and that he committed suicide because he feared exposure. Which reminds me that the smart set lure causes many a society blade to live beyond his means. Society is hard put to it to round up men enough to make a decent average of masculinity, and inducements are held out to a lot of chaps with drawing-room tricks whose finances are not as bright as their social lustre. In order to keep up appearances these young men have to tug and strain at their incomes until they say in the middle, "Who is to pay the piper, to say nothing of the florist and confectioner whose wares pass for small change in society?"

Forum Club Breakfast

The annual Forum Club breakfast took place at the Paris Tea Garden last Saturday. The ladies were in eloquent mood and during the round of toasts some felicitous speeches were made. Mrs. J. J. Apple talked of "Spring." Mrs. Freyand spoke feelingly of "The Absent Ones," and Mrs. C. Wetmore discussed "Patriotism." A beautiful silver loving cup was presented to Mrs. Fredericks, the retiring President who has occupied the chair for three successive terms. The presentation speech was made by Mrs. F. M. Wright. The new officers of the club are: Mrs. G. E. Mayhew, president; Mrs. A. W. Scott, first vice-president; Mrs. J. Sisson, second vice-president; Mrs. M. Hall, third vice-president; Mrs. H. J. Brann, secretary; Mrs. H. R. Ellert, corresponding secretary, and Mrs. M. S. Cabb's, treasurer.

Minetti Orchestra Concert

The young musicians who compose the Minetti Orchestra acquitted themselves most creditably in their first concert of the season given last Friday evening in Christian Science Hall. The audience was large and appreciative and their applause was of the discriminating kind which ought to encourage these clever amateurs to further successes under the baton of their director, Giulio Minetti. Irving M. Wilson was concert master while Miss Ruth Powers, soprano, and Miss Carolyn Nash, violiniste, were the soloists. The programme was the following: Mozart Symphony, No. 39 in E flat major; Raff, "Immer bei Dir," Miss Ruth Powers; Locher, "Un baiser de Mimi," Minetti, "The Little Joker"; Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto in E Minor, Op. 64, Miss Carolyn Nash; Strauss, "Waltzer Geschichten aus dem Diener Wald."

Miss Harwood's Recital

The piano recital given on Wednesday evening, April 24, by Miss Elsie Harwood at the studio of Emil Steinegger was an encouraging musical success. The young lady showed exceptional talent and vindicated her rare mastery of her instrument by a sympathetic rendition of Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata, the Mozart rondo in A minor, Schumann and Brieg selections as well as others carefully chosen and executed with feeling and great technical skill. A large gathering of Miss Harwood's friends filled the studio and showed their appreciation by numerous gifts of flowers.

First Sacred Recital on New Organ

The opening recital for the new organ recently erected in the First Congregational Church will be given on Monday evening, May 6, by Dr. H. J. Stewart, assisted by Miss Camille Frank, Miss Elsie Arden and Mr. Samuel D. Mayer, organist of the church. Dr. Stewart's programme is as follows: First Sonata, in F minor, Mendelssohn; Communion in F, Grison; Barcarolle in A, Hofmann; Polonaise in A, Chopin; "In Paradisum," and "Fiat Lux," Dubois; Grand March, Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar. The organ has been built by the Austin Organ Company of Hartford, Conn.

New Mass to be Repeated

Dr. H. J. Stewart's new mass in D minor, composed for the Easter service at St. Dominic's Church, will be repeated on Sunday, May 5, on the occasion of the dedication of the new St. Dominic's Church. The mass will be rendered by the regular choir of the church, augmented by a number of extra voices, and accompanied by full orchestra. Soloists: Mrs. B. Apple, Miss Leola S. Stone, Mr. T. C. Elliott and Mr. Harold Pracht. Dr. Stewart has composed a special offertory for the occasion to the words of the Hymn "Coelestis Urbs Jerusalem."

Among the late arrivals at Byron Hot Springs are: C. S. Laumeister, Miss Ethel Laumeister, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Klein, Maxwell McNutt, Mr. and Mrs. Rolla B. Watt, T. H. Goodman, Senator and Mrs. C. N. Belshaw, Senator A. J. Welch, Dr. and Mrs. H. E. Sanderson, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Beedy.

The Vendome Reopened

An event of the highest importance to the beautiful city of San Jose was the opening this week of the Hotel Vendome which has been closed for a year. This hotel is as closely identified with San Jose as the Lick Observatory is with Mount Hamilton, and its influence upon both the social and commercial life of the city is tremendous. And not only was the community eager for its reopening but also many thousands of people who have engaged its hospitality, and especially automobilists whose delight it was to sojourn there on their tours up and down the state. So it was quite fitting that the hotel should be opened with ceremony. It has been remodeled at an expense of $150,000. While the exterior presents the old familiar aspect, so many are the changes that have been made in the interior that it is not to be recognized. It is more spacious and artistic than ever and the management promises that it will be found that the physical improvements are no greater than those that have been wrought in the general character of the hotel.

Mr. Charles Keilus of the Hub left for the East on a business trip to gather the fall productions for the coming season from noted style exponents.

Miss Russell's "Puck"

To one who has pored dreamfully over Fuseli's wondrous pictures of faery and drowsed away many a summer's afternoon in dusky woods, peopling the dark recesses with elvish forms and translating the mysterious forest murmurs into spirit voices, to one in short whose brain has been pleasantly haunted by gossamer ghosts and delightfully teased by airy familiars, the "Midsummer Night's Dream" with Miss Annie Russell as Puck comes as the bodying forth of all that imagination has sported with, an exquisite obsession that moves to the music of the faintly-blowing horns of elfland. The play exercises a magic woodcraft which induces that detached unearthly mood that must have laid hold on the lad Shakespeare when he lay (mayhap 'twas on St. John's eve and in that Warwickshire wood where Luce's red deer ran) in a hawthorn brake and summoned from their tree-boles and flower-chalices the merry minions of the fairy queen. The spell of the beautiful stage pictures no less than the influence of a company trained to the last illusion of their parts, but most of all the power shown by Miss Russell herself in the portrayal of a character that has waited for her these many years help to produce this weirdly pleasant effect upon the sympathetic spectator. One hears the vital noises of the wood, glimpses vague shapes among the trees, sees the slow shadows rise and gradually surrendering to the poetry of it all, feels no surprise when fairies dance back and forth, when Oberon comes with all his train and Titania, guarding her Indian boy. Wrapped in the mystery of the forest as in a leafy pall, one is prepared for Puck when he darts into view, treading mid-air with graceful steps and alighting on a tall tree stump to plague a solemn blinking owl amid peal on peal of roguish elfin laughter. Truly this production marks an epoch in one's study of Shakespeare. Never in this city has the role of Puck been so illuminated by acting as this time at the hands of Miss Russell. She has ceased for the nonce to be human and has become Robin Goodfellow, taking on his cunning smile, his mocking laugh, his antic mirth and all his mischievous tricks. The very soul of Hobgoblin seems to have entered into the body of Miss Russell, making her one of the "good people," the pert and nimble spirit of mirth itself. When her acting is judged for the final summing up she can ask nothing better than to be remembered as Puck; if the future holds for her another interpretation equal or superior to this, then her name must be enrolled with the greatest. Her reading of the rhymed and blank verse that alternates throughout the play is all that could be asked; infinitely more, apparently, than can be asked of her company for none of them, none of the men more especially, gets more than the occasional music and strength of the Shakespearian medium. Why these men cannot apply the same methods of restraint to a "A Midsummer Night's Dream" that they would to a modern play is beyond explanation. Miss Russell, it goes without saying, shows no trace of the old-school vices of Shakespearian acting, neither do the women who accompany her; but the men affect the "Ercles" vein, they will not be natural. But these are tiny moles in the moonbeam that dances through the wood outside of Athens where all of Puck's roguish tricks were played. They hardly jar in the harmony of the whole and if they begin to offend the ear there is a sudden peal of as wonderful laughter as was ever heard in or out of fairyland to lull irritation. That laughter is more potent to elevate the stage than all the lecture tours Miss Russell plans to make when she has tired of Puck's brown weeds. Oh that she might never tire of them!

—Edward F. O'Day.

"Christoforus" in Berkeley

The first American hearing of Rheinberger's "Christoforus" occurred at the Greek Theatre on Thursday afternoon of last week. The University Orchestra, in conjunction with a chorus of some two hundred and fifty men and women students put forth their best efforts in an endeavor to give a worthy performance of this beautiful modern oratoris, and five soloists, Mesdames Northrup and McMurray, sopranos; Mrs. Blanchard, contralto; Mr. Onslow, tenor, and Mr. Carrington, baritone, lent additional interest to the ensemble. The text of "Christoforus," by von Hoffnass, relates poetically the aspirations toward a high life of a warrior whose religious zeal encounters many obstacles but finally attains its goal through the revelations of a hermit, and the various dramatic episodes are given most consistent musical settings by Rheinberger. A particularly fine number was the trio for women's voices and it was delightfully sung. Mr. Carrington's voice, while of agreeable calibre, lacked the color and dramatic intensity that the role of the Giant suggests. Neither was Mr. Onslow's tenor fully equal to the requirements of the score. But the excellent singing of Mrs. Northrup and Mrs. Blanchard made ample atonement for these shortcomings, and the blending of orchestra and chorus was on the whole very satisfactory. The University is doing good work in undertaking and carrying to a successful issue the painstaking and conscientious preparations that such performances entail.

"Zira" for the Alcazar

The Alcazar company will appear next week in "Zira," the emotional drama in which Margaret Anglin created something of a sensation. It was not until Miss Anglin appeared in "Zira" that she was taken seriously as an emotional actress. Her first great triumph in the play was achieved in this city, after which she produced the piece in New York where she was given great praise for her performance. "Zira" is a distinctly actor-play. It was written by an actor and is instinct with theatricism. The climaxes are all nicely arranged and the play abounds in thrills. But the story is one that grips and tugs the heart strings and evokes the profound sympathies of the audience. The members of the Alcazar company should revel in the emotions of this drama.

"My Jack" at the American

"Sporting Life," the great English sporting drama, had a very successful week at the American Theatre this week. It was the first offering of the four weeks' dramatic season which was inaugurated at this house at special summer prices last Monday night. "My

Why Not Have Your Private Opera?

Rather aristocratic to have the grand opera stars sing at your home for your invited guests, isn't it?

Graves Jr. and all of the other favorites. Orral Humphreys, who has been on tour with the Creston Clarke Company, will rejoin the Colonial Stock Company, and his return will be welcomed by his many admirers, as his conscientious and able work has won for him a warm spot in the hearts of the patrons of the Colonial. The elegantly staged and well acted drama "La Belle Russe" is proving a big drawing card this week. The Belasco play will be presented for the last time Sunday night, with Saturday and Sunday matinees.

Leslie Carter Coming

The San Francisco Opera Company has been giving delightful performances of "Robin Hood" at the Novelty Theatre. The opera will be withdrawn after Sunday night's performance, and will be followed by that colorful and melodious musical comedy, "Fantana," with which the opera company will close its engagement next week. Mrs. Leslie Carter, who is now en route to this city, will open an engagement at the Novelty on the night of Monday, May 13, in "Du Barry," one of the most stirring of the Belasco dramas, and one in which she scored her greatest triumph.

other leading roles will be taken by Miss Laura Hudson, Miss Maud Lita, and Mr. Griffith Wray. "My Jack" will run for one week only.

"On 'Change" at Colonial

"On 'Change," a farce in three acts newly adapted from the German of Van Moser, which was played with great success by the Augustin Daly Company under the title of "The Big Bonanza," will be produced at the Colonial Theatre on Monday evening, May 6. It is one of the funniest farces dealing with the ups and downs of the stock market that has ever been staged. Daly thought it worthy an all-star cast, which included John Drew, Ada Rehan, James Lewis, Otis Skinner, Isabel Irving, Joseph Holland and Mrs. Gilbert. In the mild Professor Seneca Pickering Peck, the man who attempts to "bull the market," Frank Bacon has a character admirably suited to his dry humor and droll demeanor, and he will no doubt score a great hit in the part. The "Bear" of the stock exchange will be portrayed by that versatile character actor, A. Burt Wesner. The full strength of the company will be seen in the cast, including Izetta Jewell, Maud Odelle, Effie Bond, Jane Jeffery, Orral Humphreys, Walker

Messrs. Bishop and Greenbaum have another treat in store for the patrons of Idora Park. Hearing that Andrew Bogart had returned from the East where he has won many laurels, they sought him out and engaged him for the tenor role of Victor Herbert's "The Fortune Teller," which will be given a fine production next Monday night. Bogart will lure many an old admirer across the bay and he will doubtless receive a very enthusiastic welcome home. Another new acquisition of the Idora company is Mr. Oliver Reece, an Australian basso who recently closed a concert tour of Canada. The Herbert opera will be followed by a grand revival of "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," with Arthur Cunningham in the role which he made famous by his singing of "My Own United States."

Orpheum's New Bill

Next week's Orpheum bill will be headed by Foy and Clark, who are favorably remembered though many years have elapsed since their last visit. In their latest success "Under the Sea," both Miss Clark and

Mr. Foy have splendid opportunities for the display of their comedic talents. Charles Leonard Fletcher will present a series of character studies and impersonations taken from the works of popular novelists and dramatists. Merry Lillian Shaw, vocal dialect comedienne, and the Durand trio, high class Italian character vocalists, are among the other new people. It will be the last week of the Max Tourbillon Troupe, the Kremba brothers and Elizabeth Murray. The Fadettes will also close their engagement of four weeks and one of their selections will be "A Day at the Circus," which excited much interest during their former engagement. There will also be new motion pictures.

Henrietta Crosman's Engagement

On Monday, May 13, Henrietta Crosman will begin an engagement of two weeks at the Van Ness, during which time she is to make her appearance in two plays entirely new to this city. Her engagement will open with the comedy called "All-of-a-Sudden Peggy," and during the second week the new comedy-drama "The Almighty Dollar" will be staged. Miss Crosman has

CIRCLES

By Mabel Porter Pitts

Were it sorrow too great for pretensions to hide,
Were it thoughts and desires that in embryo died
Or the kiss that was lure to the sepulchers where Rise the ghosts of dead lips in demand of their share,
Were it work of the tongue, were it work of the pen,
Round and round, in and out, you must live it again.

Round and round, in and out, through the ways that were vain,

To the highway of doubt and the temple of pain;
Round and round, in and out, you will not kneel alone
Where the gray ashes lie on the sacrifice stone
For the heart of man clings to the graves of the past,
And the dregs, says the proverb, hang in to the last.

The Key Route Inn

On the seventh of May Oakland will have a new first class hotel, embodying features not found in any other hostelry on either side of the bay. This is the Key Route Inn, so called because it is situated at the Broadway and Twenty-second street terminus of the Key Route and also because it is built with an arcade into which the electric Key Route trains will glide every twenty minutes. This arcade is so constructed that no noise from the trains can disturb the hotel guests at any time and the constant stream of people from the frequent trains will be quite a source of interest as they lounge in the lobby about the big fireplace. All the most modern conveniences of a big caravansary are provided, including writing rooms for ladies, billiard rooms, great halls and rooms which are all well lighted, opening either on the outside or on the wide inner court. The Key Route Inn is to be managed by N. S. Mullan, for five years prior to the fire assistant manager of the Palace Hotel in this city. Mr. Mullan has secured a large part of the old Palace working force and will duplicate in many particulars the service at that world-renowned hostelry. Quick train service and long distance telephones in all the rooms connect the Inn with San Francisco and other nearby places as closely as could be desired. Steam heat and a sanitary compressed air cleaning plant are other features which recommend this new hotel. The furnishings will be on a sumptuous scale and large and carefully kept flower beds and lawns will add to the exterior attractiveness of the place.

Improvements at Paraiso

Having just acquired ownership of the "Carlsbad of America," as the Paraiso Springs are popularly known, H. H. McGowan, formerly of Seigler Springs, is planning great improvements for this attractive resort. The Paraiso Springs are in Monterey county, seven miles by stage from Soledad, at an altitude of 1400 feet. There are arsenic, soda and sulphur springs and a corps of skilled physicians and masseurs add to the value of the treatment. Mr. McGowan intends to erect more cottages and has let contracts for other changes which will materially increase the attractiveness of this health resort.

Improvements at Santa Cruz

When the plans of the Santa Cruz Beach Company are completed under the supervision of Fred W. Swanton one part of the State will have acquired a distinctive watering place to compete with those in Southern California. The new Casino is estimated to cost $225,000, while the bathing pavilion will represent an outlay of $175,000. There are over one hundred and twenty-five miles of wiring in the Casino alone, while twenty-two thousand electric lights will be used to illuminate the two buildings. Those who care for statistics will be interested to know that over four million feet of lumber have been used in these structures. The largest individual order for varnishes which has ever been placed is being used in this work. The total investment in Cottage City, Casino and Bathing Pavilion is $510,000.

Mr. B. W. Bartley last week purchased from the Pioneer Automobile Company a Model "M" Winton Touring Car to be used in the rent service in San Jose.

"Brenda Ward"

This is a continuation of the history of Brenda, whose school life, club work and settlement interest have been detailed in previous volumes. Brenda being now married and settled in Boston has taken into her home Martine, the young Chicago heiress whose adventures enlivened "Amy in Arcadia." Martine, whose mother was an invalid, was to have attended a Boston school, but at the last moment all the plans for her domiciliation were upset, so she came to be an inmate of Brenda's apartment. The house mistress, however, was called to California, and some retrenchments in the Stratford menage, together with the absence of the father, put the Stratfords in possession. They had some amusing and annoying experiences with a very up-to-date maid, Angelina Rosa, with stage aspirations and other follies buzzing in her brains, though she had the redeeming virtue of not minding hard work when she had credit for her accomplishment of it. There is a good deal of local New England history introduced, as the girls, who are all natural and most of them pleasant companions, make little journeys here and there, and Martine has an admirable opportunity to test the value of friendship which is based on income. The story will be welcomed by the larger girls, from fifteen years upwards. Published by Little, Brown and Co.

"The Mystery"

It is difficult to give any inkling of what "The Mystery" means without telling too much. As the title indicates, it is a story the interest of which depends largely on postponing the denouement until the last word, and in this particular instance, only half the mystery is solved then, since the only survivors of the ill-fated enterprise were themselves in the dark. The Wolverine, a vessel of the United States navy, was sent to cruise in a desert part of the Pacific, ostensibly to destroy derelicts, but also to keep watch for the reappearance of a schooner which had sailed some two years before from San Francisco on some secret enterprise, carrying an eminent German scientist, his trusted assistant, and apparatus of which nothing could be learned except that the professor was most cautious about the chest in which it was stored. The Wolverine was successful in her mission, as far as the discovery of the "Laughing Lass" was concerned, but the mystery of her mission was deepened by the fact that she was picked up with all sails set, everything in perfect condition, the galley fire not yet cold, but with not a trace of life on board. There was no evidence of disaster or panic, and though there had been unexplained electrical phenomena, she was not connected with the manifestations in any way that the officers of the Wolverine could suggest. A crew was put in charge of her, but within twenty-four hours she was again encountered, as before, deserted with apparently no reason. On the next day there was picked up a dory containing the dead body of one of the seamen and a stranger, alive but exhausted. The mystery of the schooner and the missing men is cleared up, but not the scientific quest on which she sailed, chartered by the German professor. The characters, besides the officers and men of the Wolverine consist of a piratical captain and owner of the schooner and as cut-throat a crew as ever unfurled the Jolly Roger; an adventurous newspaper correspondent who shipped as mate on the Lass in search of a good "story," and the eminent German scientist and his assistant, who probed the mysteries of nature, succeeded in their quest and were about to return to civilization with the results of their investigations when the avaricious credulity of the pirate gang interposed. "The Mystery" is a story of absorbing interest. It simply will not let itself be taken up in installments but must be finished at a sitting. It will prove a sad disappointment for that class whose sole concern is whether She will eventually get Him, since there is not even the casual mention of a woman from beginning to end, but for those who are not concerned with sentimentalizing, and who are not Missourian enough to need a diagram and working model, but who can let their imagination supplement proved facts, it will be appreciated. "The Mystery" is a collaboration of Stewart Edward White and Samuel Hopkins Adams. Mr. White is at home in "the silent places" of the earth, and whether he is describing a journey through mid air, in which he clings to a precipitate mountainside with the assistance of a favorable breeze, or writing a novel of life in the open, he is sure of an appreciative audience. Mr. Adams is less well known in the field of fiction than his collaborator. No doubt the scientists will find fault with "The Mystery" on one ground and the romantic lovers on another, while the educators will tear it to tatters for a score of faults according to their views, but the readers, the people who do not read novels for science, nor care for disguised tracts, nor believe that the one occupation of the human race is falling in love, but take up light literature for enjoyment, will find it to their liking. ## The San Francisco That Was artist or two. Of the many things that go to the building up of a veritable Bohemia, she had all except the works of genius necessary to justify its existence.

Money she loved well, but man better. A penniless poet might have pillowed on her bosom, a merchant prince on the outer door-mat the while, had the poet only been forthcoming, and she known him for such. Intended for romance, she might well have given birth to a Don Quixote. Instead, she gave birth to an Abe Ruef. The fault her day's, not hers.

Her air of childlike innocence she never quite lost, her prototype being that anomaly, the strange woman whose soul seems, not only never to have given its consent to the misdeeds of the body, but even to be unaware of their very existence, they having been done, as it were, in the soul's absence.

Though she wore furs in midsummer, and diamonds at noonday, and dressed as for a festival, to do her marketing, and denied herself nothing, she had taste withal, had my poor' dead gille de joie, and heart enough to house mankind.

Such the San Francisco that was, my San Francisco, now with God. Her end became her. Better thus to die than inch by inch of that most insidious of modern diseases, Progress.

They tell me that she is not dead at all. It is true, they say, that she was very sick awhile back, but she is better now, and soon will be her old self again. They lie. She is dead—gone hence, at least. Myself saw her being translated, as was the prophet of old, in a chariot of fire. Why do they say of a stranger, "This is she!"? To save my reason, forsooth? Do they think thus to deceive me who, were I indeed gone mad with grief, would yet know her at a glance. Foolish as false. But hold! Perhaps the poor things deceive themselves. 'Tis they, not I—What if they had seen me tap my forehead then! Humor them, that's the thing to do. Why, gentlemen, of course, it is she, our dear San Francisco, and looking so well, too. I surely must have been dreaming! Dead! Well, if that's not one on me! Come, let's uncork a bottle of '49 to drink her health in.

In removing the garments from his body, the Trowel presented itself, with all the other working tools of operative Masonry, besides all the emblems peculiar to the degree of Master Mason. Conspicuously on his breast were the Great Lights of Masonry. Over his heart was the Pot of Incense. On other parts of his person were the Bee-Hive; the Book of Constitutions, guarded by the Tyler's Sword, the Sword pointing to a naked Heart; the All-Seeing Eye; the Anchor and Ark; the Hour-Glass; the Scythe; the forty-seventh problem of Euclid; the Sun, Moon, Stars, and a Comet; the Three Steps, Emblematical of Youth, Manhood, and Age. Admirably executed was the weeping Virgin, reclining on a broken column, upon which lay the Book of Constitutions. In her left hand she held the Pot of Incense, the Masonic emblem of a pure heart, and in her uplifted right hand a sprig of acacia, the beautiful emblem of the immortality of the soul. Immediately behind her stood winged Time, with his scythe by his side, "which cuts the brittle thread of life," and the Hour-Glass at his feet, which is ever reminding us that "our lives are drawing to a close." The withered and attenuated fingers of the Destroyer were delicately placed amid the long and gracefully flowing ringlets of the disconsolate mourner. Thus were the striking emblems of mortality and immortality beautifully blended in one pictorial representation. It was a spectacle such as Masons never saw before, and, in all probability, such as the Fraternity may never witness again.

In the mean time the sun was rising in the East. The smoke of a thousand tents was now ascending from the surrounding hills and valleys, which plainly told that the hardy pioneers were busy preparing their morning repast. The flags of different nations were waving from the masts of the immigrant ships that were anchored in the bay, and sounds of sweet music in the distance fell faintly on the ear. There was a solemnity and tranquility all around peculiarly befitting the occasion. The news soon spread from tent to tent, and crowds hurried to the spot where the body was exposed. No one, however, could identify him. A perfect mystery hung over the stranger, and still hangs over his memory. His history may never be known. It mattered very little to the Masons who were present from what country or clime he came, or in what language he spoke while living. It was enough for them to know that he was a man and a Mason to secure him a decent interment. The body was laid in a rude but substantial coffin, and borne in silence to the brow of a neighboring hill where it was buried with becoming honors. The mourners stood around his grave, each one wearing a white apron, which from time immemorial has been "the emblem of innocence and the badge of a Mason." There were eyes bedewed with tears that were unused to weep. The occasion was as solemn as it was extraordinary. In the entire absence of all empty pomp and ostentation, there were the manly and undisguised feelings of Masons, moved to a touching extent over the humble grave of an unfortunate brother. The funeral service was impressively read by Lieutenant-Colonel J. North. The brethren severally dropped a sprig of evergreen upon the coffin, and, after an appropriate prayer, the dust of Happy Valley forever covered the mortal remains of the mysterious stranger whose body was so beautifully embellished with Masonic emblems.

tracing idle patterns on the blotting-pad before him. He thought of the poor mountain village where he was born, and which he had left seven years ago to come down to Palatz and find favor in the eyes of the greatest merchant in the place, and marry his only daughter, and succeed, in due course, to all his riches. Jovanovich sighed as he thought, so perhaps he did not find the contemplation of his success altogether satisfactory. It was spring, and the soft air blowing through the open window seemed to blow from the blue hills of his home. He remembered the sighing pines, and the cool white foam of the waterfall by which he had walked with the popadia's (priest's wife) pretty niece in those far off days. His wife had brought him riches and success, but he had loved one curl on the black head of the popadia's niece better than he had loved the whole body of the rich merchant's daughter. Now that his wife was dead he was a lonely man in the house where his father-in-law had lived. Perhaps it was for this reason that he had set himself to build a new and more splendid house, which should be all his own, and hold no memory of the woman who had bought him—perhaps it pleased him this morning to remember that at the corner of the market-place the walls of his new home were already rising fast. There was a tap at the door, and Bora Jovanovich roused himself abruptly from the dream into which he had fallen. A workman in a greasy blouse answered his invitation to enter, and then stood tongue-tied in the door-way regarding the great man of Palatz with a frightened eye.

"The house—" he stammered at last.

Bora Jovanovich laid down his pen.

"What has happened to it?"

"It's no fault of ours," the man said sullenly. "Yesterday it was the same—half our day's work undone. And today the wall is down again. We do not understand it."

"Who pulls the wall down?"

"How should we know?" The man's tone was half fierce, half frightened. "Someone comes—at night—and pulls down half of what we do by day."

Bora Jovanovich sat silent, looking at the workman at the door; and the same thought was in the minds of both. No one in Palatz—that is to say, no one merely human—would care to interfere with the rich man's house.

"You had better keep watch," Jovanovich said.

The man shifted his weight from one foot to the other. The prospect of keeping watch did not seem to appeal to him.

"You need not trouble," Bora Jovanovich said, with a touch of scorn. He was clever enough to know that it is best not to give orders when you are certain they will not be obeyed.

But that night, when the house was asleep, he muffled himself in a cloak and slipped out and made his way to the market-place. It was a dark night, for heavy clouds came and went before a pale moon. Palatz was asleep; and Bora Jovanovich groped his way down into the foundations of his new house and sat there waiting, wrapped to the ears in his cloak.

He waited a long time and at last fell asleep and dreamed that he was roaming the forests of his home, with the popadia's pretty niece beside him; but she wept all the time, and the great tears ran down her face and fell on the pine-needles, and he tried in vain to comfort her.

He woke with a start, shivering. The dew was cold on his hands. He thought of the tears of the popadia's niece. He heard her crying still—or—no, the crying was no dream. In the darkness he heard a voice which murmured "Sava! Oh, Sava, stay with me!" He heard the sobbing of a woman, and it seemed to him that he knew the sound.

The moon came from behind a cloud and flung a doubtful light around. Close to him a woman knelt, trying to pull down the wall with torn and bleeding fingers. Her black hair fell curling on her shoulders as once, long ago, the hair of the popadia's niece had curled in the little mountain village where he was born.

Bora Jovanovich went and stood beside the kneeling figure. It looked up at him. In the moonlight he saw the great tears rolling down its face.

"Militsa!"

She did not pause from her labor, but tore still at the resisting bricks. He saw the blood running down her fingers as the tears ran down her face. Her voice rose to a pious cry.

"Oh, Bora, save him—save Sava! They have built his shadow into the walls, and unless I give it back to him he will die. And, since you went away, I have nothing else. Sava, Sava—help me to save Sava!"

Bora Jovanovich looked at her. It was not the cold night air which made him tremble.

"Who is Sava?"

Her black head was bent over the torn fingers which clutched still at the wall. Her voice died to a sob.

"Sava is—all you left me when you went away. Save him—help me to find his shadow in the wall."

Bora Jovanovich said nothing. In silence he knelt down by her side and began, with shaking fingers, to tear down the walls of the new house in which there were to be no memories and no regrets.

III.

In the fine new house at the corner of the market-place, which is not so very new now, Bora Jovanovich, the richest man in Palatz, lives with his wife, who was once the popadia's niece. Everyone envies them their prosperity; some, it may be, envy them the children who run in and out, laughing, and shaking their black curls in the sun. Nothing but happiness has come to them in the new house. "As lucky as Bora Jovanovich's new house" has become a proverb in Palatz. But it is a proverb which is never quoted in his presence, for Palatz has learned that he does not like it.

For sometimes at night, when the black-haired children are still, Bora Jovanovich and his wife remember another child who does not run in and out with the others. They remember a little shadow which was built into the foundations of their house and upon which their happiness has risen, like a house which human hands did not build. It lies buried still—perhaps in their hearts, perhaps in the walls of the new house on the market-place—the shadow of a living soul, which they remember as the Shadow of Good Fortune.

Observations Suggested By a Revelation

"Nature," says the Examiner, "when she laid the foundation of what is now America, decreed that this should be forever the home of the most favored nation." This is an utterance that will probably be accepted by the credulous plain people as significant of God's choice of Mr. Hearst's paper as the official organ of heaven. It was by similar divine revelation that the Chosen People of old learned through the inspired prophets that Babylon was to be taken by Cyrus and that Jerusalem was to be miraculously delivered under Hezekiah. But as there were septs in the days of Isaiah, so now will there be found people to flout the inspired vaticinations of the young men of Mr. Hearst's staff. We shall not be astonished to hear somebody suggest that this asseveration of the proud destiny of America is an expression of that odious Yankee spirit of brag which is regarded as typical of Americans, which foreigners find disgusting, and which has often driven our friends to despair. Indeed we shall expect some homiletical person to seize this somewhat belated publication of divine decree as the theme of a scathing disquisition on the self-laudatory passion of Americans. But what care we for the censures of atrabiliar critics. It is our disposition to regard ourselves as the salt of the earth and we don't care who knows it. We must not be expected to change our nature for the purpose of earning applause that we are fully capable of giving ourselves. Recent greatness is like new richness—always sensitive and self-assertive. There is nothing that is more satisfying to it than blatant violence and exaggeration of language, and that is why we are noted for our profligacy of claptrap and laughed at for our government by declamation. And it is not only in the plain people that manifestations of this mania—the typical dementia Americana—are to be encountered. Even our intellectuals are given to forthright Yankee brag. In Bancroft's history much is to be found that has contributed to the gayety of nations but nothing that has been more frequently quoted than the statement that the ascent of American democracy to power, "proceeded as uniformly and majestically as the laws of being and was as certain as the decrees of eternity." Perhaps the explanation of the enduring quality of this passion may be found in the words of M. Renan relative to our educational system. He said that we had created a considerable popular instruction without any serious higher instruction, and shall long have to expiate this fault by our intellectual mediocrity, our vulgarity of manners, our superficial spirit and our lack of general intelligence. Or perhaps a better hint to the basis of American temperament is to be found in that very Examiner editorial which gives publicity to God's decree. "It is the duty," said the inspired one, "of every American while assailing injustice to keep his faith fixed upon the incomparable bounty and opportunity of this continent." How aptly do these words body forth the sentiment of the times and the spirit of the people! Keep your faith while assailing injustice, says the inspired one, not in Him from whom justice flows, but in the opportunities for getting rich. Let us turn momentarily from this sentiment to a little old-fashioned advice given by Washington in his Farewell Address: "And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion." What has this to do, we may be asked, with the vulgar habit of brag that is characteristic of Americans? Only this: it reminds us that the sentiment of Washington has grown old fashioned; that we do indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion as evidenced by the fact that religion is excluded from popular education, and that as a consequence we have come to magnify the importance of a purely materialistic progress which is all that inspires us to self-laudation. Progress it is true has been made in many things. We are richer, better clothed, better housed and better fed than we were many years ago; our railroads honeycomb the land, we count the increase of our population by millions; the streams of immigration all flow toward us; colleges and churches and schoolhouses dot the landscape; all this is true, but have we made any improvement in our manners? or, have we advanced civilization? or, are we more united? or, is the typical American of today superior to the typical American of Washington's day? If these questions cannot be answered in the affirmative, then may it be doubted that God decreed that this should be forever the home of the most favored nation.

The Pampering of Organized Labor

"The general public has rights in these matters that are as precious as the rights of either employers or employees." Such was the solemn asseveration on the eve of the carmen's strike of one of the most enthusiastic of the journalistic champions of organized labor. A noble sentiment that in which we all heartily concur; but absolutely unprofitable and in the nature of airy persiflage; at the same time significant of a belated awakening. We all become very much concerned for the general public when the fact is brought home to us that we are among its units and that we have mutual interests to be subserved. But unfortunately so far as the press is concerned those interests need not be strictly insisted upon at all times. It has been found advantageous for the press to justify its advertising rates and claims to advertising patronage by coddling organized labor in furtherance of the shrewd latter day policy expressed in this formula: get a circulation among the plain people to whom the merchant must appeal in his advertisements. The wisdom of this policy was first demonstrated by Mr. Hearst, who was subsequently flattered by the enthusiastic imitation of his contemporaries. Under normal conditions it is an excellent policy from the standpoint of the business manager. But it may develop abnormal conditions under which it would not prosper. In this world all things react, and the very extremity of any force is the seed and nucleus of a counter-agency. Under the fostering influence of a press that has encouraged its most extravagant claims and its most outrageous principles organized labor can conceive of no reason why it should be subject to any restraint. And the consequence is we are threatened with being carried past the point beyond which it is not safe for the laborer to push his demands. This endless billowy oscillation of industrial strife induced by demands that ignore unalterable economic principles cannot continue without disaster to labor as well as to capital. While the labor agitators were successfully bulldozing their employers the newspapers enjoyed halcyon moments; the advertising crop was luxuriant and journalism prospered. But with everybody threatening to go on strike and the merchants in danger of becoming inaccessible to their customers, the stentorian champions of the plain people, sensible of the inevitable drop in advertising patronage, perceived the importance of calling a halt. But who would take the initiative? There was the rub! Mr. Hearst shed tears over the prospect. He talked pathetically of the menace to the city's welfare and exclaimed "This is no time for arbitrary stubbornness." No indeed it wasn't. It was time for the press to denounce the agitators who deny union men the right to express their real sentiments by secret ballot. But the noble ungagged Fourth estate, though conscious of its own impending pecuniary losses preferred to express O such profound sympathy—for the dear general public.

Roosevelt and Some Laborites

Organized labor the country over is just now writhing in a spasm of fury because President Roosevelt has had the temerity to characterize Moyer, Heywood and Debs as undesirable citizens. It would seem that every letter of his which our chief executive allows to be published is destined to act as a petard hoisting somebody into unpleasant national prominence and raining about the defiant head of the writer a shower of most vituperative splinters. The last epistle in the Roosevelt-Harriman controversy proved no exception to this rule. Having trodden heavily on the bunions of union labor the President is now receiving the attentions of labor editors and demagogues; and, as might be surmised, their attentions are neither delicate nor polite. In fact, so obvious are their winings, so loud their howls, as to justify the conclusion that they are galled, that their withers have been wrung in goodly earnest this time. Can it indeed be that the presidential pen has pricked their adamant defenses; that his weapon poisoned with no more feasible bane than ink has verily diffused a delirious influence throughout their blood, causing the violent manifestations that are now the current spectacle of the nation? Not often, it must be admitted, have sentences so temperately worded, so cautiously framed and so carefully weighed as these of President Roosevelt must have been, drawn such thunders of obscene abuse and overwhelmed one devoted head with such rains of vulgar vilification. But the general storm has certainly produced good effect, for every lightning flash of demagogic eloquence has illuminated the obscure places of unionism and made clear much that was hitherto but half understood. It is known now that not even from the highest officer in this country will union labor accept one word of criticism; that it insists on being a law unto itself from which there is no appeal and to which there must be not the remotest suggestion of amendment from any outside source. Granted that no labor agitator has yet arisen to declare that the Almighty in His providential wisdom has committed the brawn and industry of the country to the keeping of the various federations of labor; nor has the dictum gone forth that the heads of the innumerable amalgamations of workers move in an atmosphere to breathe which no ordinary mortal may be permitted. But let it not for an instant be supposed that this silence argues the absence of that arrogant assumption so characteristic of all tyrants whether they be trust officials or chiefs of organized labor. It is merely a question of linguistic style; time and time again they have expressed the same thought in other phrases. Organized labor is not wont to reckon with divine providence; the oaths and obligations taken at union assemblages quite often place fidelity to labor above religious and all other ties. And so far from pretending to breathe a rarefied atmosphere it is part of the labor agitator's most effective cant to protest the catholic inclusiveness of the trade guilds; this in the face of notorious facts pointing unmistakably the other way. Is it to be inferred from these things that organized labor is so sensitively organized that it cannot bear to hear the truth told about itself? or must the President be convicted of gross error in his estimate of Moyer, Heywood, Debs and the others like them? Unionism all over the country has one answer; those uninitiate in the arcana of trade federations but more or less sympathetic with the aims sought by workingmen, another. They side with Roosevelt; they consider the Moyer and the Debs type as undesirable to the future—and what is more pressing, to the present—of the country as are the Harriman and the Rockefeller types. And all the editorial protests of all the labor papers throughout the country will not win them from this conviction.

Our Own Undesirables

If President Roosevelt were as familiar with the personalities and achievements of certain labor leaders of San Francisco as he is with those of Moyer and Heywood and Debs, would he call them also undesirable citizens? Or would he agree with that exalted opinion of their merits which they have so often and with such courageous suppression of native modesty proclaimed of themselves and of one another, an opinion which places them in the foremost rank of the most valuable, the most desirable citizenry of our country? Here mayhap is a conundrum that ought not to be proposed, a lawless thought that should perish on the silent side of utterance, a question altogether too audacious for a city where labor writes itself in capitals and is wont to say—"I am Sir Oracle and when I ope my mouth let no dog bark." Discretion struggles with curiosity over the forbidden theme and while they tussle, speculation, as usual, dallies with the subject in furtive fashion. Would the President consider the head of the Buildings Trades Council a desirable citizen? or would he go so far as to brand him more undesirable than the desperate band who planned with ropes and ether, pistols and sponges, poisoned beer and automobiles and with thumbscrews, racks, garottes and other inquisitorial horrors, for aught we know, to send him to a land where there are neither Labor Day parades for him to lead nor strikes for him to captain? It is unlikely, despite the wide prominence attained by the hero of the awful plot hatched, as he himself has reminded us, on a Frozen Marsh in the Dead of Night, that his personality has yet, claimed the attention of President Roosevelt; so speculation on the President's potential attitude towards him must content itself with airy possibilities. We only know that from the viewpoint of order as enforced by our indicted chief of police he is a most desirable citizen, else why this great potholer to punish his would-be exterminators?

The Car-Strike Leaders

Equally interesting and instructive it would be to obtain the opinion of the President, as of an unbiased and disinterested outsider with keen appreciation for character, with regard to the group of agitators who are responsible for the car strike. Here again disappointment waits on curiosity, for there is no likelihood that the local street railway situation will become the subject of White House animadversion. But may it not be doubted without suspicion of unfairness whether the methods by which the car strike was precipitated would win the entire approval of Roosevelt? Is there any warrant for supposing that the seal of his favor would be stamped on the proceedings at the midnight meeting of Sunday when the demand for a secret ballot was howled down and a strike vote was taken viva voce, everybody concerned knowing full well that the dissenters would not dare to declare themselves openly before the violent and lusty-lunged inciters of strife? Would the President indorse the browbeating, intimidating tactics whereby the minority which did not want a strike was kept away from the meeting or driven out before the vote was taken, in order that there might not be the slightest danger of anybody discovering that the necessary two-thirds vote was not supporting the motion to quit work? It is unthinkable. Some of the President's "uglier and nastier words" would be brought into play if he had occasion to deal with the local imbroglio. It is just as certain that Roosevelt would class the leaders of the demagogic faction in the carmen's union as undesirable citizens as it is that he would apply the same characterization to Patrick Calhoun, their arch-enemy, if he saw fit to deal with the personality of that individual. For the President is the ideal of fairminded Americans in nothing more than in his intrepid disregard of class consciousness in the distribution of deserved criticism.

Foraker Versus Taft

We are hearing less and less of the possibility of another term for President Roosevelt. The President persists in his state of antagonism to the use of his name in connection with the Republican nomination, and yet there is abundant evidence of the fact that he is taking a very lively interest in Republican politics presumably for the purpose of controlling the convention, or at least with a view to securing the nomination for some representative of the Administration family. There is left scarcely any room for doubt of the sincerity of the President's declaration of his resolution to retire from the Presidency. And it must be admitted that if after so persistently reiterating that declaration he were to accept the nomination from a convention in the formation of which he was known to have exercised a great deal of influence, no explanation that he might then offer could avert the odium that would attach to his conduct. The reasonable supposition at this time is that the President's political activity is in the interest of the Hon. William Howard Taft, Secretary of War, and envoy extraordinary to the islands of the sea. And the indications are that the anti-Administration forces have selected Senator Foraker to defeat the President's hopes. The issue between Foraker and Taft will be decided in Ohio, the home state of both statesmen and without the support of which neither will be able to cut much of a figure in a national convention. The practical politicians of Ohio believe that Senator Foraker is entitled to elevation to the Presidency, while the rank and file of the voters believe that any wish, any desire expressed by President Roosevelt should be gratified without hesitation. But experience teaches us that the practical politicians wield more influence than the rank and file of the voters when it comes to selecting a delegation to a convention.

Genius And Its Children

Commenting on the impecunious condition of Mrs. Jessamy Bret-Harte Steele who is rich in name if not in more negotiable wealth, the Lounger in Putnam's Magazine has this to say: "His (Harte's) daughter has apparently inherited the extravagance without the genius of her father. She should however be kept out of the poorhouse at any cost, for it would be a sad reflection upon the many who have enjoyed Bret Harte's stories and who made him little less than a god at the time that he published his first book, 'The Luck of Roaring Camp,' if such a fate were to befall his child." Surely one need not incur suspicion of undue hard-heartedness by pausing to inquire why the improvident offspring of authors, artists and musicians have an indisputable claim upon the purses of the public which cannot be urged by the other unfortunates who shrink from becoming public charges. Granting that Bret Harte enriched the world with the glorious products of his imagination, he still had no delicacy about reckoning with his publishers on a commercial basis and was undoubtedly paid the fair market value of his literary wares. What rights in his books still continue are protected to his heirs by copyright. This being the case it is not easy to understand why the world owes so much to Mrs. Jessamy Bret-Harte Steele, especially as it seems to be admitted that she was extravagant with what money she once possessed. One of the Harte daughters has already been set up in business in London. If she had been a poor widow, the daughter of nobody in particular, with half a dozen children to support, she would have had to find precarious occupation for herself and struggle along as best she might.

A Southern Serenade

By Mabel Porter Pitts

Not to thine eyes I make my plea,
I cannot trust thine eyes,
Nor yet the color that I see
Within thy fair cheek rise;
These, like thy voice, I know to be
The servants of thy will
And, while they hide thy heart from me,
Yet half betray thee, still.

I trust no sighs that flutt'ring start
To vex thy parted lips—
No rose but seems to give its heart
To every bee that sips—
Yet not one rebel of the South
Less conquered is today
Than this, the scarlet of thy mouth,
Which tells thy love, always.

Perspective Impressions

Mr. Bryan weighs 234¾ pounds. The result of the full dinner pail.

San Francisco appears to have more than her share of undesirable citizens.

Jim Hill's prediction that we shall soon have two men for one job instead of two jobs for one man is about to be verified in San Francisco.

Perhaps the public are not more desirous of seeing Pat Calhoun go to jail than of seeing him drive Agitator Cornelius to honest work.

Apropos the production of "Agamemnon" at Harvard and "Dr. Faustus" at Princeton, the New York Sun suggests that at a time when undue prominence is given to college sport it is worth while to notice these less advertised forms of undergraduate activity. Therefore let us not neglect to notice the revival at Stanford of Boucicault's great claptrap melodrama "London Assurance."

If we were reasonably certain that when the soup-kitchen era returns the demagogues and agitators wouldn't be eating three square meals a day the outlook would not be quite so exasperating.

Justice of the Peace Treadwell is in favor of an ordinance excluding from employment on the street railroads men who have not resided in the city at least one year. One that would prohibit all public servants from bidding for the labor vote would give much more satisfaction.

Abe Ruef on trial before a judge who had to think twice before excusing E. P. E. Troy would excite our profound sympathy if it were not for the fact that he tried to make a judge out of Jim Gallagher.

Perhaps Mr. Corey will find that making the best of his marriage with Mabel Gilman is a form of discipline that may be of some value even to a character that is full of blowholes.

The Child Spy

A Story of the French Siege

(Translated from the French of Alphonse Daudet)

His name was Stenne, little Stenne.

He was a Paris child, weakly and pale, who might be ten years old, or perhaps fifteen; with that class of urchin, it is impossible to tell. His mother was dead; his father, an old marine, had charge of a square in the vicinity of the Temple. The babies and nurses, the old ladies with campstools, the poor mothers, all the slow moving Paris which takes refuge from vehicles in the gardens surrounded by pavements, knew Father Stenne and adored him. They were aware that his rough moustache—the terror of dogs and of loiterers—hid a tender, almost maternal, smile, and that, to see this smile, one had only to say to the old fellow:

"How is your little boy?"

Father Stenne loved his boy so much! He was so happy every evening, after school, when the child came to meet him, and they went the round of the walks together, stopping at each seat to bow to the habitués, and to respond to their greetings.

With the Siege everything, unfortunately, was changed. Father Stenne's square garden was closed, petroleum was stored there, and the poor man—forced to keep constant watch—spent his time among the ruined and torn up business, alone, without his pipe, and only saw his boy when he arrived home very late in the evening. So you should have seen his moustache when he talked of the Prussians. . . . As for little Stenne, he did not complain much of this new life.

A Siege! What an amusing thing for street-boys! No more school! No more classes! Continual holidays, and the streets like a fair. . . .

The child ran about the streets till evening. He accompanied the regiments of the district when they went to the ramparts, choosing those by preference which had a good band; on that subject little Stenne was an authority. He would tell you quite truly that the band of the 96 degree was not worth much, but that the 55 degree had an excellent one. At other times he would watch the guards being drilled; then there were the lines of people waiting. . . .

His basket on his arm, he joined in those long files which formed in the dim light of the winter mornings without gas at the entrance to the butchers' and the bakers' shops. There with one's feet in the puddles one made acquaintances and talked politics, and as M. Stenne's son, everyone asked his opinion. But most amusing of all was the cork game, that famous game of "galoche" which the Breton guards had made fashionable during the siege. When the little Stenne was not on the ramparts nor at the bakers' shops you were sure to find him at the game of "galoche" in the Chateau-d'Eau Square. He would not be playing, of course; that required too much money. But he watched the players with all his eyes.

One in particular, a big boy in a blue blouse, who put on nothing but five franc pieces, excited his admiration. When that fellow ran one could hear the money clinking at the bottom of his blouse. . . .

One day, picking up a coin which had rolled under the feet of little Stenne, the big boy whispered to him: "That makes you stare, does it? . . . Well, if you like, I will tell you where to find some like it."

The game over, he drew him into a corner of the square and proposed to him to come and sell newspapers to the Prussians, one made thirty francs a day. At first Stenne refused, very indignant; and after the shock remained three days without returning to watch the game. Those were three terrible days, he could not sleep nor eat. All night he saw a heap of corks piled up at the bottom of his bed, and shining five franc pieces rolling away on the ground. The temptation was too strong. The fourth day he returned to the Chateau-d'Eau, met the big boy again, and allowed himself to be persuaded. . . .

They started on a snowy morning, canvas sacks on their shoulders, the newspapers hidden under their blouses. When they arrived at the Flanders gate it was hardly light. The big boy took Stenne by the hand, and going up to the sentry—a good stay-at-home fellow with a red nose and an amiable expression—he said to him in a whining voice: "Do let us pass, Sir. . . . Our mother is ill, papa is dead. I want to go with my little brother to find potatoes to dig up in the field."

He was crying. Stenne, terribly ashamed, kept his head down. The sentry looked at them for a moment, then glanced at the white deserted road.

"Pass quickly," he said, getting out of the way; and they were on the Aubervilliers road. How the big boy laughed!

Dimly, as though in a dream, little Stenne saw manufactories which had been transformed into barracks, deserted barricades covered with wet rags, and long chimneys which made holes in the fog and mounted to the sky, empty, and notched. From time to time they passed a sentinel, hooded officers who looked through opera-glasses into the distance, and little tents wet through with snow which had melted before the dying fires. The big boy knew the roads, and went across fields to escape the guard-houses. Nevertheless they arrived, without being able to avoid it, at the main guard of the sharpshooters. The sharpshooters, in their little cloaks, were squatting at the bottom of a ditch full of water all along the Soissons railway line. This time it was in vain that the big boy began his story, they would not let them pass. However, while he was crying, an old sergeant, white-haired and wrinkled, and rather like Father Stenne, came out of the gate-keeper's house:

"There, little chaps, don't cry any more!" he said to the children; "you can go to your potatoes; but first, come and warm yourselves. . . . that rascal there looks frozen!"

Alas! It was not cold which made little Stenne tremble, it was fear, it was shame. . . . In the guard-house they found some soldiers crouching round a scanty fire, a really miserable fire, at the flame of which they were thawing some biseuit at the end of their bayonets. They squeezed themselves closer together to make room for the children. They gave them a drop of cognac and a little coffee. While they were drinking it an officer came to the door, called the sergeant, spoke to him in a whisper and went away quickly.

"Boys!" said the sergeant, returning radiant. . . . "there will be hot work tonight. . . . We have

Saltus and the Gods

By Theodore Bonnet

After reading "The Lords of the Ghostland—a History of the Ideal," the latest work from the pen of Edgar Saltus and the press of Mitchell Kennerly, I find myself asking myself, What is it all aimed at and why? Not a very pleasant question to have to address to oneself since it may cause one to doubt the acuteness of one's faculty of perception. Especially is it unpleasant after reading an author of whose sanity and seriousness there can be no question; one whose ability to make himself intelligible is acknowledged by competent critics. Though distinctly and intentionally a mannerist, a self-conscious artist whose affectations are sometimes obtrusive, Saltus is nevertheless one of our lords of language, somewhat celebrated for the purple and pomp of his prose. He is usually good reading, but in his latest work he is mystifying, not in what he says but in his motive. He tells us that "The Lords of the Ghostland" is a history of the ideal, but to me it appears to be more in the nature of a didactic and dogmatic treatise on the origin and growth of religions. This is a theme which has engaged the attention of many European scholars in recent years most of whom have approached it reverently and discussed it in no iconoclastic spirit. But Saltus, who has been pretty well impregnated with the virus of German metaphysics, has produced a work pervaded by a spirit akin to that which Thomas Inman reveals in his sneering history of Ancient Pagan and Modern Christian Symbolism. Saltus begins his work by telling us that the ideal is the essence of poetry and that poetry in the virginal innocence of the world meant discourse of the gods, but of that discourse he has nothing to say, and he is not very lucid as to the manner in which conceptions of the divinity in all ages inspired poetry. He simply traces what he calls "the genealogy of the divine," starting with the assertion that it was in the evolution of the demoniac that the divine appeared. As a study of the genesis of religion this work is quite interesting in material if not in the style, which is too emphatically characteristic with its jerky short sentences that impart a telegraphic tone. However, one cannot but take an interest in the author's blithe speculations on and gladsome flirtations with the inscrutable. He revels in the religious fancies of the infant world like a famished city nag browsing in a summer pasture of lush and nutritious grasses. Though he affects a calm dispassionate air, the reader can perceive beneath the mask, not obscurely, a smile of derision. Obviously his purpose is to make people start as does the precocious child who says naughty things. That the work is the result, as it shrewdly purports, of very profound original research, may be doubted, for it abounds in ideas that are far from unfamiliar. Even some of the phrases are reminiscent. For example he tells us that the world has come to regard the gods as diseases of language. That is exactly what Max Muller calls those religious traditions which, according to some authorities, embody a purely fanciful system of symbolism and which some attribute to fetishism and animism. It is to be inferred that Saltus believes with many other writers that most religious traditions are the fanciful presentations of natural phenomena, and that they are almost entirely due to the operations of the imaginative faculty induced principally by awe and fear. But he has not entirely overlooked the significance of the fact that while in the various cosmogonies we find childish tales on one hand and philosophical abstractions on the other, there are some things which have become interwoven with universal tradition. The books of the Zoroaster, the annals of the Chinese, the Edda of the Scandinavians and the priests of Tibet; all recapitulate the crimes of the evil deity, of the short period of man's felicity and the calamities that followed his loss of innocence. As some one has suggested, in order to distinguish among a number of paintings, the original from the copy, we must look for that which in its ensemble, or in the perfection of its parts, exhibits the genius of the master, and this is precisely what is to be found in the book of Genesis—the prototype of the many stories of creation met with in popular tradition. But Mr. Saltus has not been very much impressed by the Scriptures. He tells us that the Hindu and Chaldean beliefs constituted the two primal inspirational faiths and that the religions that followed "were afterthoughts of the divine." There is a good deal of this kind of flippant theology in the book, and many mysterious things are explained so clearly that one wonders how anyone could ever have been perplexed by them. Much of what Mr. Saltus tells us of the religious beliefs of the ancients is not to be questioned, but his deductions and suggestions are. The fact is that the results of the most recent archaeological research do not disprove the theory of the latest school of modern thinkers interested in what is known as the science of comparative religion: that the advance of religion among men was a process of continuous evolution taking place under divine guidance. The action of purely natural forces in the development is freely admitted, yet the idea of a divine disclosure of truth is not excluded. This is the composite theory which is being accepted by a large and continually increasing number of modern scholars. That Mr. Saltus has kept in touch with the progress of modern historical research I am inclined to doubt. One reason for this inclination is that speaking of Moses he says, "Seen through modern criticism his figure fades though his name persists." The very latest modern criticism is to be found in "A Dictionary of the Bible," edited by James Hastings and published by T. and T. Clark of Edinburgh. This work represents the best kind of modern scholarship, at once sober and progressive, not religious but scientific in method and reverent in temper. One of the most interesting articles which it contains is by Professor Kautzsch who says it is noteworthy that the most searching criticism only sets the personality of Moses in stronger relief; that he was the real founder of Israel's religion and that there is nothing improbable in the tradition which claims that he received a revelation from God together with the power to act upon it. I heartily recommend this Dictionary of the Bible to Mr. Saltus. He may find in it much that will persuade him to alter his convictions about the teachings of the founder of Christianity, or at least render him less cocksure in the deductions with which he does his work and which have nothing whatever to do, so far as I can ascertain, with any ideal. Nevertheless they are sparkling and some of the epigrams might easily be used to spice conversation. One of the best of them is in the next to the final paragraph: "Death, it may be, is not merely a law but a place, perhaps a garage which the traveller reaches on a demolished motor, but whence none can proceed until all scores are paid." For paradox, too, Saltus has a knack, and for crisp cynical comment he has true genius.

The Irreverent Reporters

Are the reporters becoming irreverent of the achievements of Mr. Francis Heney? I hope not, but I hae me doots. Certain lines and phrases that have crept into the newspaper columns recently have awakened grave suspicions in my mind. The ways of the reporter are an open book to me. I can discern his moods and tenses afar off. And for those moods and tenses, I have great respect. The reporter, the enthusiastic reporter, is not to be judged by his paper, for the newspaper is often merely the symbol of some capitalist who moulds public opinion on a financial basis, whereas the reporter who has faith in his profession is an idealist with scruples beyond the ken of his employer. His views do not always accord with the policy of the paper, and this fact you may glimpse at times in an item of six lines. The reporter sees so much of the background of things and so much of the motives and mental processes of men that his perceptive faculty is more acute than that of the average mortal, and when he forms a conclusion that he is not privileged to print he is very apt to contrive a subtle hint of it. It is because I have caught what I conceived to be subtle hints of a cynical tone that I ask whether the reporters have become irreverent of the achievements of Mr. Heney. Some days ago, apropos the acquittal of Binger Hermann in Oregon of one of the charges against him growing out of the land frauds, a reporter quoted Mr. Heney to the effect that he would go to Oregon as soon as he could find time and attend to the prosecution of Hermann. It was as though Mr. Heney had said, "Watch me! I'll show 'em how to get a conviction." In another item some reporter said that Henry Ach was eager for Heney to take up the prosecution of Ruef because he knew he could incite Heney to speechmaking every few minutes.

The Deference Due

Whatever the reporters may think of Mr. Heney they would find it somewhat difficult to persuade us that we have been worshipping a brummagem idol instead of a true deity. We judge a man's ability by what he accomplishes. And Heney promises to accomplish a great deal. He cannot be successfully disparaged by pointing out that he was on the road to a monumental fiasco until Burns and a false friend of the grafters brought about the trapping of Lonergan. It will not do to say that if the newspapers had not joined hands and coerced the courts into co-operation with the prosecution that Heney would have stood no more chance than a cat in the lower regions without claws. Results are all that we care to know about. Meanwhile the reporters should forbear and treat Mr.

Heney with great deference. They should have no sympathy with the bloated bondholders of the Pacific Union Club which, though himself a member, Mr. Heney has publicly proclaimed the home of graft-sympathizers and bribe givers. Mr. Heney may be injudicious in his speechmaking but I think there is inspiration in his occasional addresses. He is the edifying representative of the healthful, invigorating and boisterous forces of virtue.

Coleman Still a Social Idol

There is a cotillion club in town that numbers Supervisor Dan Coleman among its members. For this it would be hypercritical, perhaps, to denounce the cotillion club; almost like breaking a butterfly on a wheel, in fact. Besides, Supervisor Dan Coleman is still a member of quite a fashionable parlor of the Native Sons and it is excusable for a cotillion club to tolerate his name on its list as long as the Natives show a disposition to stand for him. But that is not the point. This cotillion club includes none in its membership who belongs to that Society with capital letters which is supposed to be the only society worth while. True, its dances always command considerable space in the newspapers, but that is because the enterprising fellow who runs the club always held them in the Maple Room at the Palace and has already pulled off one in the magnificent ballroom at the Fairmont. Give a function the proper setting and it can always claim space in our papers. Besides, this enterprising fellow always supplies the papers with pictures of pretty girls who attend his parties and that is a bait no city editor in town can resist.

No Snub For Boodler Dan

Well, not having that social distinction which would secure for it the attention of the society bavardes this club does not have to take itself seriously in such a little matter as this of retaining a self-confessed bribe-taker on its list of members. But that is not the point either. The point is that Supervisor Dan Coleman is so incapable of shame, so absolutely fails to realize his disgraceful position that he has the hardihood to attend the dances of this club and to mingle, seemingly on the same old terms of cordiality, with the men and women who have found him out. This despite the fact that District Attorney Langdon and more than one other person intimately connected with the graft prosecution are also members of the club. The other night during the dance at the Fairmont Supervisor Dan Coleman was as conspicuous, as obviously satisfied with himself and with the company he found himself in as he would have been had not everyone known that he had coldbloodedly sold himself body and soul to a corporation within twenty-four hours after taking office. This would be a mighty pleasant story to tell if someone at that dance had only snubbed Supervisor Dan Coleman. But no one did. The women danced with him and the men smiled and chatted with him. I don't know whether his brazen assurance or their complacent friendliness is more shocking. Truly your San Franciscan is a strange compound.

How Kelly Swindled Kearny

My contemporary the Knave of the Oakland Tribune relates that the late Denis Kearny was swindled by the somewhat remote Michael Joseph Kelly, which reminds me of one of the humorous transactions by which the noted agitator was victimized. One day Kearny heard of an old house that was for sale, and he said to Kelly, "If I had a lot I'd buy that house and fix it up."

"Move it over on my lot," said Kelly, "and you can have it rent free until such time as you feel like buying it. You can have it for a few hundred."

As the lot was worth at least a thousand dollars, Kearny gladly accepted the proposition. He moved the house and spent several hundred dollars in repairs. When the work was finished Kelly moved in and Kearny never was able to get the house back.

Our Wealth of Song

If for poetry, as we are told, there is no longer any demand, how strange and illogical the unabated fructuousness of the melodious muse! Scarcely a week passes without bringing to my table a new volume of poetry, redolent of the press, modestly inviting dispassionate judgment. The inexorable laws of supply and demand are not in my opinion contemptuously ignored by the bards who thus pour along the tide of song. Not in California at any rate is the Orphean lyre swept in vain. This is the land of versification as well as of sunshine. If the statisticians at Washington were not hopelessly insensible to the higher aims of existence; if they tabulated verse as well and as accurately as they tabulate wheat, the world would know that more temples are legitimately adorned with bays in California than in any other state in the union. And no measly minor poets are the bards of California, but first-class odesmiths that sweep the lyre with master hands, imbuing all things with a rich golden color, shutting out the humiliating consciousness of the insignificant present and investing this bare and grisly skeleton we call life and the world with hues and aspects of beauty that elevate the starving soul. Have we not with us always Poet Joaquin Miller, the Laureate of Fruitvale, who made the Sierras famous? Poet Miller has made poetry his vocation. Since the death of Walt Whitman he is the only living American with the courage to look and act like a poet. Most of our poets are gentlemen in prosaic shoes who make verses in odd hours stolen from the serious concerns of life, but Miller sings on the spur. He would be a poet to his valet if he had one. Then we have George Sterling who looks like Dante and enchains and overwhelms us with the gorgeousness of his imagination, and whose verse is as majestic as the rolling of the spheres. Mr. Sterling is so true a poet that he quit his desk in the counting-house to give all his time to his muse on the shores of Monterey bay where he raises chickens on the side between stanzas. And who has not been soothed and ennobled by the verse of that sweet singer Ina Coolbrith, with whom poetry is the outgushing of a soul whose existence is melody? From that soul poetry gushes forth spontaneously as song from the throat of a mocking-bird that gives voice to the music with which its whole being is throbbing.

Two Poets

We should be proud of our poets, even the smallest of them, for we have it on high pontifical authority that all poets are worthy of worship since they have talked with God. A man is a poet in proportion as the light of inspiration has fallen direct from heaven into his brain, making it conceive with the secret monitions of the Infinite. But I find myself digressing garrulously and all because I have come into possession of two new books of verse. Two weeks ago I received the verse of Agnes Tobin, peerless interpreter of Petrarch. A week later came the poems of William Norman Guthrie, and now I have before me the melodious messages of Louis Alexander Robertson and Edward Robeson Taylor. These are poets of more than a local reputation. Robertson's work is well known to readers of Town Talk for nearly everything that he has written made its first appearance in these columns. To Alexander Robertson, the San Francisco publisher, we are indebted for the publication of his poetry between book covers. That there has always been sufficient demand for Louis Robertson's verse to justify the publishing of it is evident from the fact that of three volumes two were out of print at the time of the fire, and the first entitled "The Dead Calypso and Other Verse" was in such great demand that stray volumes in second-hand bookstores sold for as high as five dollars. The volume just issued is entitled "Through Painted Panes and Other Poems," and is dedicated "To James Duval Phelan, an able man and loyal citizen" to whom is inscribed the poem "Resurgam" which was published in these columns some weeks after the fire. The book contains "The Dead Calypso," "Ataxia," "Evolution" and several other of the more popular of Robertson's verse and some admirable new poems. Robertson is noted for his predisposition to voluptuous themes, for the smoothness and music of his verse and for his power in describing the ecstasies of sensual passion. All these qualities are to be found in this volume. But there is something else characteristic of Robertson's verse; his knack of utilizing in words a vibrant force inaudible in them singly, but of great power and charm when they are made to pulsate together.

"The Sonnet"

Like all true poets Robertson has proved his skill as a maker of sonnets. Indeed he has achieved a perfection in them that is to be found in nothing else that he has done despite his genius for technique in almost every form of verse. And there is nothing in all his many and varied samples of workmanship that so strongly appeals to me as these fourteen decasyllabic lines on "The Sonnet:—"

As often in some grand and ancient fane
A devotee will kneel him down to pray
At one familiar shrine day after day,
And to his guardian saint his woes complain;
There while his fingers tell the beaded chain,
His soul in ecstasy drifts far away,
Till back returning with the vesper strain,
It enters once again its home of clay.

So in the cloistered corridors of Song
There is one altar where I love to kneel;
Tho' humblest of the worshipers who throng
Its narrow space, yet there I often steal,
And in the Sonnet's sacred chalice pour
My tears and prayers until I weep no more.

Poet Taylor

And now I come to Mr. Edward Robeson Taylor, a man whose talents are of infinite variety. Once a doctor by profession, now a lawyer, but always a poet, he has written much that is spirited, but little that stirs the emotions. He is not a man of brilliant fancy, nor of great inventive faculty, but he has a gift for ornamenting facts and platitudes. A lover of the external world he is alive to the charms of nature, but it is evident that in him the power of reflection predominates over the power of senses. He has versified about romantic spots he has visited, but he hasn't put the spirit of romance into his lines. In this new volume, which by the way, is also one of A. M. Robertson's publications, is collected many of the poems that appeared shortly before the fire in an edition that was almost totally destroyed. One of the most ambitious of the poems is entitled "Into the Light," which contains much solidity of thought and some good lines, as for example:

In these unclouded heavens no stars we see.
Yet all roll there in sovran majesty;
So, when the sky seems reft of every star,
In quenchless light they still may live for thee. . . .

The bubbles dancing on convivial wine,
The restful dewdrops on the procraint vine,
But symbolize each being life has known:
All vanish at a breath and leave no sign.

Divine expression of the mind, divine,

Poet Taylor is among those children of the Muses who are very much addicted to the sonnet, and he shows a fine facility in this exacting form. He has written a series of sonnets on San Francisco none of which so much appeals to me or is comparable with this one entitled "Music":

The murmurous monotone of waving grain
When winds are gently winging down the vale;
The storm-voiced billows drowning men bewail;
The pattering stroke of softly falling rain;
The sighing leaves that bend to every tale
The breezes tell; the songsters, lilting strain,
From feeblest note of all the joyful train
To rapturous burst of peerless nightingale;—
What are all these, and all that human ear
In sweetest concord from their kin can hear,
But hints of deeper rhythms as yet unheard;
That in the soul ineffable of things
An ordered Music, by the eternal word
Throughout the vast of space divinely sings.

Were he less a philosopher Mr. Taylor would be more of a poet.

Highbrow

In a recent issue of the New York Sun Will Irwin is credited with having invented the term "highbrow" to signify a person of superior mental attainments in contradistinction to a lowbrowed person of ordinary ability. Which reminds me that there is nothing new under the sun. In a little volume in my possession, published in England nearly twenty years ago, and containing samples of the numerous kinds of nonsense verse written by the great poets I find it stated that the custom of using compound words was very prevalent in Ben Jonson's time and that he called them un-in-one-breath-utterable; also that the practice was common among the Sophists and that it drew from Scaliger the following satire:

Lofty-brow-flourishers,
Nose-in-beard-wallowers,
Bag-and-beard-nourishers,
Dish-and-all-swallowers,
Old-cloak-investitors,

Craft-lucubrationers
Youth-chasers, word-catchers, vain-glory-osophers,
Such are your seekers-of-virtue philosophers.

of an Alameda friend of mine may throw some light upon the question. Last week his wife secured through a Missionary society the services of a Japanese boy. She was assured that he was a devout Christian. He added his testimony to that of the Mission people and insisted that he must have ample time on Sundays for attendance on Bible classes and sermons. Now this Alamedan has in his parlor a Buddha brought from Japan. It is an unusually fine specimen. On the first morning that the devout Jap worked in the house the mistress of it was sitting in a corner of the parlor reading. The Japanese passed through the room, and the first thing that caught his eye was the Buddha. He started in astonishment, then doffed his cap. He stood devoutly before the image for several minutes, then went up to it and reverently touched it before passing out of the room. Servants being hard to obtain, his mistress overlooks his hypocrisy, and sticks to her agreement to let him have plenty of time on Sundays for the development of his soul.

Did Teddy Interfere?

There has been some discussion of the lightness of the sentence imposed by Judge de Haven last week on Frank Mukai, the Mill Valley Japanese school boy who was arrested for sending an indecent letter to a little girl who attended the same school with him. Some maintain that if the President had sent direct orders to the United States Attorney's office directing that nothing be done to offend the Japanese greater consideration could not have been shown. Mukai's attorney made a plea for clemency, urging that the boy was too young to realize the nature of his offense. He is seventeen, as the immigration records show, although in court he gave his age as fifteen. No opposition to the request for clemency was made by the Government. Assistant District Attorney Ben McKinley handed the offensive letter to Judge de Haven, who, after reading it, fined Mukai seventy-five dollars. As a rule McKinley volubly opposes pleas for clemency, or any motions in favor of criminals made by their attorneys. On this occasion he was mute to the evident surprise of Judge de Haven, who had settled back prepared to listen to a lengthy argument in support of sending Mukai to jail. Although Mukai now realizes that he must not send indecent letters to young girls the reason for such prohibition is totally beyond his comprehension. Ever since his arrest he has looked upon the affair as a very amusing joke, albeit rather an expensive one.

The Letter That Provoked a Roar

This is a story of how a Native Son vented some of the feeling that he has against the English. Two or three weeks ago a young lawyer in Pennsylvania was horsewhipped by a woman who mistook him for her husband. Ungallantly, as some think, very properly, as others maintain, the lawyer struck back. The Bulletin had an editorial on the subject, "Is a man ever justified in striking a woman?" using the Pennsylvania incident as a text. The Bulletin chivalrously took the side of the female, saying that the retaliation was not justifiable under any circumstances. Then began a deluge of letters. People with very strong views in the matter wrote to the Bulletin, arguing both sides of the case with considerable heat. Among the letters that attracted the most attention was one signed "Briton." The writer of this letter defended the action of the Pennsylvania lawyer, saying that the woman deserved all she got. Moreover, he expressed at great length his opinion of woman in general, calling her a weak creature, not only a dependent of man, but intended by nature and the Almighty to be entirely subservient to the stronger sex in all things. There was no equivocation about the letter. Woman, according to the Briton, should have no voice in anything, and would be all the better for an occasional beating, which would make her realize her place in the world. It may be imagined that "Fair Play," "Defender," and a host of other correspondents fulminated savagely against the brutal writer of this reactionary letter. They called him a beast, a barbarian, a relic of the middle ages. They wondered if he ever had a mother, and expressed pity for his wife should some woman be so unfortunate as to be married to him. Also, they lambasted the English, taking his attitude as that of Britons in general toward woman. All of this was immensely pleasing to the writer of the letter, who is a Native Son. He does not like the British, his ideas of them being derived from the school histories of thirty years ago. He took this method of bringing obloquy upon them, and it must be said that he succeeded.

The Call's Startling Announcement

Last Monday morning the Call devoted one-half its front page to the announcement that in all matters appertaining to the street railroad strike it would eschew favorites and give space to faithful and truthful reports of both sides. This announcement was most gratifying to many people, and it probably struck none of them with amazement. Yet it was an announcement of remarkable and curious significance. Fancy a great American daily newspaper conceiving it to be of importance solemnly and soberly to inform its readers that it had resolved to assume an unbiased and unprejudiced attitude in a controversy of vital importance to a whole community, in a conflict pregnant with riot and bloodshed! Perhaps the Call would

It should first be determined what the functions of a newspaper are. Judging from the policy of the local press the functions of a newspaper may be performed without promoting an enlightened public opinion by telling the whole truth.

An Agitator's Logic

Agitator Cornelius tells us that the carmen struck because they were getting only fifty cents a day more than the unskilled laborers employed on the streets. This fact he offers as indisputable evidence of the unfairness of the company. But this is not very good logic. In the fixing of wages nowadays the unions do not permit discrimination between skilled and unskilled labor. The third-rate bricklayer receives as much money as the premier at his trade. Demands for higher wages are backed up by nothing but ability to coerce but the cost of living is sometimes urged as a persuasive factor. In these circumstances the wages paid to laborers cannot be taken as a criterion by which to estimate a fair rate of wages for carmen unless it be to determine whether at the present cost of living it is possible to exist on the amount of wages paid by the railroad company. And it is obvious that if a laborer finds no difficulty in living on 2.50 a day a conductor should manage pretty well on about fifty cents more. Far be it from me to favor a reduction of any man's wages. I prefer to put in a plea for the poor laboring man. If we are to favor the demands of labor unions on sentimental grounds as they expect us to do when they assert that the laborer is worthy of his hire and that he should be enabled to have some luxuries and that we should ignore the eternal cold-blooded fundamental economic laws, then for the life of me I cannot see why we should discriminate against the pick-and-shovel brigade. I have as much if not more sympathy for the toilers of that brigade than for the representatives of any trade.

The Prejudice Against Police

With the carmen's strike came the announcement from Chief Dinan that he would not station policemen on the cars under any circumstances. And not one word of criticism did this announcement evoke. I am surprised that it wasn't received with applause, for we have been educated up to the belief that it would be an outrageous perversion of justice to flaunt the police badge of authority in the faces of the strikers. But why should it be assumed that a policeman's star has the same effect on a law-abiding union workingman as a red flag on a bull? The star is an emblem of authority that every decent citizen should respect. If as Agitator Cornelius said the strikers earnestly hoped that there should be no disturbance of the peace, then they should have cordially approved the giving of police protection to the cars. In such a crisis as this they should be fearful of a disturbance being provoked by misguided sympathizers. But no sane man believes in the sincerity of a professional agitator when he says that strikes are opposed to disturbances. If the strikers were opposed to disturbances they would not gather at the car barns and seek to intimidate non-union workmen whose rights and privileges are ended with fully as much sanctity as those of the representatives of organized labor. The fact is, as everybody knows, the carmen did not go on the strike with the expectation of winning through the inability of Calhoun to find competent workmen.

Our Recreant Mayor

The authorities of this city are entirely to blame for the blood that has been shed in this strike. To affect sincerity in any other view is to deal in hypocrisy and cant. The authorities knew that the peace would be broken as soon as a car was sent out, and it should not have been made necessary for the railroad company to equip its cars with a crew of gun men. Those men were employed to shoot because our infamous Mayor, firm in his determination to masquerade as the friend of organized labor and recreant to his trust refused to give the property of the corporation the protection guaranteed by the laws of the state. The presence of those armed men on the street cars was a challenge to the anarchistic element of the city. Mayor Schmitz was aware of the challenge. Chief Dinan was aware of the challenge. In the circumstances the imminence of trouble was obvious, and it might have been averted by exhibiting on the cars the symbol of authority. That symbol under which law and order are enforced is the only proper warning against violence and to withhold it when violence is threatened is a crime; it is the crime of which Mayor Schmitz stands convicted.

Two Epitaphs In One

Great are the terrors that distract the soul
Of each that in this ground has found his goal.
For here Cornelius lies, a city's pest,
With one exception worse than all the rest.
That one exception lies in this same ground,
The mortal coil of bluster and of sound.
'Tis Pin Head's grave as everybody knows;
Everybody who hasn't lost his nose.

ests of the world. "I went East," said Sutro, "to interest capital in some very solid California enterprises, and I have returned in a very much discouraged frame of mind. The men that place American and European capital cannot be induced even to discuss the character of investments in this state. 'Come again some other time,' was about all that they'd say, unless it was to explain that owing to unsettled labor conditions in this city it was deemed advisable to find investments elsewhere. The impression prevails all over the East that San Francisco has been ruined by grafters and strikers and that the situation of the city is hopeless." Mr. Sutro says that financially the state is in a very badly crippled condition; that we need twice as many millions as we have to finance our industries and that they are not forthcoming. There is much in this melancholy situation to stimulate reflection in the minds of the "dear general public" for whom the newspapers are now expressing deep concern.

Overheard on the Ferry Boat

Tom—Hullo, Jerry, how are you getting on?

Jerry—Great! I'm getting big pay and having bully times. How's it going with you?

Tom—Fine—making lots of money and living on the best, but I'll be doing better in a month or two.

Jerry—How's that?

Tom—Oh, we're going out on another strike and of course we can't lose.

A Fight to the Finish

More and more as the strikefest develops does it become apparent to the man on the housetop that the present local struggle is a fight to a finish—not between capital and labor but between employers and such labor thimble riggers as McCarthy and Cornelius, men who have been turning the screws to the limit. May day is the great annual seismic period for labor disturbances the world over, as witness the present upheavals in France, Germany, Japan, Russia, Southern Europe and our own states, east and west. So it seems quite natural that some half dozen local unions should choose that date to strike: quite natural, too, is it that some of the employers should decline to accede to their demands, though by so doing they hazard our reputation for being the greatest union labor city in the country. That is why the eyes of every cardholder in the Federation of Labor, U. S. A., are fixed good naturedly on the contests now going on in this heretofore go-as-you-please civic centre. Perhaps it is likewise a pardonable interest in these same contests that is rushing hither some half dozen of the big leaders in international labor affairs. State labor leaders are also evincing a strong interest in the special labor councils now being hurriedly called here. Quite naturally and in the same sympathetic line, too, the state authorities as if anticipating all these impulsive movements have recently concentrated the militia companies hereabouts from a listless, straggling, non dependable aggregation of corporal's squads into a compact, dependable, well officered regiment, a regiment at this writing under orders to be prepared for service and to move at one hour's notice. Right in line with the springtime flood of martial preparedness General Funston arrives from the East and at once begins to organize a satisfactory staff at the Presidio. That his soldiers are prepared to move at an hour's notice goes without saying.

The Issue at Stake

Quite naturally too Charles M. Schwab comes out on a flying visit from the East to inspect his Tonopah mines, a matter of a couple of hours. Naturally he finds time to pay a flying visit to San Francisco and brings along Donald B. Gillies to talk mining. En route of course they meet several well known San Franciscans and they discuss—things. Mr. Schwab lunches at the Fairmont and quite naturally meets other prominent local leaders who have accidentally dropped into the same place for a noon-day snack. Follows an automobile ride and Mr. Schwab somehow meets several other parties interested in the city's welfare. Then comes the famous interview in which he declares that the Union Iron Works will never reopen till the labor union condition in San Francisco is changed for the better. Calhoun, Scott, and the metal employers were not among those who accidentally met Mr. Schwab but somehow he voiced their sentiments, and voiced them strongly. Such union of thought can only be explained by a mysterious telepathic sympathy now resident in the city's atmosphere; somehow it reaches the leaders among the employers as well as the leaders among the labor elements, even those hastening here from the far east. All these things seem quite natural to the man on the housetop—and portentous. There be big things doing, things fraught with tremendous consequences, and San Francisco is the battleground. The issue will be the reign of the unbridled McCarthys and Corneliuses or the sway of unionism within reason.

McEwen Under a Nervous Strain

Anecdotes to illustrate the varied character of Arthur McEwen are as plentiful as the issues of the notable papers on which he worked. He was of a generous highly wrought nature, of quick mentality, nervously sensitive to his surroundings to a high degree. I remember riding down town on a Sutter street car with him some years ago. A big public question was at issue and McEwen, with his usual vehemence, at once plunged into his views on it. At the critical point of his deepest logical conclusions along came the conductor, paused in front of him and methodically rang up several fares. McEwen jumped up in a towering rage, exclaiming, "Why do they allow such blithering idiots to make so much noise on these street cars. I'll never ride on one again," and he jumped from the moving car. His action marked one of the nervous conditions into which he occasionally fell from overwork. To counteract this, from time to time, he dropped his pen and boldly plunged into flat physical labor. In this instance he left the city a few days later, went up to Mariposa county, donned overalls and a blouse and worked with pick and shovel in one of the mines for two months.

Solving the Labor Problem

Shortly after he came to the city to take-up newspaper work after quitting the rollicking surroundings of the Comstock he became the very soul of the coterie of bright wits that supplied the local press with its best stories. McEwen's fund of anecdotes, then as always, seemed inexhaustible and no one ever tired of hearing them delivered in his inimitable vein. Money was not so plentiful in those days but it seemed to go further with those prodigal spirits for they lived on promise. One day two of them were in a cafe discussing the best way to spend a ten-dollar gold piece which one of them had borrowed. Opinion was divided, so they flipped the gold piece to decide the question. The flying piece struck the wall ricocheted at several angles and disappeared somewhere. They had been vainly hunting it for some time when McEwen blithely entered. They pathetically related their dreadful predicament. McEwen's eye roved over the room and then tentatively regarded the condition of his cronies. "Its evidently up to me to find the money," he concluded, "and I'm better fitted to spend it. However this is a case of mind against matter: Why work while others are willing and able?" "Jimmie, oh, Jimmie," he called, and Jimmie, the janitor, soon appeared. "Jimmie," McEwen continued, solemnly, "Con just tossed up two ten dollar pieces in a rather reckless way and they've rolled somewhere on the floor. Find them, will you?" Jimmie dropped on his hands and knees, groped about under the tables and chairs and soon laid the ten dollar piece on the table. McEwen grabbed it. "Good boy, Jimmie. The laborer is worthy of his hire. Now dig up the other ten, Jimmie, and keep it for your trouble. Come on, boys, lets go down to Conlon's," and taking one crony on each arm he swung triumphantly out of the place.

A Specimen of London's Philosophy

I have often wondered just what brand of socialism Jack London advocates. His "My Life in the Underworld—a Confession," the first installment of which appears in an Eastern magazine, throws light upon the subject, indicating that London's economic theories are inspired by a violent aversion to manual toil. In the article mentioned he gives some pages from his life as a tramp. We have all known that at one stage of his career London was a tramp, but it has been sort of vaguely and politely supposed that he was a student tramp, associating with hoboes in order to make a study of them. According to his confession he was merely a tramp of the very ordinary kind—one of the back-door whiners who beg a hand-out, and who are kicked by irate householders and bitten by dogs trained to discern unworth. London evidently feels that in the following passage he scores eloquently against the well-to-do: "The very poor constitute the last sure recourse of the hungry tramp. The very poor can always be depended upon. They never turn away from the hungry. Time and again all over the United States have I been refused food at the big house on the hill; and always have I received food at the little shack down by the creek or the marsh, and its tired-faced mother broken with labor. Oh! you charity mongers, go to the poor and learn, for the poor alone are charitable." All of which is of some significance inasmuch as it emanates from an apostle of Socialism, a leading purveyor of the claptrap which appeals to the illiterates of the minor European states that have come to this country to assist in the redemption of the Republic. If food were never to be obtained at the big house on the hill, the professional tramp would not waste time making application there. But we know he prefers the big house on the hill to the shack by the marsh. He is very often refused at the big house on the hill, and not always because the occupants are uncharitable, but because suspicions that beget fear persuade them that it is dangerous to indulge their sympathies. Unquestionably it is better to give many times to the unworthy than ever to refuse food to the hungry, but sticking to the principle of this theory is somewhat hazardous. To discriminate occasionally is not half so contemptible as reducing the slender fare of the tired-faced mother broken with labor in the little shack down by the creek.

The Ghost of the Canteen

The Canteen question in the army, like McGinty, will not down and the Carrie Nation sisterhood that smashed the soldier's solace so recklessly have discovered a deal of rue mixed up in the spilled wine. Scarcely a week passes that the cause of the forlorn private does not receive a boost in the direction of a reconsideration by Congress. Just before his arrival here this week to take charge of the Presidio General Funston went on record as saying: "Every army officer who expresses an opinion favorable to the canteen is promptly spitted and boiled in oil, figuratively speaking, by the intolerant bigots who drove Congress into that ill-advised piece of legislation. The sale of beer in the canteen would add greatly to the contentment of the great majority of the men. It might, however, start a few young men to drinking before they otherwise would, which would of course be regrettable. The gymnasium and the amusement rooms for which Congress appropriated so liberally have not attracted the men and are largely failures.

Ruef in a New Role

In a hall misnamed Equality, situated somewhere in the heart—or rather, "saving your presence," in the belly—of this burg, the socialists are wont to meet from week to week, to the end of showing the benighted public the way to Nowhere. The happy use of the programme committee is to cause to be "stood up" on the platform such men of straw as Jordan of Stanford and Wheeler of California, as cockshots, aunt sallies, and subject them to a fire of questions, a fusillade of doctrinaire ideas; for the instruction and entertainment of the audience. Once in a blue moon the socialists go in for entertainment pure and simple, and, with this end in view, awhile since invited Abe Ruef, then at large, to be cockshot at. Mr. Ruef, from sheer force of the habit of accepting, accepted, his choice of subject "The Press." What in his righteous indignation the much indicted one would have said of the press of San Francisco will now, alas! never be known, thanks to Mr. Biggy, who, for some ungodly reason or other declined to allow the arch-entertainer to fulfill his engagement; but that it would have made the most scathing denunciation of capital by class-conscious socialists sound like milk and water moderation goes without my saying. The class-conscious ones are often said to lack all sense of humor. Gross capitalistic libel. Their secretary, under instruction, wrote to Mr. Ruef the most delicately worded note imaginable, reminding him that he was billed to appear in Equality Hall on a certain evening, and hoping that nothing would prevent him from appearing there. The idea of calling the elisor "nothing" must have appealed to the elisee as felicity itself.

The Passing Show

Thank Heaven it is all over and done with. The dogs of San Francisco have had their day; and once more we men may hope to be almost, if not quite, on a footing of equality with them. By dogs, I mean, of course, chiens de race, canine somebodies, with blood in their veins to rival the bluest ribbon that ever was; not canine nobodies, in baneful ignorance of who their grandfathers were, to say nothing of curs of low degree. Things are certainly going to the dogs with a vengeance when the handsomest of us devoted bipeds cannot diminish by so much as one the glances of admiration so lavishly bestowed upon our fourfooted rivals; and our vanity must needs go for weeks together minus its necessary three squares per diem, on a scant diet of bread and water, very bitter, nay, eating its own heart out, remembering the while, not without remorse, the many bonbons once proffered it between meals and politely declined. But enough of these humiliating reflections. The bow-wows have had theirs. This is our day. Again we may talk of ourselves, and be listened to, and not perforce of pedigreed pug or bull. She will love us, for the time being, at least, will woman, without our adoring her dog.

at all meetings of the Native Sons, must have felt a sense of disappointment on learning that Abe Ruef had sent his resignation to Rincon Parlor and that it had been accepted. That the mephistophelian boss was endowed at birth with a capacity for disappointing his enemies which has survived even the cerberus-like watchfulness of the elisor and the depressing influence of imprisonment, must be admitted; but nevertheless those whose knowledge of past performances in the Native Sons had not inclined them to unqualified approval of the order, had hoped against hope that the stubborn boss would give the society an opportunity to prove its newly tempered metal by resolutely staying in until a special commission had voted to expel him. He has not seen fit to do so, hence the disappointment. It is not that any doubt lingers as to the outcome of the proceedings looking to the determination of Ruef's fitness or unfitness to continue a member of the Native Sons. It requires less than the foresight of a Cozette to guess that, resignation or no resignation, Ruef's career in the organization was nearing its close. But in the process of eliminating him there would have developed as pretty a fight as any that has so far sprung out of the graft investigation and all the forces subject to his command would have rallied about him to save him from this disgrace. The struggle would have put all the Ruefites in the Native Sons on record in a way not accomplished during the Grand Parlor when the preliminary skirmish took place. Now that Ruef has seen fit to slice the Gordian knot while eager fingers were itching for a try at its fascinating tangle, there still remains Gallagher to be dealt with, but Holy Jim may see fit to surrender the honor of past grand prayermaster for the Native Sons without a struggle, laying down all his gold-braided regalia as meekly as his boss has done. Of course, if the society still hungers to go on record as being avid of purification and tired of politics, it may still concern itself with Mayor Schmitz and the lesser boodlers whose names remain on the roster. Nevertheless one cannot help wishing that Ruef had refrained from his extraordinary exhibition of good taste and that Gallagher will not disconcert us with a similar piece of propriety. A close contest crowned with ultimate victory for the decent element in the Native Sons would go far toward toughening the moral fibre of a society that is painfully fond of representing Californian spirit and tendencies, but that has never done so to the entire satisfaction of those natives who use the small "n."

The Browns Are Coming

I hear that the fair Mrs. Ruth McNutt Brown is soon coming to San Francisco with her husband, of whom she is very proud. When she broke off her engagement with Lieutenant Lee a few years ago some of her good, kind friends lamented the untoward termination of that love affair. They feared that Ruth would never make such a good match again. Now it will doubtless afford her great pleasure to show them that she has.

The Berkeley Symphony

At the Greek Theatre in Berkeley on Thursday of last week the eleventh Symphony Concert was given by the University Orchestra with Anton Hekking, the world-famous German 'cellist, as soloist. The symphony was Brahms' second one, less lovely perhaps in thematic material than his more popular E minor symphony, but still one of the very greatest modern works of that form. The first Allegro non troppo movement is abundantly melodious, and the suavity of its principal theme is ear-caressing. In the succeeding three movements, melody becomes less spontaneous, but the musical sequence is so beautifully preserved, the musicianly effects so admirable throughout, that one can only marvel at the frequency of the assertion that Brahms is purely academic. Mr. Hekking and his 'cello initiated us to the delights of a new concerto by Eugen d'Albert that is not only extremely grateful for the instrument, but of real musical worth. The three connected movements were each of great melodic charm, and d'Albert's skilful manipulation of orchestral effects was always apparent. The audience was quite carried away by the charm of Hekking's performance, and at its conclusion he was called and recalled until he finally reappeared with his 'cello to play the Bach "Aria" that we had heard from Petschnikoff recently. The closing orchestral numbers were Wolf's dainty "Italian Serenade" and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival." The programme for the last Symphony Concert of the season, to take place May ninth, will consist of excerpts from "Das Rheingold" and "Gotterdammerung" by Wagner, his "Kaiser-Marsch," and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

A Glorious Time Assured

A friend in the East writes me that during the absence of the Burke Cockrans in Europe such extensive alterations have been made on their Long Island home that it is now one of the summer show places of the vicinity. They expect to entertain elaborately so Linda Cadwallader who leaves this week to spend the summer as their guest is assured a glorious time. When Mrs. Cochran was Annie Ide she spent a summer at Burlingame as the guest of Mrs. Frances Carolan and as Linda Cadwallader is also a great favorite of that generous lady, the two girls came into close contact and neither absence nor marriage has caused their friendship to grow tepid. Linda Cadwallader is a very handsome, stately girl and is particularly popular with the younger matrons, her closest friends being in the married set. Her sister-in-law, Mrs. George Cadwallader (Charlotte Wilson) recently gave a dinner party in her honor.

Fashionable Sorosis

For sartorial elegance no simon pure society affair has equaled the display of brave finery at the breakfast which the Sorosis Club gave the other day at the Fairmont Hotel. I had an idea tucked in the back of my mind that club women knew more about Parliamentary Law than the cut of a gown but this gathering of some hundred women was handsomely frocked according to the last by-law of Fashion. The Red Room at the Fairmont where the breakfast was held is a happy background for an affair of this kind and it would have given the professional humorist a pain in his funny bone to see how these clubwomen violated all the time-honored traditions which have been built around them by cruel joke-smiths.

Will Rice Return

I hear that there is a Burlingame belle who is very anxious indeed to have Mr. Rice, the Boston chap, who came out here to act as best man for Oscar Cooper, return when the nuptials are finally celebrated. When Mr. Rice found that the wedding was postponed he declared that he could not arrange his affairs to come out here a second time but after lingering a few days in Burlingame he seemed to change his mind and the odds are that he will make a strenuous effort to return. Mr. Rice was very hospitably entertained during his short stay, one of the most charming affairs being the breakfast which Mrs. Frederick Kohl gave at the Burlingame Club in his honor.

The Artsimovitchs

A friend in Berlin writes me that Count and Madame Artsimovitch have entertained very elaborately this year in honor of their daughter, Miss Webster-Jones. It is a far cry from the life Mrs. Webster-Jones led in San Francisco to the position she occupies as the wife of Count Artsimovitch in Berlin. She has a delightful quality of vibrant animation which makes her conspicuous in the German capital and yet she is a favorite with the conservative nobility—a rare attainment for a foreigner. It was Madame Artsimovitch who was instrumental in Geraldine Farrar's social success and she is said to have introduced the American singer to the crown Prince. Even the Emperor's displeasure at the attentions the Prince showed the beautiful young singer did not bring Madame Artsimovitch into royal disfavor. They tell me she looks like a "stage mother" so fresh and blooming is she in spite of the fact that her daughter is old enough to present to society. Mrs. Hobbs, her mother, left San Francisco several weeks ago for an extended visit to the Artsimovitchs.

Mabel and Her Pa

It is reported that the cardiac affairs of Maybelle Gilman and W. E. Corey are soon to be solemnized at the altar and tripping on the heels of this announcement comes Maybelle's repudiation of the man Gilman, who has rushed into San Francisco print every time the actress and Corey were given space. Miss Gilman denies that he is her father and the reporters, who have inked their pens with extracts from letters written by Maybelle, have caused Charles Gilman to confess that he has never had a letter from the actress who is to marry the steel trust magnate. All of which sounds like the "If that man's father is my father's son" riddle. But the mystery was solved for me the other day at an informal luncheon which some Mills College graduates gave. One of the girls, who was at Mills with Maybelle, has just returned from Paris, and she answered the sensational interrogation "Who is May-belle Gilman, Corey's fiancée?" which a morning paper screeched in blackface type the other day. "I was having a gown tried on in a Paris shop," said the girl, who has just returned from her wander-year abroad, "when who should come in but Maybelle Gilman and her mother. I hadn't seen her since the night she recited 'Hagar' at our commencement at Mills but I recognized her in a minute and she rushed at me impulsively and kissed me like a long-lost relative. We went to a cafe for tea but neither of us touched it; we were so busy bridging over the past. I asked Maybelle why she had left the stage and she said her health was not robust—she really looks very delicate and sylph like. She is the most graceful human being who ever glided across this earth and I couldn't help remembering how awkward she was at college in spite of her obvious dramatic ability. I frankly told her what I was thinking and she said that she had worked day and night at dancing the first year on the stage. Which was my cue to quiz her about returning to the footlights but she suddenly grew embarrassed and we both got very busy with the tea things. She did not mention Mr. Corey's name but she did refer to her father, who she said was an absolute stranger to her. 'He has married again, has children of his own in San Francisco, and I wish he would seek notoriety some other way besides advertising his relationship to me,' she said. I suppose she gave out the press statement that he is not her father in order to escape that sort of thing."

Her Stage Career

In the general discussion that followed among Maybelle's (spelled "Mabel," then) old school friends, I was able to piece out a very authentic history of this young Californienne who is so aggressively in the public eye just now. Maybelle and her sister went to Mills College when they were little girls and even as a youngster Maybelle showed dramatic and musical ability. Her mother was divorced from the father and the girls were educated by an old family friend. They never mentioned their father but were devoted to the mother. Maybelle did not graduate but left Mills in her senior year to join Daly's company. It was the last visit this great manager paid San Francisco and on her own solicitation without outside influence the young Mills College girl obtained a hearing and was given a place in the chorus of one of his musical comedy companies. She was a very beautiful girl and as she could sing a little she soon rose to be one of the principals. For a brief while she enjoyed some little success, but she has never achieved any great triumph. This young woman who alienated the affections of the great trust magnate from the spouse of his youth is absolutely without magnetism when on the stage. She has a voice of pleasing quality but no dramatic ability, and when I heard her in New York about six years ago her vocal method showed that she had profited very little from the training she had received. At that time I heard that she was not very popular in the profession because of her exalted ideas of her own worth, and I recall an incident that gave color to this report. It was during a performance of a musical burlesque, "The Hall of Fame," in which Miss Gilman had a small soprano role. Her first appearance was made after causing a protracted "stage wait." The whole chorus was on the stage and Marie Dressler, the principal comedienne, was there and she was visibly annoyed by the delay. When Miss Gilman finally appeared Marie Dressler threw a few gags at her that were obviously not in the lines, and the blushes that suffused the countenance of the Californian actress indicated that she felt very much embarrassed and humiliated.

A San Rafael Runaway

I hear that Janet von Schroeder is very sensitive on the subject of the runaway in which she and her sister participated the other day. Both girls came through the mishap without a scratch but Janet, who prides herself on her horsemanship, fancies that her reputation has been marred in the fall. She is an expert equestrienne and can handle the ribbons in a coach and six as prettily as any one in these parts. Therefore she feels the humiliation of being spilled on the lawn in front of Hotel Rafael by a horse that was supposed to be gentle as a kitten. As Miss Janet had just stepped into the trap when the animal bolted and did not have the reins in control she should not feel that it was such an inglorious tumble. Her mother could scarcely restrain her from driving the same horse the next day so anxious is she to redeem her horsemanship. Both von Schroeder girls have been taught to drive by the most skilled experts in Europe and they ride equally well.

Mrs. Hearst to Return

Mrs. Phoebe Hearst expects to spend part of the summer in California, which means that her castle on the McCloud river, and the hacienda at Pleasanton will be the scene of some interesting house parties. Mrs. Hearst has developed a genius for avoiding commonplace people, and only those who work their passage with some brilliant attainment travel in her set. She

Daughters of the Confederacy

Writes my Del Monte correspondent: The Seventh Annual Convention of the California Division of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, held in the historic old town of Monterey, brought many distinguished visitors to Hotel del Monte. * * * Mrs. W. B. Pritchard, Honorary National President, who is the daughter of General Albert Sidney Johnston, was accompanied by Miss Elsie J. Pritchard. Mrs. J. de Barth Shorb, President of the Albert Sidney Johnston Chapter, Mrs. Inez Shorb White and Mrs. W. M. S. Beede came down together last Tuesday. * * * Some of the other San Francisco delegates who stopped at Del Monte were Mrs. Alfred Hunter Voorhies, National Vice-President, Mrs. W. D. Rideout, Mrs. Alexander R. Jones, Mrs. Randolph C. Miller, Miss Kathryn Bacon, Miss M. H. Foulkes, Mrs. Samuel McCartney and Mrs. E. B. Grace. Mrs. Antoinette deC. Stearns, Mrs. Frank Kimmell of the Joseph Le Conte Chapter, Berkeley, Mrs. J. Charles Harris, Miss Lydia Lee Dozier and Mrs. M. L. Morris of Oakland were also guests at Del Monte. Mrs. Albert M. Stephens, wife of Judge Stephens of Los Angeles, was one of the first arrivals. Mrs. Stephens is the President of the State Division. Other Los Angeles delegates at Del Monte were Mrs. Mathew S. Robertson, President of the Los Angeles Chapter, Miss Ryan, Mrs. J. F. Salyer, Miss Byrda McGauhey, Miss Isabel Jones, Mrs. A. J. Chandler and Miss Giletta M. Workman, and from Redlands, Mrs. C. L. Gengsay and Mrs. E. A. Stowe of the General John H. Morgan Chapter. * * * Mrs. Selden S. Wright, President Emeritus, and Organizer of the United Daughters of the Confederacy on the Pacific Coast, and Mrs. George T. Theobald were the guests of Mrs. J. P. Pryor. Mrs. Pryor, though now living in Pacific Grove, was elected a delegate from the Albert Sidney Johnston Chapter, of which she has long been an important member. * * * Mrs. Jackson Hatch, President-elect of the State Division, and Mrs. W. B. Hill, both of San Jose, were entertained during the Convention by Mrs. George F. Bodfish at her home in the Grove. * * * The following delegates were guests at the Pacific Grove Hotel: Mrs. Frank Walker, President of the Dixie Chapter of San Francisco; Mrs. C. H. Jackson, Mrs. Ada Pierce and Mrs. William Gibson of San Francisco; Mrs. C. H. Miller, Oakland; Mrs. L. J. Le Conte, Miss Sally Daingerfield, Miss Mary Ingle and Mrs. H. B. Anderson, Berkeley; Mrs. D. S. Pratt, Mrs. M. K. Harris, Fresno. * * * In honor of the delegates a reception was given in the Del Monte ballroom last Wednesday night. Many of the Post people attended, and brass buttons and gold lace added to the brilliancy of the picture. * * * Mrs. Mabel Porter Pitts Carey, who wrote a charming poem for the Daughters of the Confederacy, was a guest of her mother, Mrs. S. H. Pitts. Mrs. Pitt's son, Jack E. Pitts of St. Louis, brought his wife down in their big auto car, returning to San Francisco after the Convention.

The J. Parker Whitneys as usual have gone to Del Monte for the summer. Mr. Whitney is an enthusiastic fisherman and is anxiously looking forward to the salmon run soon expected. Besides being an expert, Mr. Whitney has written several books on the subject.

Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Oppenheimer of Paris, who were delayed on their way to Del Monte by some breakdown on a train ahead of them, telephoned for an automobile to be sent to Salinas after them, so they arrived without waiting as long as their fellow travelers.

Mrs. Charles Sedgwick Aiken who, with her little son, has been at Del Monte the last month, has gone up to the city for a few weeks but will return before she and Mr. Aiken leave for their ranch near Howell Mountain, where they expect to spend a part of the summer.

Professor G. Eisser of Stockholm, Sweden, is a guest of Professor Jacques Loeb at the Pacific Grove Hotel. * * * Captain W. Borrowe of Sausalito, who has been at this hotel for a couple of weeks, was joined a few days ago by Mrs. Borrowe and Miss Constance Borrowe and are now settled in the house which they have rented from Admiral Trilley. Miss Borrowe has been the guest of Miss Barbara Small in San Francisco for the last fortnight.

Separation of Belasco and Carter

No longer a Belasco star but in a Belasco play, Mrs. Leslie Carter, famous for her marital felicities and infelicities, for her histrionic abilities and her temperament, will appear at the Novelty Theatre next week. For years Mrs. Carter was to Dave Belasco what Sara Bernhardt during a great part of her career was to Sardou—the interpreter of his genius. Mrs. Carter is distinctly a Belasco-made actress. Belasco developed her talents literally by the sweat of his brow, for, as we were told, he used to drag her around by her bronze locks to evoke the shrieks, cries and other expressions of deep emotion that are essential to the equipment of impersonators of high-strung heroines. As a sobber and shrieker Mrs. Carter is without a peer on the American stage. And the perfection of her artistry is evident from the fact that when she weeps the audience weeps with her, though, of course when she shrieks she shrieks alone. That Mrs. Carter is no longer a Belasco star is not to be attributed to any indication of the waning of her talents. Her virility is unimpaired. As an emotion generator she is as dynamic as ever, but she has now a husband to whom she is so much married that Mr. Belasco suspected her of infidelity to her Art. Mr. Belasco has prejudices against married stars. He wishes his stars to lavish every fragment of passion of which the soul is capable on their Muse, but Mrs. Carter having had a taste of domesticity in the days of her youth, albeit an unpleasant one, there lingered a recollection that predisposed her to a second venture, and some months ago she became the blushing bride of one of the gentlemen of her profession. This marriage disturbed the harmony of Mrs. Carter's professional relations with Mr. Belasco. Thereafter Mrs. Carter's husband became her mentor and of course that circumstance occasioned a rift in the lute of Belasco discipline. The star and her manager came to the parting of the ways and Frances Starr, formerly of the Alcazar, was employed to resume where Mrs. Carter left off. Manager Dillingham thereupon secured Mrs. Carter for the star role of Milton Royle's new play or rather his version of Article Forty-seven. Mrs. Carter liked the play but she saw how she could improve it. Mr. Royle objected to the improvement of his play. And that explains why Mrs. Carter went back to her old friend "Du Barry," the sensational play in which she made all previous New York records cease to be worth speaking about.

The Play

It was to be supposed that the brilliant period of Louis XV of France would furnish an admirable field for the dramatist, and "Du Barry," the central character of the play, is one of the most interesting figures in the history of that period. In the play she is shown first as the little milliner, Jeanette Vaubernier, and through the succeeding scenes as the favorite of the King, and last of all robbed of her glories, back among the people, she is led amid the shouts of the revolutionists to the guillotine. As embodied by Mrs. Leslie Carter Madame Du Barry, who ruled recklessly over the kingdom of Louis XV, who hastened the end of the old regime and died under the knife of the guillotine, becomes a fascinating and engrossing figure among the scenes covering her brilliant but dissolute career. Great as was her success in her earlier plays she has even reached greater heights in "Du Barry" and has increased the esteem in which she is held as a great emotional artist.

"Du Barry" will be presented here upon the same scenic scale with which it was invested during its two years' run in New York. Owing to the length of the performance the curtain will rise promptly at 8 o'clock. There will be a Saturday matinee only and the final performance of "Du Barry" will be given Sunday night, May 19.

Belasco and the Shuberts

The theatrical trust scored a victory over Dave Belasco the other day when it absorbed the Shuberts, but Belasco has a contract with the Shuberts which has three years more to run, and he says that meanwhile he will play his attractions at the Shubert houses throughout the country. "Before the expiration of that contract," he says, "I shall have perfected arrangements by which I shall be able to have my own theatres in many of the principal cities of the country. It is gratifying to me to be able to state that a sufficient number of wealthy men who have faith in me and who believe in the highest traditions of the stage have agreed to provide such money as I may need to build my own theatres."

The Passion Play

The most artistic and dramatic conception of the New Testament ever presented on any stage was given by the students of Santa Clara College six years ago and repeated in 1903 when they presented to the public "Nazareth." Clay M. Greene's "Passion Play," the story of the life and crucifixion of the Savior. This notable play will be revived on Monday evening, May 13. Five performances will be given during the week.

Force at Alcazar

Belasco & Mayer find that it will be impossible to complete the elaborate production of Eugene Walters' great American play, "The Undertow," in time for presentation next Monday evening. They are forced to postpone it a week and have substituted George Broadhurst's farce, "What Happened to Jones." The story of this comedy is well known but it has been a

Will Walling will appear as the Bishop and H. B. Byers as his counterpart, Bigby. All the members of the cast have strong parts and the play should move rapidly. "What Happened to Jones" will run the entire week with the regular matinees on Saturday and Sunday.

Good Vaudeville at Orpheum

The Orpheum offers a programme for next week that should be proof against the car strike. Volta who heads the roster, although quite a young man, is said to be one of the most wonderful of humans. His tricks with electric currents are described as marvelous and uncanny and his performance is said to widen the eyes of the blase as well as of the scientific. Matthews and Ashley, two singing and dancing comedians, will present an amusing skit entitled "A Smash-Up in Chinatown." The Girl Behind the Drum has another entertaining act. Ethel MacDonough is the girl and her work with the traps and various instruments of percussion is of a character that promises to attract great interest. Kramer and Belleclair who will be seen for the first time in this city are said to challenge comparison with Sadow in their muscular development and strength and their exhibition of physical culture has received favorable recognition in the East. It will be the last week of Charles Leonard Fletcher in his impersonations, Princess Yolante and her trained cockatoos, the Durand Trio and Foy and Clark. The latter have scored an immense hit in their original sketch "Under the Sea." Novel and entertaining Motion Pictures will be exhibited.

Idora Park

The best performance yet given by the Idora Opera Company is that of Victor Herbert's delightful work, "The Fortune Teller." Sybil Page who closes her year's engagement with this company is doing admirable work and Walter Bogart sings exceptionally well. Cunningham, Hope Mayne and the other favorites all add to the excellence of the performance and the orchestra under Paul Steindorff is alone worth going miles to hear. The splendid body of musicians has again been increased and is now well equipped for any kind of operatic production.

There will be a big masquerade on skates in the big rink Monday evening.

"When Johnny Comes Marching Home" will be the next opera. Edith Mason, the soprano, and Thos. Persse, tenor, join the organization, making their debut in this work.

The Idora Park Orchestra has been engaged to furnish the music at the graduating exercises at Stanford University this year.

GROWN-UPS

By Ursula Twenty

There are no real fairies, grown-ups say so,
 Except in stories, which is so absurd—
 If only they could know the secrets I know,
 And hear the things I've heard!
 I know what the thrush near the nursery window sings
 In the lilac bush below.
 The fairies tell me heaps and heaps of things
 That grown-ups never know.

I know why the shadows grow so long and glide
 Across the lawn, beneath the poplars tall:
 It's because they want to look at the world outside,
 They're climbing the ivied wall.
 I know what the butterfly with painted wings
 Says to the proud red rose.
 The fairies tell me heaps and heaps of things
 A grown-up never knows.

I know why the clouds, with which the sky is whitened,
 Hurry along so very very fast:
 They want to see the sunset, and are frightened
 That each may be the last.
 I know why the river never never sleeps,
 Why the wind comes and goes.
 The fairies tell me secrets, heaps and heaps,
 A grown-up never knows.

Not "Bestsellers"

Thomas Hardy declared several years ago that he had no more stories to tell, and since the publication of "Jude, the Obscure," we have had none from his pen. Much as his admirers regret the fact, they must agree that if he really feels that he has reached the limit of his production it is better for him to have ceased to write than to present the pitiful spectacle so often forced on our attention, of the mechanical pouring out of a stream of dead words only because the habit is fixed and there is still magic in a name. Mr. Hardy, who is still well short of the scriptural three score and ten years, is by no means forgotten because he is silent. The Harpers, who are his American publishers, find it expedient to issue new editions every now and then, and are announcing at the present time that they have in press "Far From the Madding Crowd," "Desperate Remedies," and "A Laodician," all of which were new some thirty years or more ago. In listing best-sellers none of these will be mentioned, not because they will not come into the hands of purchasers, for if there were reason to suppose they would not be wanted new editions would not be issued, but because the lists of best-sellers are distinctly compiled from the RECENT books, and so labeled, if running readers and critics would take notice.

AUTOMOBILE NOTES

One by one the well-known horsemen of the country are coming to the knowledge that the ownership and use of an automobile does not in the least intimate that they are wavering in their allegiance to the equine. One of the latest instances of this fact is the purchase of a Thomas Flyer by Colonel C. E. Hughes of Denver, president of the Continental Coach Horse Company, probably the best-known breeder in the West. A proof, too, that driving is a good stepping stone to the guiding of a motor car is that Colonel Hughes learned to drive his car in a single afternoon.

Cuyler Lee, agent for Cadillac Motor Cars, reports the delivery of Cadillac Motor Cars as follows: L. I. Ashpole, a Cadillac Touring Car; Mr. Henry L. Halsey, a Cadillac Touring Car; Mr. Charles E. When, a Cadillac Touring Car. The well-known architect, Mr. Sylvain Schnaitaacher, has bought a 24 horse power Cadillac Touring Car. This is the first 24 horse power Cadillac to be delivered on the coast.

Limousine cars finished in other than the conventional somber colors are gaining popularity. Mr. Thomas F. Daly, the millionaire mine owner of Denver, has a Winton limousine finished in a beautiful red, while Mr. E. B. Cadwell, screw manufacturer of New York and Detroit, will this week receive delivery from the Winton factory of a limousine which is sure to attract attention in its golden brown dress and gold leaf striping. Inside, Mr. Cadwell's car has golden brown upholstery and natural mahogany wood finish.

surprised the pass-word of the Prussians. . . . I think that this time we shall take that cursed Bourget away from them."

There was an explosion of bravos and laughter. The soldiers danced, laughed, polished up the sabre-bayonets; and taking advantage of the tumult the children disappeared.

Beyond the trench there was nothing but the plain, and in the distance a long white wall perforated with loopholes. They went towards this wall, stopping at each step, and pretending to pick up potatoes.

"Let us go back. . . . Don't let us go there," little Stenne said continually.

The other shrugged his shoulders and walked on. Suddenly they heard the click of a gun being loaded.

"Lie down!" ordered the big boy, throwing himself on the ground. As soon as he was down, he whistled. Another whistle sounded across the snow. The boys advanced crawling. . . . In front of the wall, close to the ground, appeared a pair of yellow moustaches under a dirty forage-cap. The big boy jumped into the trench by the side of the Prussian:

"This is my brother," he said, pointing to his companion.

Stenne was so little that when the Prussian saw him he began to laugh, and was obliged to take him in his arms to hoist him through the gap.

On the other side of the wall were great embankments of earth, trees cut down, black holes in the snow, and in each hole the same dirty forage-cap, the same yellow moustaches laughing when they saw the children pass.

In one corner was a gardener's house barricaded with trunks of trees. The ground floor was full of soldiers playing at cards and making soup on a big clear fire. The cabbage and lard smelt good; how different from the bivouac of the sharpshooters! Above were the officers. One could hear them playing on the piano and uncorking champagne bottles. When the Parisians entered they were greeted with a hurrah of joy. They gave up their papers; were given drink, and made to talk. All the officers looked proud and ill-natured; but the big boy amused them with his street smartness, his slang vocabulary. They laughed, repeated his words after him, and disported themselves with delight in this mud of Paris which was brought to them.

Little Stenne would have liked to talk also, to prove that he too was not an idiot; but something embarrassed him. Opposite, rather apart from the others, sat a Prussian who was older, more serious than the others, and who was reading, or pretending to read, for his eyes never left the boy. There was tenderness and reproach in his gaze, as if this man had at home a child of the same age as Stenne, and said to himself:

"I would rather die than see my son follow such a trade. . . ."

From that moment Stenne felt as though a hand were pressing on his heart and preventing it from beating.

To escape from this anguish he began to drink. Soon everything was turning round him. He heard vaguely, in the midst of loud laughter, his companion making fun of the National Guards, of their way of drilling, imitating a rush to arms at the Marais, a night surprise on the ramparts. Then the big boy lowered his voice, the officers came nearer and their faces became grave. The miserable fellow was forewarning them of the attack of the sharpshooters. . . .

At this shock little Stenne got up furious, sobered: "Not that, big boy. . . . I won't have that."

But the other only laughed and went on. Before he had finished all the officers were on their feet. One of them pointed the children to the door:

"Get out of the camp as quick as you can," he ordered them. And they began to talk among themselves, very fast, in German. The big boy went out clicking his money, as proud as a Doge. Stenne followed him, head down; and when he passed the Prussian whose gaze had troubled him so much, he heard a sad voice which said:

"Not britty that. . . . Not britty."

Tears came to his eyes.

Once on the plain the children began to run and returned quickly. Their sack was full of potatoes which the Prussians had given them, and they passed the trench of the sharpshooters without difficulty. The camp was preparing for the night-attack. Troops arrived silently, and were massed behind walls. The old sergeant was there, busy placing his men and looking so happy. When the children passed he recognized them, and gave them a kind smile. . . .

Oh! how that smile hurt little Stenne; for one second he longed to cry:

"Do not go over there. . . . we have betrayed you."

But the other boy had said to him: "If you speak they will shoot us," and fear kept him silent. . . .

At Courneuve they went into a deserted house to divide the money. Truth obliges me to say that the division was made fairly, and that when he heard the beautiful half-crowns clinking under his blouse, and thought of the games of "galoche" in perspective, little Stenne did not think his crime so terrible after all.

But when the unfortunate child was alone! When the big boy had left him at the gates, his pockets began to feel very heavy, and the hand which clasped his heart clasped it more tightly than ever. Paris no longer seemed the same to him. The people who passed looked at him severely, as though they knew whence he was coming. He heard the word spy in the noise of the wheels, in the beating of the drums which were practicing along the canal. At last he arrived at home, and very glad that his father had not yet returned, he went up to their bedroom quickly, to hide under his pillow the half-crowns which weighed so heavily on him.

Father Stenne had never been so amiable, so joyful, as when he returned that evening. News had been received from the provinces: matters in the country were going better. While he was eating, the old soldier looked at his gun hanging on the wall, and said to the child with his jolly laugh:

"Ah! my boy, wouldn't you go at the Prussians if you were a man!"

About eight o'clock they heard cannon.

"That is Arbervilliers. . . . They are fighting at Bourget," said the old fellow, who knew all the forts. Little Stenne became pale and, pretending great fatigue, went to bed, but he did not sleep. The cannon sounded continually. He pictured to himself the sharpshooters arriving by night to surprise the Prussians and themselves falling into an ambushade. He thought of the sergeant who had smiled at him, saw him stretched out there on the snow, and many others with him! . . . The price of all this blood was hidden under his pillow, and it was he, the son of M. Stenne, of a soldier. . . . Tears choked him! In the room next door he heard his father walk, open the window. Below, in the square, sounded the call to arms, a battalion of guards was mustering for the start. It was certainly a real battle. The unfortunate child could not repress a sob.

"What is the matter?" said Father Stenne, coming in.

The child could bear it no longer, he jumped out of bed and threw himself at his father's feet. When he moved, the half-crowns rolled on the floor.

"What is this? You have been stealing?" said the old man, trembling.

Then, all in a breath, little Stenne told how he had gone to the Prussians' camp, and what had happened there. As he went on talking his heart became lighter, it relieved him to accuse himself. . . . Father Stenne listened with a terrible expression. When the story was finished, he hid his face in his hands and wept.

"Father, father," the child tried to say.

The old man pushed him away without answering, and picked up the money.

"That is all?" he asked.

Little Stenne made a sign that it was all. The old man took down his gun, and cartridge-box, and put the money in his pocket.

"That's right," he said, "I am going to give it back to them."

And, without adding a word, without even looking back, he went down to join the troops who were starting by night. He was never seen again.

A Tale of a Strike

"Pelham and His Friend Tim," by Allen French, is a real book for real boys. Pelham and Tim were the two youngest lads permitted to play with "the big boys," and they were proud of the privilege. They were about twelve years of age, and in worldly circumstances as far apart as the conditions of their little town permitted, for Pelham was the youngest child of the mill owner in whose establishment most of the residents were employed, while Tim occupied the same status in the household of the most thriftless and goodfornothing of the men. But Tim was made of different timber from his father and his elder brother, and the reason for the lack of resemblance is part of the story. The conditions under which Mr. Dodd carried on his enterprise were ideal. He was a kind and thoughtful employer, and his men were well paid and satisfied. His eldest son was already in the mill and the two younger ones looked forward to the time when they, too, would be part of the establishment, while the sons of the workmen expected to follow in the footsteps of their fathers, to work for Arthur and Pelham as they now played with them, with no question but that of doing their best, and as the lads were permitted, under restrictions, to visit the works and see the various operations, they each had a definite idea of which department they intended to enter, and a theoretic, if slight, knowledge of the work. Into this peaceful and harmonious life there was introduced an element of discord in the shape of a new workman who immediately began to organize a union and to stir up discontent amongst the younger and the least proficient of the mill employes. The older men contended that they had no grievances, but were persuaded that they might, some day, have disputes with the owners, and that it would be a great thing to have "the brotherhood" back of them and "strike wages" to tide them over their idle time. It did not take Volger very long to make trouble. As one of the men said, he soon found an excuse, and a strike was declared "just for excitement." There were a few contracts to be finished when all but two of the men walked out, and it was then that Pelham and Tim proved their mettle. Mr. Dodd, who had been a practical mill hand in his young days, put on his overalls and with his superintendent and book-keeper, took hold of the work, while the boys eager to help, were pressed into service, and proved themselves equal to the task. How the little chaps took their share of the watching at night, how they mixed dyes and packed goods, and protected property, and how they were all but kidnapped, and yet escaped, make an adventurous tale. "Pelham and His Friend Tim" is a wholesome and stirring tale, another to be added to the all too brief list of books in which boys are interested in something besides football and school escapades, and taught, though not preached at, that there are other uses for brains and muscles than exercising them in sport. Published by Little, Brown & Co.

"A Knight of the Cumberland"

This story shows us the Kentucky mountaineer at play. Before this particular knight became a titled personage he was several other things, namely, a mountain lad rather wild for even his unconventional surroundings, an outlaw, subject to arrest by any of the volunteer police force of the Gap because of his tendency to make use of firearms whenever he had imbibed too much of the "mountain dew" and the admirer of a New York society belle who had come down into the mountains on a visit of curiosity, and who, for the purposes of the narrative is known to us only as "the Blight." One of the revels indulged in annually as a part of the celebration of the Fourth of July in the border counties of Kentucky and Virginia, is a passage at arms after the manner of that of the knights of old, whereat the natives, fantastically arrayed, and sporting titles as unconventional as their attire, joust for points. Naturally, there is great rivalry amongst the participants and much exchange of hard coin on the outcome of the contests. Mart, otherwise the Wild Dog, and in time to be the Knight of the Cumberland, had attended one of the celebrations and was fired with an ambition to win for himself, so, with a companion, he rigged up a course near home, and the two practiced at tilting, not at each other but at the branches of the trees until they could pick off the suspended rings unerringly. The Honorable Samuel Budd was master of Ceremonies and the fair lady from New York had journeyed south again especially to witness the sports. It was the fortune, or misfortune of "the Blight" to inspire every man who met her with a romantic ardor, so that she had a real lover, in the person of a young civil engineer, besides the adoring Mart who, of course, could but look on from a distance. Young Marston it was who had arrested Mart for his outbreak, and though the prosecutor had also paid his fine and thus liberated him from confinement, the youth had sworn to vengeance and was thus under the ban of the constituted authorities. The Honorable Budd, knowing of Mart's assiduous practice at tilting, had made a bet with some other interested ones that this year he would bring in a dark horse who would win all the honors, but as the time approached he saw that his outlaw could not appear, and he was in a fever of despondency. Mart had sent word that in his default his friend Braham who was just as good, would compete, and the identity of the knight was to be shrouded in mystery. He was to appear at the last moment and take his place. All followed the arranged program except that the unknown knight was masqued and could not be induced to reveal himself. His title was announced as the Knight of the Cumberland, and under the coaching of the master of ceremonies he went through the manoeuvres after the pattern laid down in Ivanhoe. As in that historic encounter, at Ashby, the final contest was fought out between two, young Marston, who chose to call himself "the Discarded," and the unknown. An amusing bit of comedy is introduced in the distribution of favors, for Mollie, the sister of Mart, and the sweetheart of Braham, whom she believed to be the "dark horse," had provided herself with a bunch of ribbons to decorate the spear she had every reason to suppose would be lowered to her, and was naturally taken aback when, instead, it was the Blight who was so honored. Not to describe at length what the author has done so much more perfectly than any paraphrase can express, the Knight of the Cumberland after winning all the honors, and being obliged to reveal his identity, was none other than the outlaw Mart, and his appearance was as much of a surprise as that of Ivanhoe or King Richard in the historic lists of Ashby. His exit was dramatic in the extreme, and despite his undoubted lawlessness our hearts are with him in his wild ride for freedom. The tribute which John Fox, Jr., pays to the courteousness and chivalrous respect of the mountaineer is not overdrawn, and the picture of their simple lives, their unabashed openness and their lavish hospitality according to their means is founded upon intimate knowledge. Illustrations, in color, are by F. C. Yohn. A Knight of the Cumberland is not too long to be read at one sitting and quite entertaining enough to make one wish for more of the same kind. ## A Protest Against Compromise

The most logical of catastrophes was that which gave a tragical touch to San Francisco's industrial drama last week. It was so true in its sequence to all that had gone before that it was absolutely devoid of the element of unexpectedness which counts for so much in theatricals. It was not only the expected that happened but also one of those consummations that howsoever painful when rightly apprehended are not deplored. Unfortunately the first impulse of many of our citizens who are susceptible to panic was to render negligible all that had been accomplished. They were in favor of immediately effecting a compromise by which Mr. Calhoun should reinstate the subservient henchmen of Agitator Cornelius. This they conceived to be a most salutary and beneficent purpose, but it was as fatuous as, without completing a surgical operation, to sew a man up because he complained of a slight pain. The problem that confronts this community is not to be solved by compromise. To compromise is merely to prolong the agony. Terrible it is to have such scenes as were enacted last week, but blood may not have been shed in vain. It would have been well for the world if spared the misery wrought by the instruments of ambition and tyranny, but it was not decreed that man should be redeemed at pink tea ceremonies. The redemption of this city is the great blessing to be accomplished, and compromise is not the medium that suggests itself as most propitious to reflecting minds. Organized labor has this city by the throat and it must be forced to let go its hold; if merely required to relax its grip San Francisco's pitiable plight will continue to excite compassion. The fact is that there exists here a distinct clash of interests. Here in our midst is this great fact of Organized Labor entrenched in its immense redoubts declaring its intention to hold fast and defy reason and justice. It is the old familiar story of Power grown arrogant and tyrannical; sometimes it is the throne, sometimes the mob; sometimes it is capital and sometimes it is labor. Unionism has reached the point where it is conscious of its power and indifferent to the principles of right and justice. It rules us industrially and politically. Its yoke is of iron. Even the press, the so-called palladium of our liberties, has been terrorized into meek acquiescence in the dictates of Labor's passions and caprices. Organized Labor regards this city as its stronghold, and this is no misapprehension. No city in the world is so helpless beneath the heel of labor as San Francisco. And while it remains supine we shall be the prey of a ruthless and cruel despotism. In these circumstances what compromise can be effected by which the sky shall be made bluer, or the climate more temperate or our relations with our fellows simpler and happier? There is no redress for San Francisco except in bankruptcy or in the putting of effective restraint upon unionism. The interests of San Francisco are entirely her own and she cannot look for justice or decent treatment from the agitators that dominate the unions. It might seem that it would not be wise for labor to destroy the industries of this city, but the professional agitators and the demagogic counsellors of labor are concerned only for the interests of unionism, and those interests in their opinion demand the absolute subservience of employers. By these pitiless czars of labor has San Francisco been brought to its present pathetic plight; by them and by the sauseulottes that have been carried into this country on the tide of immigration from the European hotbeds of anarchy, to whose ears there is no sweeter music than the trumpet of sedition blown by the charlatans of journalism, to whose eyes there are no pictures so inspiring as those calculated to provoke discontent and plunge us into strife and confusion. What shall it avail San Francisco to compromise with men who are so easily encouraged to throw away prudence and involve themselves in calamitous circumstances? These men who are so eager for anarchy we should not be so eager to placate. We who are not eager for a nightmare of mortgages and mendicancy, who have some sentimental interest in the old town and have no expectation of hiking to the nearest industrial centre as soon as work gets slack should not deprecate the kind of arbitrament from which there is no appeal and which is binding even upon labor unions.

Unions And Their Friends

Some of the sentiments to which we gave expression in these columns last week were construed by one of our readers as evidence of "a bigoted prejudice against labor unions." This conception is significant of the temperament which perceives antipathy in all that is not absolute concord. We have never suspected ourselves of harboring a sentiment inimical to labor unionism in the abstract. We have persuaded ourselves that there is justification for labor unions, and that they must be expected to take a hand in the fixing of wages notwithstanding the fact that political economy like alchemy, astrology and witchcraft has a plausible idea at the root of it. We regard labor unions with favor because we are conscious of the absurdity of the assertion in the Declaration of Independence that "all men are created equal"; also, because we recognize the fact that the human being is a covetous machine and because we know that the varieties of circumstance which influence the reciprocal interests of labor and capital are so endless that all endeavor to deduce rules of action from balance of expediency is in vain. There are men who would make their employees their slaves, who would gladly obtain labor at the lowest price compatible with the maintenance of laboring power; there are corporations without souls that have no more consideration for the muscles and skill which they employ than for the machines that constitute their plants. It is entirely natural for labor to organize against such men and such corporations. It is by such men and such corporations that the standards of value are fixed. To compete with them men of more generous nature are obliged to reduce wages. Where personal rights are ignored, where capital refuses to see in the laborer anything but its human automaton, where oppressions are practiced, there must be rebellion. While trades unions are maintained for the purpose of exacting justice their existence cannot be conceived to be inimical to the public welfare. But when under the corrupting influence of unscrupulous demagogues and illiterate agitators they threaten the destruction of the industries of a commonwealth and breed discontent and demoralization they must excite the aversion and hostility of every decent citizen, every lover of justice and fair play. No true friend of trades unions encourages them in acts that provoke the hostility of the public. It was not an act of friendship that precipitated the car strike, that plunged a vast body of reluctant men into a strife for which they had no appetite. The best evidence of the fact that the men were contented is that they were denied the privilege of a secret ballot. Coerced into a viva voce vote they did not dare to incur the displeasure of their ruthless and relentless masters. And yet these masters by whom the peace of this community was dissolved, these pestiferous breeders of riot upon whose heads are the stains of blood that was shed in consequence of their imperious decree have the effrontery to pose to-day as the friends of labor, and are probably accepted as such by citizens of the type of him by whom Town Talk is charged with indulging a bigoted prejudice against unions.

The Police And The Charter

More than once has it been suggested in these columns that the charter which is now the organic law of this city is hardly deserving of the respect and esteem which were uncompromisingly demanded for it when the Hon. James D. Phelan was vouching for its infallibility as a catholicon. There was a time when to impute defects to the charter, or even to doubt its high canonical character was to invite opprobrium and expose oneself to obloquy. But times have changed. As the Hon. James D. Phelan not only failed to achieve the city's palingenesis, but made possible the untoward conditions that have since prevailed, he is no longer privileged to damn with a nod the dissenter that takes issue with his dogma. So we have not hesitated to point out that the charter is the source of many evils. Its most objectionable feature is that which makes the police department the mainspring of a political machine. The importance of having that department free from political and demagogic influence has received abundant illustration during the car strike. Only under great pressure were the police induced to make an effort to quell disturbance and protect the men hired to operate the street cars. They were very reluctant to arrest rioters and made no effort to disperse the mobs that were assembled to perpetrate acts of violence. And as soon as their meager efforts to avert bloodshed seemed likely to evoke adverse criticism from the anarchistic labor leaders notice was served on the railroad officials that police protection would be vouchsafed only during a few hours. It is bad enough when the police power of a city is unable to cope with the lawless; it is infamous when the police refuse to protect life and property. That is what happened in this city and it is what we must expect while the police are subject to the orders of the boss of a political machine such as the Mayor of San Francisco is always likely to become while clothed with the authority that emanates from the charter.

A Humiliating Situation

Now comes the information that the strategic importance of keeping Admiral Evans's fleet intact in the Atlantic is not the only reason for the failure of the Navy Department to assign a few modern battleships to the Pacific. Another and perhaps more cogent reason is that if we sent our battleships into Asiatic waters we should have to depend for docking facilities on the harbors of Hongkong and the Japanese Empire. Not even on this Coast have we a dry dock large enough to receive a ship of greater than 14,000 tonnage. Larger docks are being built at Mare Island and at Bremerton but they are not to be built in a day. So on neither side of the Pacific can one of our great battleships be docked, while in the Philippines we lack the plant to repair them. According to the Navy Journal "it would take at least five years with abundant appropriations and rapid work to make conditions much better." This is a most humiliating state of affairs, and it reflects much discredit on our naval authorities and executive officials at Washington. It betrays a negligence that is little short of criminal. The situation is of course not unknown to our President, and yet we have no recollection of his having sought to impress the country with its gravity. It is of a character sufficiently startling to justify him in ignoring political conspiracies and even to abate his enthusiasm as a spelling reformer long enough to sound a note of alarm. He has done a good deal of preaching on the importance of strengthening our navy and has taken a great interest in naval parades and kindred demonstrations on the Atlantic where the likelihood of trouble is most remote but where centers of social gaiety abound, but he has been most remarkably indifferent to the inferiority of the country's sea power in the Pacific, to the almost treasonable circumstance that in the ocean which the world believes will be the theatre of the next great war we do not possess a modern navy.

Our Grotesque Executive

If the circumstances of our Mayor's present status were not repugnant at once to logic to common sense and the fitness of things his conduct during the current carstrike would be excitant of more mordant criticism than has been bestowed upon it. At no time since his indictment and his wholesale implication in the graft disclosures made by the Grand Jury has the opportunity arisen for so poignant a delineation of his fallen estate, for so useful an exposition of the sorry pass to which his sins have brought him. Here as never before during the public career of the Mayor the moralist gets his cue for impassioned sermonizing on the barrenness of an ill-gotten reputation and the utilitarian finds proof of the utter futility of individual interference with the laws that insure the greatest good of the greatest number. Awaiting trial on five counts of extortion; suspected in the minds of the most blindly devoted of his erstwhile followers and convicted in the minds of all other men, of sordid and appalling corruption; and discharging perfunctorily the business of a position for which everybody realizes he is grossly unfit, Mayor Schmitz has nevertheless endeavored to inject his personality and his influence into the controversy between the United Railroads and the Carmen's Union. The attempt, as was inevitable, has been a pitiful, nay a grotesque failure. The Mayor's personality has lost its power to magnetize; his influence has become a negative quality. Therefore his puny efforts in behalf of peace and the determined efforts of the two parties to the quarrel to settle their differences in their own way have run in parallel lines with absolutely no point of contact. The Mayor's solemn proclamation calling upon the warring elements in our midst to adjust their dispute and to join hands in furtherance of the city's welfare, though published conspicuously in all the newspapers and plastered on all the dead walls in town, has excited none but jeering comment and has had no more influence on the event than Canute's haughty injunction on the rising sea. His committee of fifty-one, chosen, it must be admitted, with rare cunning, has been a dismal failure; its meetings, scantily attended, have been alternately farcical and tempestuous; and its jumbled deliberations have gone so wide of the proposed mark that Schmitz has been compelled to invest them with a purpose entirely different from that originally intended. Assembled with the avowed object of ending the strike, the committee of fifty-one (which has never mustered more than twenty-three strong) has been lamely and tardily metamorphosed into an "advisory board" with vague duties and unintelligible powers.

Its pronunciamientos have had as little efficacy as the portentous decrees of the tailors of Tooley street and it is impossible to evade the impression that nearly all its members are heartily ashamed of the company it compels them to keep.

Changes of a Few Years

The Mayor is a rank outsider; his word is unheeded alike by Calhoun and by Cornelius; his activities are completely ignored. The man to whom he sold himself when this city was quivering with earthquake shock beneath a pall of smoke and the man whose union once idolized him are equally oblivious of his pleadings; they will have none of his interference. Truly the passing of a few years has wrought a change pregnant with significance. Memory need make little effort to reach back to another streetcar strike that found Mayor Schmitz in a different position. Elected to office just after the great teamsters' strike which still casts its ugly shadow over local politics, acclaimed from one end of the country to the other as labor's representative and curiously watched by all to whom labor domination of municipal affairs was still a problem in a most unsatisfactory stage of solution, he was able in that emergency to vindicate the doubtful policy that had led to his elevation. He was able to compose the differences of the two factions and to obtain satisfactory terms for the carmen. That was a time of exultation for union labor in this city, for it could point to its representative in the mayor's chair as to the peace-maker who had unknotted a dangerous tangle without exposing the community to the inconveniences, the hardships and the possible violence of a bitter struggle. Schmitz loomed large with possibilities of greatness at that period of his career; he won the support of men who had forecasted nothing but evil on the day of his election; he gave the labor unions an argument that was unanswerable for a long time. But even in that hour of glory the disintegrating elements of his character were at work; the evil influence of Ruef was killing whatever there was of goodness and strength in his nature. It seems a far cry from that carstrike to this, yet only a few short years have passed. Time, however, should be measured by events, not years; and by that computation an unbridgeable chasm separates that Schmitz from this. Shorn of his reputation, that early fame turned into infamy, accused of great crimes, he is learning at last that no shred of his former influence remains, the bitterest discovery of all being that he is no longer deemed worthy of consideration by the union men who formerly respected his utterances and heeded his recommendations. All this is patent to the dullest understanding, so the most specious reasoners among his remaining political allies will not be able to connect any interposition of Mayor Schmitz with the settlement of the carstrike.

Iconoclasts

By Mabel Porter Pitts

O, cold, unfeeling, dwarfed, perverted hour!
 Made ugly by the narrow, crouching souls
 That see but waves where God's great ocean rolls,
 That feel no ecstasy when blooms a flower
 But with their bloodless hearts and faces sour
 Each holds it honor if he may impress
 Upon the letter of his littleness
 The seal of virtue or the stamp of power.
 How can these know of Bacchus' sheltering vine,
 Of white-limbed naiads couched within the fen?
 How can these know that still the royal wine
 In foaming cups to eager lips is pressed?
 How can these know the earth love of the breast
 That builds empurpled pagan shrines again?

Perspective Impressions

A beautiful and inspiring contrast: "Weak Brother" Pardee of the cataclysm and Forceful and Fearless Gillett of the strike.

At this writing Agitator Cornelius is undecided as to whether he should pronounce Governor Gillett unfair for threatening to keep the peace of this city. Fortunately the views of Cornelius are a matter of no concern to Governor Gillett.

The attention of the Hon. James D. Phelan and of the other public spirited gents who are dispersing public funds for the maintenance of pauper camps within the city limits is respectfully called to the prevalence therein of able bodied anarchists of both sexes who are rendering human life precarious hereabouts and increasing our taxes by destroying private property that must be paid for. Please Mr. Phelan, quit playing to the gallery, be a Gillett for the novelty of the role, and spend that money on a General Hospital or something else that will be of service to deserving men and women.

There is always the man to meet the crisis. Funston was on hand for the earthquake, and Jim Gillett is on hand for the awful combination of Schmitz, Dinan and Cornelius.

It has been pointed out that the Spring Valley Water Company has demonstrated in recent years that it is not necessary for a public service corporation to bribe the servants of the dear pee-pul. Quite true and the Spring Valley Water Company is now almost in the hands of a receiver.

"The Arbitration Committee," say Cornelius and co-agitators, "arbitrated past issues." Quite true, but let us suppose that the committee found that the men were entitled to three dollars for eight hours' work, and that on May first President Calhoun decided to change the schedule. Let us suppose that and then ask ourselves whether the daily papers would, while the public walked, editorialize platitudinously on the crops in Indiana and the eternally pertinent question, "should a Young Man be good to His Mother?"

The Stork of Saint Francis

A Legend

By Victor De Brandt

From a deathly swoon after a long, fatiguing and sleepless night, Francis of Assisi awoke into life. He did not open his eyes, and, but half conscious, became aware that rose blossoms were crowding upon him. He heard sweet concord of harps and flutes sounding into his ears as if from a great distance, and as if coming from a seashore full of flowers; and he felt in his heart a bewitching joy as of an opening rose or a breathing jasmine, as he was borne into the starry seas of Paradise. His soul, at first frightened, now became calm, and he heard a soft whisper: "Thou art now in Heaven!"

When the music swelled into a solemn chant, he opened his eyes in great surprise. Yes, St. Francis was in Heaven. Everything around him swam in light and glory. He intoned the hymn to the Sun, looked into the dazzling light, and his eyes could bear it.

At first he saw white pillars of smoke rising upwards, but they were clear pillars of frankincense, which rolled up from golden vases, and were placed in file around God's throne. He saw trees of strange and rare forms, which carried stars as blossoms; and, amidst all these walked the army of the chosen, clad in white and bearing palms in their hands: bishops and martyrs, prophets and cardinals, wives, widows, and maids. In the midst glided many beautiful angels, singing hymns to the sounds of their harps, some blowing the flute, others beating brightly the cymbals.

And over his pale, haggard and afflicted countenance there flew a smile of happiness. He, a monk with bare feet, to see such splendor! He then perceived all the numerous inhabitants standing before him, and greeting him with all joy and reverence. In humility they whispered:

"See, it is he, the Saint, God's servant, Saint Francis!"

He saw the popes expressing their admiration by taking off their tiaras. Modesty and embarrassment did not allow him to look any longer upon the honors shown to him. He fixed his eyes on the clouds which were just rising from the golden vases of frankincense. These attracted him most. For he, distinguishing the clouds, found them not to be clouds, but a serried mass of little angels' heads, golden and fair, with silken locks, plump cheeks, multi-colored wings—all heads of little angels who were merrily laughing like silver bells. And the sweet laughter went straight to his heart, and he was unspeakably happy.

No time is counted or known in heaven. After a little Saint Francis felt as if he were an orphan and abandoned. He rose from the golden chair, and went along the path of heaven, where the clouds of frankincense concealed the Eternal Light; lifted his hands marked with the bloody nails from the Cross, and before all the chosen martyrs, prophets, popes and angels, he began, weeping the following speech:

"Light of Light, Father, Thou wilt forgive me and wilt not be angered if I, in all humility, state: Here in Heaven I feel homesick. Too much love and honor hast Thou granted me! In the world and among men I always lived with Nature as a true son and brother. But now am I naught but a dry branch. Wilt Thou know, O loving Father, what creates in me such a fierce longing for home?"

"Here I miss Brother Water, here I miss Brother Fire, here I miss Mother Earth, and what I loved most, I am lacking here: my friends the birds. They were my comfort and comrades on my long wanderings, consolation to mine eyes, mine ears and mine heart. Possibly Thou dost not know, Almighty God, what happened to me when, many years ago, I lived in Umbria. When preaching to the masses, in vain was all my endeavor; deaf the ears, deaf the hearts; and tired and disappointed, I left the city, full of pain and sorrow.

"An extensive meadow I found there, full of trees, in the midst bubbled a brook through the grass and over the white cobbles. Here I poured out all my complaints of the bitterness of my soul. On the turf stood a lapwing; walking, meditating, up and down, it adjusted its tuft of feathers, then stopped in his walk, as if it had understood me.

"From the nest which was pillowed with last autumn's dry leaves, the nightingale sounded its plaintive lay. Now a starling hopped on my knee; from the meadows came the chaffinch, and the tit-mouse; from the field flew the raven, the crow and the jackdaw, and, interrupting its sweet trill in the clouds, the lark circled down in spiral flight.

"From the forest the thrush danced in; the blackbird with its golden beak; the woodpecker and the tame robin; from the reeds came the swallow, the wagtail, the wren, and the chattering magpie.

"At last, from the moors, with a dignified bearing, flew the stork. He listened most piously, standing on one leg, to my sermon, nodding his head, and reminding the noisy sparrows with his beak to behave mannerly and listen devoutly to the speech of Saint Francis.

"I, Francis, the servant of God, was ridiculed by the people, therefore I held a sermon to birds. And so much I learnt to love them, that without them I feel very sad. Now, I cannot ask that Thou shalt, to please Thy servant, make Thine Heaven into an earth. But one thing I crave, my Father! for the fastings that I have kept, for the poverty that I have suffered, for the wounds in my hands, for the wounds in my soul, great and holy God, allow me that I keep the stork by me, that I rejoice with him, as with a wise and clever friend, with a true friend!"

Amazed and in awe, the Saints heard the long, daring speech. True, they were silent, but Francis could read in their features what they thought of him, and what effect his prayer produced in them. Saint Peter drew his eyebrows together, Saint John the Baptist displayed amazement, and Pope Gregory bent over to whisper to Saint Chrysostom, at the same time placing his finger on his forehead:

"Did I not tell you that Francis is and always will be a singular fellow?"

The conference ended. They all left, and Francis was sadly turning away from the Throne of God, fearing that his Lord was angry. Suddenly, something pulled at his cloak, and turning quickly, he scarce could believe his own eyes. Before him stood a white

Electric Sleep

By Dr. Albert Abrams

The other day, Professor Gabriel Lippmann, the celebrated savant of "The Sorbonne," demonstrated to me some of his results in chromophotography and when picture after picture was thrown upon the screen, the revelations in hue, tint and tone were marvelous. The day is fast approaching when one will no longer be constrained to invent exuberant phrases in commenting on celebrated masterpieces. The glowing and golden coloring in Titian, the fervid and fiery in Giorgione, the powerful in Rembrandt, and the pearly and subdued coloring in Vandyke will all be forgotten when "To hold, as't were, the mirror up to nature." When a bouquet of flowers was projected, reproduced nature was indeed resplendent and one would not have been disillusionized were it not for the absence of odor. After leaving The Sorbonne, I could not help but meditate on America's inferior position in the world scientific. True, America has created some great names in science. Franklin initiated the study of electricity; the calculations of our Newton directed attention to the importance of meteorites; Draper first photographed the stars; Langley gave us the bolometer which is so sensitive that it will register the heat of a candle a mile and a half distant. Thus one may proceed and recall many other great names in science but their number is in painful contrast with the luminaries of French science. It is not that we are impoverished in colleges and universities; on the contrary, such institutions far outnumber those in France. It is not because we lack endowments; in fact, our millionaires are rapidly becoming illustrious by proxy. James Lick sought the astronomical route; Morris K. Jessup, the avenue of the explorer and among others, Rockefeller and Carnegie. The scientists of France labor for the good of humanity and no doubt the same motive prompts the American scientist. Commercialism is however rampant in our country and success is measured by material gain. Knowledge is power but it isn't money. A few weeks ago, the celebrated chemist Berthelot died in Paris, perhaps the greatest experimental genius since Faraday. Berthelot like Pasteur, could have by his discoveries amassed wealth beyond the dream of avarice, yet it is related of him that in winter visitors were invited to his sleeping apartment, for there was his only fire, which signified an economy in coals. The Frenchman is endowed with more imagination than we and his creations in art and literature prove it. Imagination is by no means the unprofitable faculty that is currently believed, for constructive imagination yields products necessary for material progress. When controlled by experience and reflection it becomes the noblest attribute of man, the source of genius and the vehicle for discoveries in science. Someone has said the more imagination possessed by a blacksmith the better will he shoe a horse and I believe it was Tyndall who observed that while philosophers may be right in asserting that we cannot transcend experience, yet gifted with the power of imagination we can lighten the darkness which surrounds the world of the senses. This however, is neither a disquisition on chromophotography nor imagination so let us at once proceed to a consideration of our thesis. Sleep is more essential to life than food. Its object is the reconstruction of overworked organs. The length of time a person can live without sleep is about three weeks. It would be too arbitrary to determine the number of hours necessary for sleep, for its real value lies more in the intensity of sleep than on its duration. Eight hours of a disturbed, dreamy sleep is barely the equivalent of two hours of a deep dreamless sleep. For this reason we can easily understand why men of the greatest mental activity are usually the briefest sleepers. Frederick the Great required only five hours' sleep, and Pitt only three hours. In the time of Solomon, the twenty-four hours were divided into three parts—eight hours for labor and occupation, eight hours for rest, refreshment and recreation and surcease of all labor and eight hours for sleep. One of the chief causes of insomnia is mental emotion provoked by thought and worry and quite independent of organic disease. Young, author of "Night Thoughts," was presumably thus afflicted:

"From short as usual and disturbed repose,
I awake. How happy those that wake no more:
I awake emerging from a sea of dreams
Tumultuous, where my wrecked despondent thought
From wave to wave of fancied misery
At random drove, her helm of reason lost!"

In the treatment of such cases the physician is often powerless to act for

"Who shall minister to a mind diseased."

It has been truly said that if sleep and hope should be taken from man he would be the most miserable object in existence. Scientific medicine is a mutable creed and capable of modification as it assimilates the digested truths of human thought. For many years the theory of Broca that the center of speech was located in the third inferior frontal convolution was accepted without dispute, but now comes Marie, the illustrious physician of the Bicetre, who proves the incorrectness of Broca's observation. Marie has shown me much of the material on which his conclusion is based and his proof is incontestable. Stephane Leduc is another iconoclast of the Marie type. Electro-physiology of the brain has been retarded by three opinions: 1. The electric non-excitability of the brain; 2. The non-accessibility of the living brain to electric currents; 3. The danger attending the application of strong currents to the head. It was a dogma recognized and affirmed by the leading physiologists nearly to the year 1870, that the brain could not be excited by any known irritant especially to electricity until experimentation demonstrated that certain centers reacted to the stimulating action of electricity. Erb of Heidelberg, then demonstrated that the electric current could be made to penetrate into the brain. Now, by means of a specially devised apparatus yielding a current hitherto unemployed, Ledue has induced in animals a condition in which all sensation is abolished and complete lethargy is produced. The animal suffers no pain nor is any resistance shown. During this sleep all kinds of operations can be performed painlessly just as though the animal were under profound chloroform anesthesia. The moment the current is turned off the animal resumes his habits as unconcernedly as before, showing absolutely no reaction. Ledue tried the current on himself. When the current was turned on he was conscious as in a dream and he perceived contact with blunted sensation. The condition was not pushed to the absolute suppression of all consciousness. When the current was turned off, awakening was immediate and complete and there were no after-effects. This current applied to a part will abolish sensation. They are now experimenting with this current at the Hospital Beaujon in Paris. I will not attempt to prognosticate the value of this current in the treatment of insomnia nor its use as an anesthetic in surgical operations for time alone can justify such conclusions. At present it suffices to record the discovery as an interesting and promising physiologic phenomenon.

The Philosophy of Tea

By Okakura-Kakuro

Tea is a work of art and needs a master hand to bring out its noblest qualities. We have good and bad tea as we have good and bad paintings—generally the latter. There is no single recipe for making perfect tea, as there are no rules for producing a Titian or a Sesson. Each preparation of the leaves has its individuality, its special affinity with water and heat, its hereditary memories to recall, its own method of telling a story. The truly beautiful must be always the It. How much do we not suffer through the constant failure of society to recognize this simple and fundamental law of art and life! Lichihlai, a Sung poet, has sadly remarked that there are three most deplorable things in the world: the spoiling of fine youths through false education, the degradation of fine paintings through vulgar admiration, and the utter waste of fine tea through incompetent manipulation.

Like Art, tea has its periods and its schools. Its evolution may be roughly divided into three main stages, the Boiled, the Whipped, the Steeped Tea. We moderns belong generally to the last school. These several methods of appreciating the beverage are indicative of the spirit of the age in which they prevailed. For life is an expression, our unconscious actions the constant betrayal of our innermost thought. Confucius said that "man hideth not." Perhaps we reveal ourselves too much in small things because we have so little of the great to conceal. The tiny incidents of daily routine are as much a commentary on racial ideals as the highest flight of philosophy or poetry. Even as the difference in favorite vintage marks the separate idiosyncrasies of different periods and nationalities of Europe, so the Tea-ideals characterize the various moods of Oriental culture. The Cake-tea which was boiled, the Powdered-tea which was whipped, the Leaf-tea which was steeped, mark the distinct emotional impulses of the Tang, the Sung and the Ming dynasties of China. If we were inclined to borrow the much-abused terminology of art-classification, we might designate them respectively, the Classic, the Romantic, and the Naturalistic schools of Tea.

The tea-plant, a native of southern China, was known from very early times to Chinese botany and medicine. It is alluded to in the classics under the various names of Tou, Tseh, Chung, Kha and Ming, and was highly prized for possessing the virtues of relieving fatigue, delighting the soul, strengthening the will, and repairing the eyesight. It was not only administered as an internal dose, but often applied externally in the form of a paste to alleviate rheumatic pains. Taoists claimed it as an important ingredient of the elixir of immortality. Buddhists used it extensively to prevent drowsiness during their long hours of meditation.

By the fourth and fifth centuries Tea became a favorite beverage among the inhabitants of the Yantsekiang valley. It was about this time that the modern ideograph Cha was coined, evidently a corruption of the classic Tou. The poets of the southern dynasties have left some fragments of their fervent adoration of the "froth of the liquid jade." Then emperors used to bestow some rare preparation of the leaves on their high ministers as a reward for eminent services. Yet the method of drinking tea at this stage was primitive in the extreme. The leaves were steamed, crushed in a mortar, made into a cake and boiled together with rice, ginger, salt, orange peel, spices, milk and sometimes with onions! The custom obtains at the present day among the Tibetans and various Mongolian tribes who make a curious syrup of these ingredients. The use of lemon-slices by the Russians who learned to take tea from the Chinese caravan-series points to the survival of the ancient method.

It needed the genius of the Tang dynasty to emancipate Tea from its crude state and lead to its final idealization. With Luwuh in the middle of the eighth century we have our first apostle of tea. He was born in an age when Buddhism, Taoism and Confucianism were seeking mutual synthesis. The pantheistic symbolism of the time was urging one to mirror the Universal in the Particular. Luwuh, a poet, saw in the Tea-service the same harmony and order which reigned through all things. In his celebrated work, the "Chaking" (the Holy Scripture of Tea) he formulated the Code of Tea. He has since been worshipped as the tutelary God of the Chinese tea-merchants.

The Pestiferous Cornelius

The inconveniences and humiliations of the car strike could be overlooked if they did not have for an incidental phenomenon the surly growls and overloaded ultimatums, the absurd defiance and windy threats of Agitator Cornelius in behalf of union anarchy and rapacity. It appears that during a strike it is the duty of the boss of the strikers to spend his time trying to hoodwink the public, to endeavor to create the impression that the strikers are confident of winning entirely in consequence of the inability of the person or persons against whom the boycott is directed to obtain either labor or patronage, and that no depredations are being committed except by sympathizers among the public. What an edifying species of hypocrisy is this! Of course it deceives nobody; but the impotency of it doesn't affect the enthusiasm of the blatant humbugs. They persist in it with an assurance that might be taken for faith in its efficacy. It seems to have become a habit of unionism and is perhaps adhered to on account of the grim humor of it.

McCarthy's Humorous Protest

Despite the fact that many distinguished representatives of the Building Trades' Council gave frequent manifestations of those primitive homicidal instincts the gratification of which is in proportion to the helplessness of the victim, the council as if inspired with the humor of its members' conduct adopted resolutions stigmatizing as false and unjust the reports reflecting discredit on the organization. And the next day, as if to clinch the joke, several brave and chivalrous gentlemen employed on a building at Sutter and Kearny Streets hurled deadly missiles to the crowded street below, but in such a manner as to be almost absolutely free from detection. Evidently the police appreciated the humor of the resolution adopted by McCarthy's council for the patrol was more than doubled in front of every building in course of construction. This circumstance was probably due to the fact that it was the mechanics employed on these buildings who were most addicted to the diversion of typifying the dignity and courage of American labor after the manner of the brave gentlemen who shrewdly concealed themselves while trying to murder innocent people at Sutter and Kearny Streets.

The Cornelius Publicity Bureau

And while mechanics of the building trades were cooperating with gentlemen wearing buttons of the carmen's union and gentlemen of the teamsters' union in openly and conspicuously defying the authorities to maintain the peace of the community, the exuberant Cornelius in the safe seclusion of a guarded office was issuing his preposterous pronouncements and semidelirious bulletins to kindle the passions of his followers. With the fact obvious to the whole community that Calhoun would operate his car system if permitted, Cornelius was denouncing Calhoun's employees as cutthroats and pretending to believe that unionism was in nowise responsible for the disgraceful conditions that prevailed. Out of his cornucopia of humbugery and blackguardism came many fine samples of the character of the intelligence that has been directing the affairs of the carmen's union.

What Might Have Been

What an awful situation ours would have been had we had in the gubernatorial office a demagogue of the Schmitz type! Pathetic as is the plight of this city, struggling against obstacles to right itself, moaning aloud in its agony, its industries noosed and haltered like a beast of the chase for the insatiable hunters of unionism to bait and cut slices from, how far more miserable might have been the situation with no Gillett on hand ready to throw the State troops in to exact submission from the forces of anarchy. Weak as were the efforts of the police to protect life and property, much weaker they would have been had it not been evident that martial law was imminent. Mayor Schmitz's policy was far from hostile to the forces of disorder. A show of keeping them in check was as far as he would go, and he absolutely declined to discourage homicide with intimidation. There would have been no hurling of bricks from buildings in course of construction if the police had been armed with rifles and inclined to shoot. But while the Mayor insisted that the militia were not needed he was quite willing to be relieved of responsibility. The substitution of the militia for the police would at least indicate his reluctance to antagonize organized labor.

His Idea of Oppression

Two strike-breakers, each with a huge revolver strapped to his hip, appeared at the general delivery window in the postoffice the other day inquiring for mail. The clerk, noticing their artillery, remarked to one of them, "That's a wicked looking gun you've got there." "You bet it is," replied the strike-breaker, affectionately patting it; "and let me tell you one thing, young fellow—before we get through with this town of yours a man will be able to get a hair cut for a quarter." The earnestness of his tone and his freshly barbered appearance indicated that he had just been made a victim of the extortionate rates now charged by our tonsorial artists.

The Agitator's Ideal

With the union principle for which they are striving suffering shipwreck in San Francisco it must afford the carmen great satisfaction to know that they are to enjoy the inestimable blessings of eight hours' work and three dollars per in heaven. Not Swedenborg nor any other of the mystics who have written about the celestial country is responsible for this discovery but Richard Cornelius himself. Speaking at the funeral of the carman who was killed in the riot last week the chief of the platform men had this surprising statement to make: "We will meet him again where the imperfections of our brotherhood will be made perfect and the principle for which we now strive will be attained." As the carmen are striving for the eight hour day and the three dollar scale it is quite evident that Cornelius has some inside information about labor conditions in Paradise that escaped Dante and other experts who penetrated beyond the portal where St. Peter keeps the keys. Whether heaven is completely unionized Cornelius did not say, but it is to be presumed that the angelic harpers have organized a musicians' union and that the mechanics employed on the jasper walls get a half holiday on Saturday with time and a half when they work overtime. It would be interesting to know whether strikes and lock-outs ever disturb the eternal bliss of the blessed and speculation would feign dally with the question of where the members of the Citizens' Alliance seclude themselves in the heavenly country. But perhaps they don't go there.

More Glory for McCarthy

After passing unscathed through the fearsome plot looking to his death or abduction, P. H. McCarthy has once more stared death out of countenance and lives to tell the tale. He had a horse shot under him during the riot of last week when three lives were forfeited to the controversy between Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Cornelius. McCarthy was watching the battle at the Japanese and Korean League headquarters at Turk and Market streets when a bullet pricked the glossy hide of his noble charger and sent the animal sprawling on the pavement. Henceforth McCarthy must be ranked with Washington, Napoleon and other heroes who have seen their animals stricken beneath them with bullets and the fact that McCarthy was a couple of stories above the horse, safely ensconced behind a window of the League headquarters, so that the animal was in reality shot about thirty feet under him will not prevent the czar of the building trades from advertising proudly to the incident in future years.

McCarthy on Himself

It has been my proud privilege to discover that P. H. McCarthy, the labor agitator, has literary gifts. It had been generally supposed that the McCarthy fist was shaped for grasping and hurling the scab-subduing brick rather than for guiding the pen. But let the world no longer labor under the delusion that McCarthy is merely a fomentor of trouble between capital and labor. Fearing that all my readers are not on the subscription list of a paper known as "Organized Labor," I will give them a sample of the stuff on which the literature-craving workingman is fed. It is published over the signature of McCarthy and tells of the alleged attempt to abduct him and feed him to the sharks that gambol in the shadow of the Cliff House—an attempt which McCarthy firmly believes has no parallel in history. Says McCarthy: "It was a story—more weird and fantastic than any tale of the Arabian Nights, it unfolded a conspiracy in all its infernal details more Satanic than any that creative genius from Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, Dumas to Ibsen could conjure. It was the truth—a recital of facts so stupendous and appalling in hideous horror and depravity that the public stood gasping for breath, filled with fear and doubt. It was so gruesome, and in many respects so idiotic and insane, that it was difficult to believe it. But it was the truth—the naked, stubborn truth—the mighty force that always wins." The mere style of that is evidence of genius, but the crowning evidence is the egoism of it—for all geniuses are egoists. To McCarthy this plot to do away with McCarthy transcended the killing of Caesar, the burning of Rome by Nero, the Guy Fawkes plot, the blowing up of the Maine, and the assassination of three of our presidents. As to the gifted labor-leader's references to his predecessors along literary ways—to McCarthy, an author is an evolver of plots, and he thought it safe to assume that all of them used blood and thunder as a basis. He might, had his acquaintance with the great been more extended, have also included Charles Klein and Laura Jean Libby. But then he would have been shorn of some of his pride, for he would have found in "Little Goldenhair, or Should a Working Girl be Beautiful," deep-laid schemes that would have thrown the attempt against him in the shade.

When at His Best

But it is not for me even to suggest. Rather is it my business to further exploit McCarthy by giving another paragraph, in which he belabors the union electricians who seceded from his ranks and Herbert George the bugaboo of McCarthyites: "The President of the Building Trades Council of this city and state, in the personnel of P. H. McCarthy, the undersigned, must be by those Herbert George hirelings, under the hood of No. 6 unionism particularly, with their few supporters, abused and traduced and his name dragged in the mire, or cesspool of Herbert George's Citizens' Alliance political corruption, when the facts are that Herbert George and his paid hirelings, the leaders of which have the most unsavory reputation both as to unionism, truth and veracity, until their capacity for lying and their actions generally have become a stench in the nostrils of decent society and a crime against honest, loyal, liberty-loving, God-fearing union men and citizens generally." Now don't be discouraged if you can't follow the thread of the foregoing. Remember that the best of us have troubles with Henry James, and that symbolism marks the work of Maeterlinck and McCarthy's beloved Ibsen. I think that McCarthy has been delving into Browning, and I can plainly see the influence of William Butler Yeats and other Celtic writers who leave one to guess what it is all about. McCarthy is as intelligible as is necessary. It is not the arrangement of his words that interests the readers of organized labor, who, when his epithets are strong enough, never worry about their sequence.

Comments of the Interior Press

While our strikers may not be able with the assistance given them by the local press to form an accurate conception of the tone of public sentiment, by consulting the newspapers of the interior they will have no difficulty in learning what the people of the interior think of them. The Times of Los Angeles has kept in touch with the situation from the beginning and has supplied its readers with the whole truth. The Times asserts that the restoration of peace and quiet was entirely due to the presence of Governor Gillett and that it has been made apparent that the union leaders have the power to exact submission from their men and to compel them to refrain from disorder. Referring to Chief Dinan last Monday the Times correspondent said: "With a storm of newspaper roasts coming in from the whole country, and with the Board of Trade appropriating $5000 to investigate the charges of cruelty made against his policemen by the strikebreakers, Jeremiah is not happy. If he could have heard Adjutant Laue discussing his case today, his peace of mind would not have grown calmer.

"It is not for us to do," said General Laue hotly, 'but I don't see why the merchants, the voters and property holders of San Francisco don't go to the Mayor of San Francisco and demand that man's removal.' Jerry has not yet seen the Governor. The reports that have come to him of the Governor's heart-to-heart talks with the Mayor and with Cornelius, president of the car strikers, makes Jeremiah's blood run cold with anticipation. Governor Gillett left the other two almost in a state of collapse. A staff officer who summoned Cornelius to the interview told us about it today.

From the Times I excerpt the following pen portrait of a gentleman who is vouchsafed much space for his mouthings in our daily papers:

"Cornelius is an insolent and abusive cockney. He has the soul of a lackey and the manners of a boor. To him has been given a Czar-like power over these striking carmen. He forced them into this strike against their wills. The blackguardism with which his statements to the press are filled have done much to hurt the cause of the strikers. When ladies threw flowers from the Hotel Majestic to the strikebreakers yesterday Cornelius let out a shriek that they had been bought to do it. When brave young Thornwell Mulally made his daring ride on the first car that went into the burned district, Cornelius said he was risking his life because he hoped some girl would rush out and kiss him. Every one who has to have dealings with him is insulted. In fact Cornelius is the type best known as 'scrub.' Came to him a young aide-de-camp yesterday. Cornelius demanded his business with his usual insolence.

"The Governor of California wants to see you," said the officer slowly. The officers say that Cornelius turned as white as a sheet. His knees were shaking beneath him as he tried to stand up. He tried to pick up the desk telephone, but it dropped with a crash from his nerveless fingers. He tried to shut down his roll-top desk but knocked all papers off. He was so agitated he could hardly talk. This was the same brave man whose assassins, in guise of 'pickets,' created the bloody riots of Tuesday, then blamed the murders on the pitiful handful of southern boys who went out from the stockade to face death. The Governor said some things to him that made his hair stand on end. Cornelius never peeped in resentment. He only kept bobbing and bowing like a servant and kept mumbling out 'Yes'r, yes'r.' When the Governor was through with him he crawled out like a whipped school boy.

In Times of Stress

This brave Cornelius would have us believe That bricks a-flying in the air deceive;
'Tis true they look like deadly missiles, quite,
But harmless are they if you dodge them right.
McCarthy on the other hand declares
His henchmen ne'er would hit you unawares;
Indeed they very much do deprecate
The awful riots that we've had of late:
So says McCarthy, boss of building trades,
And as his tongue within its cavern fades
A crash is heard resounding from afar,
Naught but the crash of female laden car;
Also the cry of women in great fright
Assailed by artisans who've ta'en to flight.
Well might they wish for demagogic rule—
A Gage at helm of state, for Mayor a fool,
But in the Book of Fate it seems 'tis writ,
"In times of stress there comes the man of grit."
The man is here, the Governor of State
With troops on hand prepared to arbitrate;
Brave Champion of law who knows no fears
Of rampant demagogues with rabbit ears,
Of agitators who his course assail
While crowds of anarchistic cowards rail.
Let peace our main request be of his giving
And Pest Cornelius damned to earn his living.

A Rich Woman's Generosity

The generous lady of Pacific Heights who sent $500 to the telephone strike breakers in appreciation of their "loyalty" reminds me of the bejeweled applause given Herr Conried when that very thrifty manager announced that his opera would proceed without a chorus. He had refused to grant an increase to his chorus singers, perhaps for the same reason that he had ordered his scenery imported from the cheaper painters of Europe. Thus, while the box-holders had raised a general croak over the niggardliness of the Metropolitan productions and the scarcity of great singers among his principals, they showered him with orchids for refusing a small raise in wages to his meanest paid employees—the over-worked, unapplauded backbone of opera, the chorus. To revert to the $500, it is perhaps somewhat difficult for a lady having so much pin money to appreciate the sentiments of a girl who for $25 a month has to sit at the switchboard the long, long day with her ears full of calls, queries, burrs, buzzes, hellos and insults. Perhaps it would surprise her to be told that it is because there are prosperous corporations with stockholders fattening off such drudgery that we have industrial strife and anarchistic unionists. While it is quite proper to sympathize with strikebreakers now that unionism is drunk with power and hostile to law and order it is well not to lose sight of the injustice that breeds discontent.

Some Plucky Reporters

The newspaper reporters had a chance last week to show their pluck, and they came to the scratch in fine style. In automobiles, in buggies, on foot, and in the cars that were the centre of the storm, they kept in the thick of the fight. Young Levick, of the Examiner, by closely trailing the cars that went to battle, gathered material for a signed article that attracted much attention. Harry Coleman, photographer for the same paper, was in the midst of brickbats and bullets, and a man was shot down within a foot of him. Photographer Hunt of the Chronicle was on one of the cars that was mobbed on Devisadero street on the second day of the trouble, and succeeded in getting some fine pictures of the rabble in action. But a brickbat hit the corner of his carrying-case and broke five of his best plates. One of the Call reporters started to board a car near the scene of the big fight on Turk street, and had the muzzle of a revolver poked into his face. The man behind the gun was a determined looking Farleyite. The reporter, having no police badge with him, hastily dropped to the street. "I knew it would be all right," he said, "if I told him I was a reporter. But his finger was on the trigger, and I thought he might be a lot quicker at shooting than I was at explaining." Less spectacular but just as dangerous work was done in getting reports of the strike meetings of the carmen held at the Central Theatre. At the first meeting the reporters hid behind the scenes, and before the meeting was concluded they were discovered by some of the carmen, who told them that if they were caught around there again they would have their heads beaten to a jelly. One of the reporters who wrote shorthand had taken down the oath of allegiance to the union, and the publication of it plunged some of the strikers into a state of frenzy, and their threats were repeated with added emphasis. Nevertheless, the boys were there on the night of the meeting at which it was decided to strike. This time they got into the theatre in advance and hid in the flies from which vantage point they watched the union men hunting around behind the scenes to make sure there was no "chiel among them takin' notes." They got full reports of this meeting—reports which reflected no credit on Cornelius. They showed that, instead of being a leader, he was a weather-vane.

The End of the Chapter

Now that the Corey-Gilman scandal has been duly solemnized and the steel magnate and his sweetheart have been regularly consigned to each other's arms it is to be hoped that the curtain will be rung down on this drama of cardinal vulgarity, and that we shall be spared further details respecting the plans and emotions of this very callous couple. It is incredible that the public should demand the privilege of further intimacy with the notorious steel magnate and the very commonplace young woman who alienated his affections from the partner of his early joys and sorrows. They have been exploited in so thorough a manner that the public has been able to form a pretty accurate conception of their mental make-up, and an impartial judgment based on that conception pronounces them well matched. The Corey personality impresses one with its fitness for exemplification of the old aphorism that God's contempt for wealth is evidenced by the persons he bestows it on. As for the bride who says that her ambition is to conduct a salon, I am inclined to the opinion that if she ever does it will be in vaudeville to which she may aspire not on the strength of her talents but on the notoriety she achieved by exercising a Circean spell over a Pittsburgh millionaire.

complications which threatened to ruin the reputation for financial wizardry of that facile and indefatigable solver of problems the Hon. William Greer Harrison. These complications have been largely due to the optimism of Mr. Harrison in whose wisdom the club has long had illimitable confidence. For many years Mr. Harrison has been the guiding spirit of the club not only on cross-country jaunts and mid-winter ocean plunges but in everything appertaining to club policy, and it must be admitted that as a guiding spirit he was a most gratifying success. Under his management the club was piloted through financial straits and into a harbor rolling and gleaming in the gorgeous sunlight of prosperity. As time went on Mr. Harrison came to be looked upon as the club's indispensable prophet, and Mr. Harrison came to look upon the club as the offspring of his genius in the rearing of which he should have exclusive original and final jurisdiction. In this sentiment he was most amiably indulged. Each year the club went through the form of electing a board of directors but everybody understood that the directors were Mr. Harrison's puppets. Their business was merely to carry out the wishes of the prophet. This system worked all right while there were no complications to be handled. It worked all right until after the fire when a new building was required. Then it was that friction was engendered.

Obstreperous Humphrey

First there came opposition from Director William F. Humphrey who had been elected to serve as a Harrison puppet, but who conceived the heterodox notion that he represented the club and should exercise his own judgment. Humphrey threatened to precipitate a schism. He wanted the plans for the new building put into competition, but Mr. Harrison explained that he had already selected an architect. This explanation, much to everybody's astonishment, did not satisfy Mr. Humphrey. But the other directors being of the orthodox dispensation stood with Mr. Harrison. A little later Mr. Humphrey was again kicking over the traces. He learned that the contract for the construction work had been awarded to a company by which Mr. Allan Pollock, a director of the club, was employed. Humphrey was of the opinion that there was some unpropriety in this transaction. He not only favored competition in such matters, but suggested that no director of the club should be financially interested in the contract for erecting the club building. Mr. Pollock said he was willing to resign from the club directory, but Humphrey said he did not see how such action could set the matter right. Harrison tried to placate Humphrey by informing him that the directors cut a very small figure in the management of the club, and that in the final analysis it was one William Greer Harrison who would be held responsible for the club's affairs. Then in a spirit of satire Humphrey moved that the directors give Mr. Harrison full power to act, and he very nearly fell off his chair when the motion was seconded and carried without opposition.

The Complications Thicken

It was after this meeting that Harrison proposed that Humphrey be given a dinner. The dinner was given and it was a most harmonious and enjoyable affair. There was a fine flow of spirits, an outpouring of beautiful sentiment and a rattling good exchange of nicely phrased compliments, but these manifestations of a happy concord in nowise contributed to a solution of the financial problem that was every day getting on the nerves of the directors. Though Mr. Harrison was not in the least disturbed by this problem a few of the directors were. Mr. Harrison's optimism was as vigorous as ever, but unfortunately the members of the club were becoming sceptical of his wizardry. They heard talk of big assessments and other ways and means of raising the wind for the beautiful masterpiece of architecture with which Mr. Harrison purposed ornamenting Post street, and they were anything but enthusiastic. And while the crisis was approaching propositions for membership began pouring in from sources that were not approved by some of the members. It was learned that certain young men about town who knew of the club's distress thought it an opportune time to break in since there was need of money. One of them is the son of a prominent physician who happens to be a Jew. Another is connected with a lottery company and he happens to be a Jew. It was said that the physician's son was willing to contribute five hundred dollars to the club's treasury. To both men objection was raised for reasons having no taint of racial prejudice, but the circumstance of their being Jews was the source of much annoyance because of the fact that the Olympic Club has more than once been charged with indulging a blind prejudice. So sensitive is the club on this subject that it is almost taboo among the directors. Consequently it complicated matters very much when it bobbed up the other day. It was about that time that Max Rosenfeld resigned as the director of the club. And then came the meeting at which Mr. Harrison severed his connection with the management. That was a very stormy meeting. Mr. Harrison, I hear, submitted an ultimatum which was to the effect that he would continue at the helm for fifteen thousand a year and a five years' contract. Of course Mr. Harrison is worth it. A man of his fine administrative capacities and charming presence, a man invaluable as he is for inspirational purposes, is worth at least fifteen thousand a year to any athletic club that can afford the luxury, but the Olympic with nothing but an almost fathomless hole in the ground and a swimming tank felt that it could not afford it.

The Waif of the Bad Lands

Howard Gould's domestic troubles seem likely to prove as rich and racy as were those of his sister, the Countess Castellane. Thus far the newspapers have not secured a firm hold on the titler of this scandalous story, but as soon as they do it will probably serve to hold the interest of those readers who have found in the details of the Corey-Gilman comedy-drama a fine antidote for the infestivity of existence. In these parts keen interest will be taken in the smashing of the Gould household on account of the lively recollections we have of the lady who is now the wife of the millionaire. Because Katherine Clemmons once lived in Oakland we used to refer to her as a California actress, and after she went on the stage we were frequently regaled with the highly romantic story of her infantile experience with Indians in which Colonel Cody, better known as Buffalo Bill, heroically figured. This story used to be told by way of explanation of Colonel Cody's fatherly interest in the charming actress. It was said that when he was chief of United States scouts he was one morning leading a column along the Deadwood trail and came upon the wreck of an army ambulance. Near by were the bodies of several officers and troopers who had been scalped. Hearing the cry of an infant Colonel Cody searched among the wreckage and found a baby girl, the daughter of a scalped officer. Many years afterward when Buffalo Bill was the reigning sensation of London where he was giving his hippodrome, he was approached during a performance one night by a handsome blonde girl who introduced herself as "the waif of the Bad Lands." It was Katherine Clemmons, the actress who was having a hard time trying to get a foothold in London. As Cody was then hobnobbing with the Prince of Wales and cutting a wide swath in the aristocratic drawing rooms of the British capital, it was easy for him to gladden the heart of the actress with introductions that were worth while. It was also easy for him to render her an object of considerable interest to the public. Thereafter and until she became Mrs. Gould Katherine Clemmons was known as the protegee of Buffalo Bill.

All lines of business, except stables and their adjuncts, are suffering grievously. Trade ventures that were just beginning to lift their heads in the burned district are sinking like grain under blight. The restaurants there have lost entirely their evening trade and it looks as if many of them would be compelled to close. I drifted into one of the best-known establishments for dinner last Sunday and only six diners appeared between 5 and 7 o'clock. The staff of waiters has been cut from fifteen to three and the proprietor confided he was losing $500 a week. A score of small dealers keep him in supplies, so they must be suffering in like ratio. The carmen and their affiliations are losing some $5,000 a day in wages, but that is only a dime compared with the ebb flood of dollars this deplorable affair is costing the shopkeepers, clerks and merchants and capitalists. Its a lesson pregnant with meaning when taken in conjunction with the last municipal election. This is paying the piper with a vengeance.

Checking Up the Independents

I hear that the carmen's proposed method of handling the boycott is creating a good deal of discussion in union ranks. Most of the union leaders think there will be no trouble in preventing the men from patronizing cars by the present fines ranging from $5 to $50; but many of them are exceedingly dubious regarding the success of trying to boycott the city merchant who allows his employes to ride on cars. Those who are managing this end of the affair hope to reach such offenders through their "connections" with some member of a union. Names of all employes in the shopping district are now being rapidly gathered for this purpose. If Harry Smith of the White House is observed riding on a car his residence and relations will be looked up by the proper committee in his district. Should one of these relations belong to a union that relation is made responsible for Harry Smith's act and such member will be ordered to dragoon young Smith into line. Of course the White House will also be threatened but the answer given will probably be reserved by the visiting committeemen. Those who run with passing events these days believe that long before this boycott is well organized the ebullient spirits in the union ranks, who are zealously striving to bring about a clash between classes, will commit some overt act that will call for a short, sharp and quick settlement of the whole wretched business.

Enter: The Oriental Business Agent

M. Samoti, nattily dressed, effusively polite after the manner of the educated oriental, shrewd, observant, always ready for business, is stopping at the Fairmont making ready for his flight some three days hence through the trade centers of the Pacific Coast. M. Samoti was here some two years ago on a similar very important mission. For be it known that M. Samoti is one of those keen witted sons of Nippon selected by sapient capitalists there to invade this country and finance ventures among the Japanese residents that yield the thrifty bankers all the way from ten to twenty per cent. profit. It is the commercial development of the old padrone system which in the hands of its present masters gives its servants a fitting competency when they succeed. Two years ago when M. Samoti was in this city he was instrumental in opening up several score of employment agencies, restaurants, curio stores, flower stands, shoemaking shops, laundries, tailor and women's "fancy goods emporiums," and the like. M. Samoti is business incarnate and he is ready to open up any kind of shop with Japanese capital and Japanese help that will tempt the custom of any race and yield a satisfactory profit on the investment of the Nippon capitalists. Usually M. Samoti picks out some ambitious Jap who has learned the local business ways, outfits the store and puts him in charge with a contract to eventually buy it out on partial payments. Its "your credit is good" on a national scale and at present it is one of the greatest money makers that is reaching out from the orient. On this trip M. Samoti is going to distribute several score of his agencies in the best business centers of the Pacific Coast. I presume eventually they will girdle the earth just as the Japanese steamship lines are now striving to do.

Japan's Coming Handicap

Anent the rising reputation of Japan as a factor in the world's trade, I asked M. Samoti whether he noticed much difference in the business life of Nippon during the last two years. He laughed lightly, after the inscrutable manner of his kind and in his very excellent English replied: "Oh, yes, indeed. We have unions there now." He paused while his eyes twinkled. "To be sure they are not quite so well, so fierce as they are here, but I suppose Japan will have everything in time—just to be civilized, you know. The Japanese unions are very young but they give all the Western evidences of growing and with the usual consequences. For instance the cost of living has increased very much in the last two years. Yes, Japan is passing through very great and very grave changes. While we have reaped immense benefits from the outside world we have discovered that we have also grafted a great many occidental troubles on our old-time oriental cares. Still you Western people can teach us a great deal in practical science and business." He closed his eyes slowly—meditatively, it seemed; but from a certain twitching about the corners of the eyes I am still uncertain whether he was gravely winking. Knowing M. Samoti as I do I am sometimes inclined to think he was winking.

Ruef's Collapse

At the publication hour comes the news that Abe Ruef pleaded guilty in open court to the charge of extortion on which he was indicted for the part played by him in the conspiracy against the French restaurants. The men behind the prosecution have not, up to the hour at which this is being written, vouchsafed any information that would indicate that Ruef had confessed his innumerable iniquities. It is almost inconceivable, however, that he should plead guilty except upon terms made with the prosecution.

Poacher McLean

To the readers of the local newspapers Alexander McLean, gentleman poacher of the Pacific, is not an unfamiliar figure, but he is far from being appreciated for those elements in his character which have given direction to his adventurous spirit and caused him to checker his career with experiences sufficiently exciting and romantic to render a plain, unvarnished narrative thereof almost as inspiring and diverting as one of Hugo's or Dumas' novels. I am not surprised to learn that a writer of fiction has decided to make McLean the hero of a novel, but the fact is perhaps not of the slightest importance to literature. Jack London revealed McLean to us in his "Sea Wolf" and Frank Norris made some of his escapades serve the end of fiction in his stories of "The Three Black Crows," but the vivifying hand of genius has yet to inject into a McLean of fiction the spinal marrow of romance. McLean now makes Victoria, B. C., his headquarters and he is seldom heard of in American waters, but along the water front one frequently hears stirring narratives of which he is the central figure, for he has been very well known here ever since the customs officers discovered opium in sacks of copra. That was when McLean was on the South Sea run. In recent years he has found seal poaching a sufficiently lucrative occupation. Miles Reilly, onetime captain of a Spreekels schooner, relates that during the Russo-Japanese war he heard about McLean when he was cruising about the Kurile islands. One day he put into a little settlement on Copper Island, a Russian possession off the southeast coast of Kamtschatka. Here the Russian Government has a fur station and there is usually about half a company of soldiers to guard it. Reilly says that when he arrived he found only ten soldiers under the command of a sergeant, the rest having been removed in the general panic that seized the Russians when the island of Saghalien was threatened with invasion. These mournful ten, marooned there on the bleak island, had a strange tale to tell. In the month of April, so they told Reilly, just after half of the garrison had left for Saghalien, a schooner flying a strange flag such as they had never seen before put into the bay. The captain of the schooner, a big American with a tremendous mustache, came ashore to get water. The captain was an affable man. He was jolly. They had not seen any stranger for many months and they were glad to meet this big captain and crew and to have a jolly time with them. The American captain brought two cases of champagne ashore and that night they had a big drinking bout. The captain could drink more than anybody else. Everybody got blind, stone drunk. The next morning when the Russians awoke they found themselves tripped up like fowls for the basting, each to his bedpost, and the big captain and all of the sailors had vanished. When they had loosed themselves the guardians of Russia's furs discovered that the storehouse lock had been forced and that between $15,000 and $20,000 worth of seal pelts were gone—all the store of Copper Island. Reilly says that the captain was "Sandy" McLean.

Caught By a Russian Cutter

At Petropanlovsky Reilly was told of how "Sandy" McLean, a sea pirate sailing under a Mexican flag in the auxiliary schooner Acapulco, had put a Russian revenue cutter out of commission in the summer of 1903 and escaped from under the guns of that same cutter under cover of a fog. McLean's schooner had been caught by the Russian cutter poaching off the Kommandorfsky Islands, northeast of Kamschatka, caught fairly and with bloody evidence of guilt below decks. McLean tried to run, but he surrendered when a shot was fired through his rigging. His papers showed that his craft was the Acapulco, Mazatlan register; his flag Mexican. The Russian revenue boat took the Acapulco under convoy to the nearest port of the Kommandorfsky group, where McLean was to be tried and sentence passed upon him. When the little harbor was reached the Russians uncoupled the auxiliary engine of McLean's boat and took some of the parts on board their own boat, to prevent the escape of the Acapulco. Two days McLean and his crew remained on the schooner, anchored a short distance away from the Russian boat. The American captain seemed ready to take his medicine quietly. The third night a heavy fog settled over the bay just after sundown. The commander of the revenue cutter was preparing to send a guard on board the Acapulco at 9 o'clock. He heard the sound of hammering coming through the fog from the direction of the captured schooner and decided to hasten the sending of the guard, when suddenly there was a heavy explosion just under the overhang of the cutter, followed by the splash of oars. Then the Russians heard the rattle of a windlass and the excited coughing of an engine. Orders were given to get the cutter under way and investigate the state of the Acapulco. At the first turn of the engines the revenue cutter's tail shaft spun wildly and the machinery raced. The propeller and part of the rudder had been blown away by the explosion of a bomb and the revenue cutter was helpless as a log. While the Russians stamped and swore they could hear the puffing of McLean's engines as the Acapulco felt its way in the fog out to sea. McLean must have had extra parts for the engine concealed somewhere in the hold of his boat for use in just such an emergency. He had coupled up in the fog and then rowed over in a boat and set off a bomb under the Russian's stern. After this exploit Captain McLean fell foul of the United States in transactions that were various and productive of worry to four executive departments at Washington. The suspicion that the captain had been guilty of poaching on the American herd of seals up around the Aleutians had long been in the minds of the revenue cutter men on this coast and he was indicted in this city in 1904. Two revenue cutters were instructed to bring McLean back to this city dead or alive, but he was not caught until September, 1905, and then his registry and his flag were Mexican and this circumstance proved a diplomatic stumbling block, the arrest having been made in Victoria and "Sandy" went free.

A Fine Tribute

Last but not least among the facts of salient interest in the career of this pirate and poacher is that in the very latest governmental records that concern him he is held up for public admiration as an exemplar of the very highest virtues. against whom there is an indictment pending in the Federal courts of this jurisdiction while in the records of the House of Congress he is pictured as a citizen of rare worth to whom his country owes a debt of gratitude. This anomaly was brought about as a result of the joint commission of this country and Canada which met a year ago to settle claims made against this country through the enforcement of the pelagic sealing regulations. The Judiciary Committee of the House reported in March of last year that at the time of the dispute between this Government and the Government of Canada over the rights of Canadian and American sealers the American sealers organized themselves into a committee of investigation, with a view to reducing the claims of the Canadians before the commission. Evidence offered by them carried weight and the Canadian claims were cut from $1,289,008 to $463,454. In commenting upon this act, Counsel Don M. Dickinson said: "Conspicuous among the Americans was Alexander McLean. He owned a half interest in two ships seized by the United States, for which Great Britain demanded indemnity. His coworker, a British subject, had sworn before the Paris tribunal that he was the sole owner. The registry of the ships did not disclose Captain McLean's interest. Under the stipulations nothing could be awarded to him, an American. But a full award to the two ships would have benefited him to the extent of his equities in them. Under the circumstances this brave and honest man made oath before the commission to his part ownership when by silent assent to the perfidy of his partner he would have benefited himself. Not only did Captain McLean lose by his truthfulness, but his activity on behalf of the United States subjected him to many unpleasant experiences and personal risk at the hands of the British claimants and their friends in Victoria. Surely such a man—and his countrymen, the American sealers who joined, defended and sustained him—not only deserves the consideration of his Government, but has earned the praise of the Psalmist given to him who sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not." So perhaps after all this daring adventurer of the seas is not so black a villain as he has been painted.

Royalty Smiles Upon a Tobin

The news comes to me from an authoritative source that Agnes Tobin's literary achievements have won for her the very highest social recognition in London. Her sympathetic translations of Petrarch, I am told, have received the highest praise from no less a critic than the Queen herself who is very fond of poetry and especially fond of Petrarch. My informant says that Agnes Tobin will be a guest at a royal dinner party to be given before the opening of the season. Now that she has been taken up by royalty there will probably be a great demand for her poems.

Home Again, Off Again

Frances Joliffe tripped on the heels of her sister Hattie's departure for Europe and the former is now in New York while Hattie is on her way to Europe. Hattie has long been the head of the Joliffe family, supervising the domestic arrangements and ably attending to the business affairs of her sisters. She has always said that nothing but "death or sudden disaster" would budge her from San Francisco and as a matter of fact it is the sudden death of Mr. Cryan that caused her to pack her trunks. Mrs. Cryan was Miss Matthews, a cousin of the Joliffes, and she is living on her husband's estate in Ireland. Margaret Joliffe, now Mrs. Herbert Mofft, went to live with her aunt, Mrs. Matthews, when she was a little girl and it was at the Matthews home in Oakland that she met her husband. Frances Joliffe, who goes her interesting way without much of a "by your leave" to the rest of the family returned from New York a short time ago with the avowed intention of going to Tonopah. What her mission was she would not divulge but evidently her idea went a-glimmering and she has once more sped across the continent, with Europe beckoning on the horizon. Miss Hattie Joliffe traveled with the Claus Spreckels party but Frances went her independent way a few days later.

A Characteristic Marin Episode

A friend in the East writes me that May Sutton, the tennis champion of Southern California, who has thus far defeated all Eastern comers, has been lionized by society. San Francisco society never stroked the Sutton name because it was not modishly cut. Though the Suttons come of blue blooded English stock they are frankly poor. The first appearance of the Sutton girls at San Rafael was the signal for the tawdry fashionables who make that resort their headquarters, to lorgnette them in astonishment. The girls wore the most inexpensive frocks and they were not cut with the style that the clever American girl knows how to impart to the cheapest print dress. So while local society was duly impressed with their skill as tennis players it pronounced them "dowds." I remember a little scene on the club house porch which exemplified how snobbish a money snob may be without half trying. A member of a family, whose fortune was accumulated in a vulgar business, tried to give May Sutton a covert dig on having her expenses paid at the hotel. The youngest Miss Sutton disarmed her at once by expressing surprise that any one should think she was paying her own way. "You wouldn't travel far on the proceeds of a 2x4 orange grove," she laughingly admitted. As all the Southern California tennis experts have always had their bills canceled during tournament week at San Rafael there was no need for the stab at May Sutton. That she has made a hit in the East in more ways than tennis is not a matter of surprise in Southern California where the Sutton household hangs out the hospitable latchkey. They entertain in a wholesome, simple manner in keeping with their exchequer and never make any pretense at doing things like their wealthier friends. This breezy, unpretentious way of doing things is evidently not so distasteful to Newport as it is to San Francisco, for May Sutton has a dozen invitations to visit at the Eastern seaport before she sails for England. The Iselins have taken a particular fancy to her, Nora Iselin being herself a tennis player in the champion class. I hear that she is to spend a couple of weeks as Miss Iselin's guest and I am sure that the fact that her frocks are not redolent of Paris will not in the least affect the California tennis champion's capacity for thoroughly enjoying herself.

Why They Don't Eat Much

Along the byways, where gingham aproned neighbors foregather to discuss back-fence philosophy, and the price of butter and eggs, it is generally believed that in the halls of the gilded, nightingale tongues and kindred epicurean delights are daily served for the delectation of petted palates. The other day I heard one of the Scott family discussing the telephone girls' strike. We were having tea and muffins and between dainty nibbles the lady expressed her opinion on the protest voiced by the strikers against the luncheon served by the company. "Fancy calling tea, bread and butter and cold ham a slim luncheon!" expostulated the lady. "Of course the company did not pretend to serve an elaborate meal—just something hot and a bite with it, and the privilege of filling up the interstices in the bill of fare from the home lunch box. But many's the day I don't eat half as much luncheon as the company provided for those girls?" Which statement is probably sheer truth and could be subscribed to by dozens of society women. But if we poked about for the motive of the simple lifeitis which these women follow we would find it written large in the fashion journals. Slenderness has been deified and the followers of the attenuated cult observe more fast days than Buddha every dreamed of. A society girl, who feared obesity might pad her modish bones, told me the other day, that she was faint and dizzy from hunger! And this confession was made on the heels of an elaborate luncheon evoked to the last exacting demand of a Lucullus. But this resolute searcher after angles toyed cleverly with her food and ate as little as the participants at a "stage" dinner when the viands are all "props." Mrs. Joseph Sadoc Tobin is the accredited standard after which the fashionables model themselves. However Mrs. Tobin does not have to practice gastronomic self-denial to keep from casting a shadow. Two or three seasons ago when she took the rest cure nearly two months she took on a little weight and almost challenged recognition on her reappearance. But in a short time Mrs. Tobin was her slender graceful self again. She has always had lithe, sinuous lines that escape the angular and she does not have to keep the lid screwed tight on all sweets to escape a double chin. The Tobins expect to leave in a few days for the continent where Mr. Tobin intends to take the "cure" at one of the famous European baths.

She's So Apathetic

From the very heart of what is left of our smart set comes to my ears the wail of some very much disgruntled women who have been comparing notes and have agreed that Mrs. C. B. Alexander is not very sympathetic toward fashionable people of the Far West. The burden of their plaint is that the former Hattie Crocker does nothing to further their social ambitions in New York. One distinguished leader of this city who expected to be put in touch with the most swagger New Yorkers paid her respects to Mrs. Alexander and was invited to a tete-a-tete tea party, and she lost several pounds in the streams of indignation that gushed from every pore. Lillie Martin Oelrichs has worked tooth and nail to exploit the Martin-Harvey clique in New York, but the New Yorkers have failed to respond. Mrs. Charles Oelrichs has given them teas and dinners but they have not made a ripple on the surface of the social pool. The tip that I get is that Mrs. Will Crocker is the only San Francisco woman who could become a leader in New York society. Her haughty manner has impressed some of the New Yorkers, and being a relative of Mrs. Alexander's and an intimate friend of Lady Paget she is at least qualified to start. As for Mrs. Alexander, she has always been hospitable to San Francisco people of artistic temperament, but to our provincial aristocrats with vulgar social aspiration she is painfully apathetic.

SUBURBAN VILLA SITES

The demand for suburban property is increasing every day and the tide of homeseekers has been turned down the peninsula, the climatic charms and scenic beauties of which seem to have only lately impressed the people of San Francisco. Those charms and beauties have long been known to the fashionable herd whose homes are among the show places of the state, but now the general public are availing themselves of bargains in home sites and there is a very brisk movement in real estate especially in San Mateo. Among the most attractive of the suburban spots is Fair Oaks, situated in the beautifully wooded Menlo Park section, and to that place an excursion is to be run on Saturday the 25th under the auspices of P. W. Selby, the real estate agent, for the purpose of exhibiting about fifty villa lots in Watlington Park. The details of this excursion project will be found on another page. Watlington Park is a thickly wooded tract of land situated in the centre of a home district. It is close to Fair Oaks station and is not far from Stanford University. It is now one hour from San Francisco on the Southern Pacific. When the Bay Shore cut-off is completed the time will be reduced to twenty minutes.

Mrs. Carter in Du Barry

Her shock of red hair a greater shock than ever, her embonpoint more fleshily accentuated, her shrieks more highly pitched and her tears saltier and more profuse with the passing of seasons, Mrs. Leslie Carter returned this week to re-exploit her tumultuous personality in "Du Barry." It was never a particularly artistic personality and though it has been recently debelascized (to the blatant accompaniment of the press agent's brasses), the old impulse still persists to over-emphasize her salient characteristics. Having vermilioned the auburn of her locks, strengthened the pull of her sensuality and heightened the fever of her unreprieve, it has rendered her too grotesquely melodramatic to evoke normal human sympathy. Mrs. Carter's is exclusively a sense appeal; stirring the animal with her erethic portrayal of primal passions she still leaves the brain unnaturally cold and calculating, as in the presence of a known and feared Circe. With a spark of the gemlike flame of intellect that lights Mrs. Fiske to superlative triumphs Mrs. Carter would be an overpoweringly great actress. That spark the Belasco steel could never strike from her brain, the right metal not being there, so her educator was perforce content to teach her bosom its heavings and her eyes their tears. In these things she was an apt pupil for nature worked hand in hand with art, but when "Du Barry" was fashioned as the medium for the two it was inevitable that the defects as well as the merits of the system should be bared. "Du Barry" contains Belasco's best and Belasco's worst. His best Mrs. Carter adequately interprets—therein lies her excellence—but in her rendition of his worst she conveys the irritating impression of perfect satisfaction with herself and with her author. For Mrs. Carter there is no incongruity in any of the lines; she lacks the power to differentiate pathos from bathos. And as she maunders with quite serious sobfulness over unpicked violets or hugs the shadow of a ridiculously unconvincing romance of what Belasco gravely calls "pure love," the question comes—has this woman ever correctly gauged her own capability or has she simply reposed an implicit trust in her teacher, accepting without debate the lines and the "business" he provided for her? Certainly she has not thrown, probably has never tried to throw, any illusion of art over the gaping weaknesses of this badly carpentered melodrama. If sighs could propel it over a sea of tears all would be well, but they cannot and Mrs. Carter must be satisfied with a few brilliant moments in a long performance. To those whom a minute of crowded emotionalism compensates for an hour of dreary commonplace "Du Barry" will do, but do they not find themselves, in the intervals of dazzlement, longing for less of carmine in the Carter hair and for more restraint in the Carter acting? One "sees red" in the play, but not continuously nor exactly as Mrs. Carter sees it. One feels the sting of flesh too, but it is not the flesh of Parisian Du Barry, the doll of the world; it is the flesh of a supremely undolllike and very American actress.

—Edward F. O'Day.

Nance O'Neil in Oakland

An engagement of considerable importance is announced by Manager H. W. Bishop. It is the engagement of that virile tragedienne Nance O'Neil, for six weeks, at Ye Liberty Playhouse in Oakland. She is coming direct from Boston, a city that has most substantially rewarded her art. There she has won fresh encomiums in "Cleo," the play that was written by Edwin Milton Royle for Mrs. Leslie Carter. During her Oakland engagement Nance O'Neil will be supported by the excellent stock company of Ye Liberty. It has generally been her misfortune when in California to be surrounded by mediocre players, so it should be most gratifying to her to be supported during the coming engagement by men and women capable of perfecting the essential illusions. Miss O'Neil will open her season next Monday evening in "Magda," her favorite role in which she has given some of her greatest performances. She will be seen during the engagement in "The Sorceress," "Cleopatra," "La Tosca" and "Macbeth."

Goodwin Coming

Nat C. Goodwin, master of comedy, and by many considered the foremost actor of the American stage, comes to the Novelty Theatre next Monday, and no one could be more welcome after a season of musical shows, melodrama and problem plays. It will be refreshing to see this great comedian in a role worthy of his talents. He will present his latest success, "The Genius," written by William C. and Cecil de Mille. It is said to be the best comedy Mr. Goodwin has had since "The Gilded Fool." Mr. Goodwin's new leading lady is Miss Edna Goodrich, a professional beauty, and also, it is said, a charming actress. Among the members of the company are Neil O'Brien, Robert Paton Gibbs, H. G. Lonedale, Gordon Johnstone, W. J. Deming, M. B. Snyder, Miss Louise Randolph, Rose Snyder and Suzette Jackson. "The Genius" will be elaborately and artistically mounted with special scenery and stage decorations up to the usual high Goodwin standard.

Messrs. Belasco and Mayer put on "The Charity Ball." This play was written especially for Daniel Frohman by David Belasco and Henry C. De Mille and had its original production in New York when Frohman had at the Lyceum Theatre what was said to be the strongest stock company ever organized in the country. As played by Henry Keley, Georgie Cayvan, Nelson Wheateroft, Effie Shannon, W. J. LeMoyné, Charley Walcott, Fritz Williams and others, "The Charity Ball" enjoyed one of the most successful runs ever recorded on Broadway. It is a play that has found favor in stock ever since being a drama of really artistic construction based upon a story of human interest and abounding in emotions that will always evoke deep sympathy.

The Crosman Engagement

Starting with the matinee this Saturday afternoon Miss Henrietta Crosman will open her postponed engagement at the Van Ness Theatre, and will play all of next week. This announcement will surely gratify theatre patrons in this city who may have begun to fear they were not to have the pleasure of seeing this gifted comedienne. It would indeed have been a disappointment if her San Francisco engagement had been cancelled, and it is a matter for congratulation on the part of playgoers that it has been decided to open the Van Ness. Miss Crosman has not been in the city in many years—not since she became a star—but there are many who will recall her delightful work when she was well known here as a member of Charles Frohman's comedians, with Daniel Frohman's Lyceum Company and earlier when she was with Augustin Daly. Since those days she has made a series of successes through which she has won recognition as one of the greatest comedienues of the American stage. She will be seen at the Van Ness in her latest New York success, the modern farcical comedy, "All-of-a-Sudden Peggy" in which she appears as a witty and impulsive Irish girl who creates may complications by her schemes to evade marriage to a lord.

Orpheum Vaudeville

Next week's programme is sure to commend itself especially to the patrons of the Orpheum, for it is one of the most attractive ever given in vaudeville. Papinta and Valerie Bergere, who are the chief of the new people, are too well and favorably known to require eulogy. Miss Bergere is an actress of genius and versatility who disdains tradition and delights with her originality, while Papinta is an American girl who has won for herself a fine reputation in the chief European capitals. Miss Bergere, who will be supported by her company, will present her most recent triumph, "The Morning After the Play," written by Willis Steele, the author of "The Fifth Commandment." Papinta will dazzle with her beautiful dances and illusions. The Royal Musical Five, consisting of Edward V. Meyer, flute; Julius C. Meyer, viola; Alex. C. A. Meyer, violin; Fred W. Meyer, cello, and Helen E. Meyer, mezzo-soprano, and the famous team, Carroll and Baker, Hebrew comedians, prodists and dancers, will be the other novelties. Next week will be the last of Ethel MacDonald, "The Girl Behind the Drum," Matthews and Ashley in "A Smash Up in Chinatown," Kramer and Bellelaire in their exhibition of physical culture and Volta, the "Electric Marvel."

Idora Park

Monday evening next "When Johnny Comes Marching Home" will have a grand revival at Idora Park. Edith Mason, the soprano, will make her first appearance with the Idora company on this occasion, as will also Tom Persse the tenor. Arthur Cunningham will sing his favorite role of "Johnny" and the Oakland small boys will again be whistling "My Own United States." The "Wedding Day," another opera by Julian Edwards, will follow.

The Beautiful and Peerless Danseuse Who Will Appear at The Orpheum Next Week.

The Allen Sonata Evening

It required a deal of pluck on the part of Warren D. Allen to give his Sonata Evening as announced on Wednesday of last week. With the Mayor's proclamation requesting citizens to refrain from being on the streets unless impelled by necessity adorning street corners and exaggerated journalistic accounts of riotous deeds to excite sensitive nervous organizations, the prospects of an enjoyable evening were considerably dimmed. But the young pianist was not to be daunted by these conditions, and the small coterie of musical enthusiasts who ventured out to Lyric Hall had occasion to congratulate themselves at the close of the concert. For Warren Allen has proven himself a musician of really distinguished talent, and aside from the very fine renditions of the Brahms, Liszt and Schumann sonatas, the spontaneous, apparently unconscious improvising that preceded his numbers contributed largely to this conviction. The Brahms sonata, a novelty to us, must be exceedingly sympathetic to Mr. Allen, for his performance of it seemed almost like an inspiration in portions, notably in the Ruckblick, a short episode of beautiful melodic invention. This, with the Aria of the Schumann F sharp minor sonata was delivered with a particularly fine conception of tonal effects. Perhaps the piano is entitled to share in this eulogy, for it was the same Weber grand that Rosenthal used in his recent recitals here. Technically, young Allen is a wonder. Not any portion of any of the three sonatas seemed difficult for him, and certainly they make immense demands upon the mechanical skill of the performer. In the last movement of the big Schumann sonata, where several themes of exalted beauty are imbedded in a mesh of complicated technical difficulties, Allen's digital supremacy enabled him to extract the very essence of the music with apparent unconcern for its accompanying mechanical exactions. The audience was roused to great enthusiasm at the end of the Schumann sonata and the long continued applause was rewarded by an encore, the Moszkowski "Caprice Espagnol," which was played with capital bravura and a light, crisp staccato that is one of the earmarks of the real piano virtuoso. Hugo Mansfeldt, who is responsible for much in the forming of this young artist, is entitled to congratulations.

Margaret and Bayard

Bayard Veiller, the San Francisco reporter who married Margaret Wycherly of the Alcazar company some years ago, has made a great success out of the management of his wife. Margaret Wycherly has won recognition in New York as an exponent of the drama that has literary merit, and though she has talent and artistic temperament and some of the other essentials to artistic achievement, it is not to them alone she is indebted for her triumphs, but also to the genius of her husband for catching the public ear. And Villier is something more than a manager. He lately turned playwright and his wife is interpreting him in New York and both play and actress are receiving liberal applause. The play is called "The Primrose Path," and is based upon an unpleasant theme which is treated with such frankness that it might cause more comment, we are told, were it not an incident in a theatrical season in which the works of Ibsen and George Bernard Shaw have figured. "It tells a story," says a critic, "of elopement and desertion which in itself is brutal and not usually the subject for polite conversation."

But, considering the theme, the author has skilfully avoided suggestiveness. The play holds the interest of the hearer throughout and affords an excellent part for Miss Wycherly, whose acting in Yeats's plays a few years ago won favorable comment. The heroine is Joan Tregghenna, a Devon girl, who has fallen in love with a young American artist, Templeton, and run away to Paris with him. They were to be married there and would have been in England if the laws hadn't required an impossible delay. In Paris the artist becomes sick while working on the painting which is to win fame for him. He is almost dead for lack of food. The rent is due and the girl cannot make money posing. A physician says that only proper nourishment can save the man. The landlord threatens the pair with eviction the next day if his money is not forthcoming, and the girl goes out on the streets to save her lover. A few years later in New York the artist has made his success. The wedding has been put off and put off, and the painter, yielding everything to his ambition, breaks away and plans to marry the daughter of a millionaire patron. Joan becomes a model again and is acting as such when the rich girl, one of the students, announces her engagement to the artist. Joan finds the couple together, and as a climax to the third act tells the story of her life in Paris and her sacrifice for him. There is considerable power in this scene and Miss Wycherly played it with just enough restraint to make it convincing. In the hands of a less capable actress the effect would have been far different.

The Entre Nous Club will hold its first annual cotillion at the Hotel Bon Air, Larkspur, on June 1st.

Among the recent arrivals at Hotel Bon Air were Frank Lee-Hunter and wife, Paul Barbierie, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Ephram, Washington J. Bray, E. Kniekerbocker, Miss R. Burnstein, Dr. Percival Dolman, Captain G. W. Bauer, Sanford Lewald.

Among the arrivals at Byron Hot Springs during the past week were the following from San Francisco: T. H. Goodman, Chas. B. Wheaton, Henry W. Landsberg, Geo. Wayne Coffee, A. Dolten Harrison; Mrs. O. J. Woodward and the Misses Woodward from Fresno, and Mrs. Paul Neumann from Honolulu.

"It will climb hills as good as the Model 'A' Olds." This is a remark made by an agent for a well known car selling in the neighborhood of $2,900.00, when asked by a prospective purchaser if the machine was a good hill climber. "All cars are compared with the Oldsmobile," says Mr. Calvin C. Eib, salesman for the Pioneer Automobile Company, who recently drove a model "A" Oldsmobile to the top of Twin Peaks.

Dr. Paul Burns' enthusiasm for automobiling grows upon him daily. Dr. Burns says: "When I first purchased my Thomas 'Forty' Touring Car it was as a means of transportation, for I had never taken a great interest in automobiles. At first I did not drive my car but, after having taken a number of long rides and a turn at the wheel, I now take great pleasure in driving the car myself and often wonder that I did not see the pleasures to be derived from motoring a long while ago. My Thomas 'Forty' is so simple to operate, that it is a great pleasure to motor."

Her Stage Career

Miss Edna Goodrich, Nat C. Goodwin's leading actress, is a Hoosier girl, having been born in Longansport, Ind. She was educated in Chicago where her father was a prominent coffee merchant. She made her first appearance on the stage at the Casino, New York, in "Floradora." She was one of the Sextette, but not one of the famous originals. When the "Floradora" fever was over Miss Goodrich went with Anna Held and played Madame Recamier in "Mlle. Napoleon." Then she placed herself in the hands of a veteran actress now retired and studied night and day for nearly a year. When she became confident of her ability to act she purchased the rights to the comedy "The Genius and the Model" from the de Mille brothers and starred in the piece several weeks jointly with Harry Woodruff. The tour was not successful, Mr. Goodwin purchased the comedy, reduced the title to "The Genius" and engaged Miss Goodrich to play the leading role.

In the Limelight

Mrs. Leslie-Carter is to give a special matinee performance of "Zaza" at the Novelty Theatre on Sunday afternoon. This play will also be presented at the closing performance of the engagement on Sunday night.

Among the plays to be offered by Nat C. Goodwin during his coming engagement at the Novelty Theatre are "The Genius," "A Gilded Fool," "An American Citizen," "What Would a Gentleman Do," "When We Were Twenty-one."

Among the people engaged for the coming special season under the management of T. Daniel Frawley at the Novelty Theatre are Marie Shotwell, Lola May and Walter Craven. "Leah Kleschna" is to be the opening bill. Among other plays to be staged is "You Never Can Tell."

Gerardy, the greatest of the violincellists, will again visit America next season.

"The Christian Pilgrim" is the title of the production to be presented next season by Henrietta Crossman.

Otis Skinner will commence his limited engagement at the Van Ness Theatre on Monday, May 27. The noted actor will make his appearance in "The Duel."

Maude Adams in "Peter Pan" will shortly be seen at the Van Ness Theatre. Charles Frohman has chartered a special train for the transportation of this attraction across the continent.

Viola Allen is now making her farewell tour, having decided to retire to private life at the close of her coming engagement in this city. The charming actress is to appear in a revival of "Twelfth Night" and a bill composed of scenes and acts from various Shakespearean plays.

Daniel Frohman has undertaken the management of Kubelik's next American tour. It was under his able management that this remarkable violinist first appeared in America. Only an artist of the highest rank has ever tempted either of the Frohmans into this class of work. Will L. Greenbaum will represent Mr. Frohman in the local management of the concerts to be given in this vicinity.

The Stork of Saint Franciscus

stork with a long red beak. His black-colored feathers were shining; and he clapped his wings in a friendly way as he followed Francis, who could not take his eyes from his true comrade. He kissed them, to the surprise of all, with tears running down his cheeks.

On a golden chair sat Francis, resting his head on the stork's breast, caressing gently his wings and neck. And now he was thoroughly happy.

But what happened to Francis, happened also to the stork.

He gazed thoughtfully into the glitter of heaven. He changed his legs frequently, and dreamt of the vast green meadows, of the moors and marshes, over which the clouds were passing, of the brushwood, and the reed which rustles in the zephyr's breath, and in which millions of small creatures move and tremble. And he dreamt on sadly, remembering how at the sound of his measured step the frightened frog would jump into the brook, nature's living face, a droll little creature and a succulent morsel. He saw in imagination a black and white salamander run through the reeds straight into his open beak, and yawned wistfully.

He saw the warm grey cottages, with a church spire in their midst, and on one red roof a rotten wheel of a mill-cart, his nest. He recollected how, as each autumn approached, all his colleagues gathered in a long procession over meadows, over glens and over seas,—a gigantic caravan, winging day and night to the Nile, towards the land of pyramids.

And in his deep longing he no longer thought of heaven; in his discontent he cut with his long beak from left to right amongst the saints who happened to be in his way; and the storm grew when the stork caught the sacred veil of Saint Mary Magdalene in his beak and carried it in triumph through Heaven.

Immediately the Saints united in an indignant appeal to the Almighty to send the stork away.

And with bowed head, barefoot, in his monk's cassock, Saint Francis stood, with folded hands, before the Throne, anxiously awaiting the verdict which might for ever part him from his friend.

Deep silence. For some long time the Holy Mother, Our Lady of grace and mildness, gazed without speaking on Saint Francis, and on his stork. At length, she spoke, and her voice rang like little silver bells accompanied by the strings of a harp.

"Both parties shall receive satisfaction," she said. "Francis and his stork, Francis and the other Saints. Wise and clever is the stork. If he feels drawn back to earth, well and good; he may fly down, fly as the messenger of God, to keep an outlook on the moors and marshes, and then return to Heaven and join Francis."

And the stork nodded gently; while the Virgin pointed out to him a bush of Heaven's roses, under which slept two rosy angels in close embrace. And then the Virgin bowed. The mist that separates earth from Heaven suddenly cleared. The sun shone. And the earth below was visible as it lies on the aether's bosom like a glorious rose, and on it one saw vast forests like great stripes, rivers like white thread, and mountains like dark spots.

"Look down below," said Saint Mary in a sweet and tender tone. "There, near the forest, lives a poor but pious family, who longingly hope for a child. To-day their wish shall be fulfilled. Clever, wise, and prudent stork" (here the bird started to clap with his beak noisily, his pretty eyes shining in glee)—"hear me:

"Take this little angel who slumbers into thy beak, fly through the clouds, through mists, over woods and mountains, and in the stillness of the night knock on the little window of the hut; fly into the room; tap with thy long beak on the heart of the mother who sleeps in darkness, and place the little angel quickly and very tenderly into the empty cradle, for the good, poor people to rejoice."

And the stork, the wise and clever, did as he was told. They all looked down on the earth as he flew to the hut and placed the child into the cradle, and they saw how joy and bliss glittered in the couple's eyes, while with pleasure God stroked His long, silvery beard, above all praising His all-beloved Mother.

Soon after this the stork returned to Heaven. On the moors he certainly made a halt, and lurked, and made a hearty breakfast on frogs and worms. He returned then to Francis, who was happy and content, embracing his beak and stroking his sleek neck.

Thus the stork has gained Heaven, and, though he may suffer from ennui, brings angels to men.

This famous Cordial, now made at Tarragona, Spain, was for centuries distilled by the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) at the monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, France, and known throughout the world as Chartreuse. ## The Philosophy of Tea

The "Chaking" consists of three volumes and ten chapters. In the first chapter Luwuh treats of the nature of the tea-plant, in the second of the implements for gathering the leaves, in the third of the selection of the leaves. According to him the best quality of the leaves must have "increases like the leathern boot of Tartar horsemen, curl like the dewlap of a mighty bullock, untold like a mist rising out of a ravine, gleam like a lake touched by a zephyr, and be wet and soft like fine earth newly swept by rain."

The fourth chapter is devoted to the enumeration and description of the twenty-four members of the tea-equipage beginning with the tripod brazier and ending with the bamboo cabinet for containing all these utensils. Here we notice Luwuh's predilection for Taoist symbolism. Also it is interesting to observe in this connection the influence of tea on Chinese ceramics. The Celestial porcelain, as is well known, had its origin in an attempt to reproduce the exquisite shade of jade, resulting, in the Tang dynasty, in the blue glaze of the south and the white glaze of the north. Luwuh considered the blue as the ideal color for the tea-cup, as it lent additional greenness to the beverage, whereas the white made it look pinkish and distasteful. It was because he used cake-tea. Later on, when the tea masters of Sung took to the powdered tea, they preferred heavy bowls of blue-black and dark-brown. The Mings, with their steeped tea, rejoiced in light ware of white porcelain.

In the fifth chapter Luwuh describes the method of making tea. He eliminates all ingredients except salt. He dwells also on the much-discussed question of the choice of water and the degree of boiling it. According to him, the mountain spring is the best, and river water and spring water come next in the order of excellence. There are three stages of boiling: the first is when the little bubbles like the eye of fishes swim on the surface; the second is when the bubbles are like crystal beads rolling in a fountain; the third is when the billows surge wildly in the kettle. The Cake-tea is roasted before the fire until it becomes soft like a baby's arm and is shredded into powder between pieces of fine paper. Salt is put in the first boil, the tea in the second. At the third boil, a dipperful of cold water is poured into the kettle to settle the tea and revive the "youth of the water." Then the beverage was poured into cups and drunk. O nectar! The filmy leaflet hangs like scaly clouds in a serene sky or floated like water-lilies on emerald stems. It was of such a beverage that Lotung, a Tang poet, wrote: "The first cup moistens my lips and throat, the second cup breaks my loneliness, the third cup searches my barren entrail but to find therein some five thousand volumes of odd ideographs. The fourth cup raises a slight perspiration,—all the wrong of life passes away through my pores. At the fifth cup, I am purified; the sixth cup calls me to the realms of immortals. The seventh cup,—ah, but I could take no more! I only feel the breath of cool wind that rises in my sleeves. Where is Iloraisan? Let me ride on this sweet breeze and waft away thither."

The remaining chapters of the "Chaking" treat of the vulgarity of the ordinary methods of tea-drinking, a historical summary of illustrious tea-drinkers, the famous tea plantations of China, the possible variation of the tea-service and illustrations of the tea-utensils. The last is unfortunately lost.

The appearance of the "Chaking" must have created considerable sensation at the time. Luwuh was befriended by the Emperor Taisung (763-779) and his fame attracted many followers. Some exquisites were said to have been able to detect the tea made by Luwuh from that of his disciples. One mandarin has his name immortalized by his failure to appreciate the tea of this great master.

In the Sung dynasty whipped tea came into fashion and created the second school of Tea. The leaves were ground to fine powder in a small stone mill, and the preparation was whipped in hot water by a delicate whisk made of split bamboo. The new process led to some change in the tea-equipage of Luwuh, as well as the choice of leaves. Salt was discarded for ever. The enthusiasm of the Sung people for tea knew no bounds. Epicures vied with each other in discovering new varieties, and regular tournaments were held to decide their superiority. The Emperor Kiasung (1101-1124), who was too great an artist to be a well-behaved monarch, lavished his treasures on the attainment of rare species. He himself wrote a dissertation on the twenty kinds of tea, among which he prizes the "white tea" as of the rarest and finest quality.

The tea-ideal of the Sung differed from the Tangs even as their notion of life differed. They sought to actualize what their predecessor tried to symbolize. To the Neo-Confucian mind the cosmic law was not reflected in the phenomenal world, but the phenomenal world was the cosmic law itself. Aeons were but moments, Nirvana always within grasp. The Taoist conception, that immortality lay in the eternal change, permeated all their modes of thought. It was the process not the deed which was interesting. It was the completing not the completion which was really vital. Man came thus at once face to face with nature. A new meaning grew into the art of life. The Tea began to be not a poetical pastime but one of the methods of self-realization. Wangyucheng eulogized tea as "flooding his soul like a direct appeal"; its delicate bitterness "reminded him of the after-taste of good counsel." Sotumpa wrote of the strength of the immaculate purity in tea which defied corruption as a truly virtuous man. Among the Buddhists, the southern Zen sect, which incorporated so much of Taoist doctrines, formulated an elaborate ritual of tea. The monks gathered before the image of Bodhidharma and drank tea out of a single bowl with the profound formality of a holy sacrament. It was this Zen ritual which finally developed into the Tea-ceremony of Japan in the fifth century.

Unfortunately the sudden outburst of the Mongol tribes in the thirteenth century, which resulted in the devastation and conquest of China under the barbaric rule of the Yuen Emperors, destroyed all the fruits of Sung culture. The native dynasty of the Mings, which attempted re-nationalization in the middle of the fifteenth century was harassed by internal troubles and China again fell under the alien rule of the Manchus in the seventeenth century. Manners and customs changed to leave no vestige of the former times. The powdered tea is entirely forgotten. We find a Ming commentator at loss to recall the shape of the tea whisk mentioned in one of the Sung classics. Tea is now taken by steeping the leaves in hot water in a bowl or cup. The reason why the western world is innocent of the older method of drinking tea is explained by the fact that Europe knew it only at the close of the Ming dynasty.

To the latter-day Chinese tea is a delicious beverage, but not an ideal. The long woes of his country have robbed him of the zest for the meaning of life. He has become modern, that is to say, old and disenchanted. He has lost that sublime faith in illusions which constitutes the eternal youth and vigor of the poets and ancients. He is an eclectic, and politely accepts the traditions of the universe. He toys with nature, but does not condescend to conquer or worship her. His Leaf-tea is often wonderful with its flower-like aroma, but the romance of the Tang and Sung ceremonials are not to be found in his cup.

Japan, which followed closely on the foot-steps of Chinese civilization, has known tea in all its three stages. As early as the year 729 we read of the Emperor Shomu giving tea to one hundred monks at his palace in Nara. The leaves were probably imported by our ambassadors to the Tang Court and prepared in the way then in fashion. In 801 the monk Saicho brought back some seeds and planted them in Yeisan. Many tea-gardens are heard of in the succeeding centuries, as well as the delight of the aristocracy and priesthood in the beverage. The Sung tea reached us in 1191 with the return of Yeisaizenji, who went there to study the southern Zen school. The new seeds which he carried home were successfully planted in three places, one of which, the Uji district near Kyoto, bears still the name of producing the best tea in the world. The southern Zen spread with marvelous rapidity and with it the tea-ritual and the tea-ideal of the Sung. By the fifteenth century, under the patronage of the Shogun, Ashikaga-Yoshinasa, the tea-ceremony is fully constituted and made into an independent and secular performance. Since then Teism is fully established in Japan. The use of the steeped tea of the later China is comparatively recent among us, being known only since the middle of the seventeenth century. It has replaced the powdered tea in ordinary consumption, though the latter still continues to hold its place as the tea of teas.

It is in the Japanese tea-ceremony that we see the culmination of tea-ideals. Our successful resistance of the Mongol invasion in 1281 had enabled us to carry on the Sung movement so disastrously cut off in China itself through the nomadic inroad. Tea with us became more than an idealization of the form of drinking; it is a religion of the art of life. The beverage grew to be an excuse for the worship of purity and refinement, a sacred function at which the host and guest joined to produce for that occasion the utmost beatitude of the mundane. The tea-room was an oasis in the dreary waste of existence where weary travelers could meet to drink from the common spring of art-appreciation. The ceremony was an improvised drama whose plot was woven about the tea, the flowers and the paintings. Not a color to disturb the tone of the room, not a sound to mar the rhythm of things, not a gesture to obtrude on the harmony, not a word to break the unity of the surrounding, all movements to be performed simply and naturally; such were the aims of the tea-ceremony. And, strangely enough, it was often successful. A subtle philosophy lay behind it all. Teism was Taoism in disguise.

Mr. S. C. Hammond, who, with his family, is spending his vacation in Ukiah, visited this city for a few hours last Sunday and says he is having a most delightful time touring through Lake County in his Oldsmobile.

Ford's Short Stories

"Truegate of Mogador" is but one of a dozen short stories in which Sewell Ford has delineated odd characters of Cedar-ton, South Jersey. It is a passing coincidence that F. Hopkinson Smith laid the scene of his last story, "The Tides of Barnegat" in the same locality. Truegate—Freedom Truegate was regarded by his fellow townsmen as a has-been, and it was therefore much to their surprise that, in compensation for political services he was appointed consul at Mogador. Where that was, neither he nor they had an inkling, but Truegate in time took up his duties where he lived in much the same way as at home, doing nothing in particular and not displaying any especial energy about it. He kept on hand a supply of St. Louis beer and cigars, with which he treated the native shieks, and unobtrusively he made friends with them until, in a crisis he proved to be the one man in command of the situation. "Shinner Liddell's Revel" deserves special consideration and should bear as good fruit as the sentimental sickishness of the opposite variety. "Shinner" was considered rather a "bad" boy, for he had original ideas and was not backward in expressing them. He was an orphan, but had a host of cousins and other connections, and was a leader amongst them at Cranberry Cove. The Cove people were not so poor as they were shiftless and unkempt but they were seized upon by some snobbish Anglomaniacs as the nearest approach to the tenants who figure in stories of English aristocratic life, and made the victims of a Christmas revel at "Brentmore." They were treated to an orange, a handful of cheap candy and trumpery toys, and their hostess and her friends looked them over as though they were strange specimens, and talked audibly of "the one ray of sunshine in their clouded little lives." "Shinner," though he was fifteen, attended the first "revel" out of curiosity, and when the second one was projected, on the next Christmas, he was ready to oppose it and to offer a counter-proposition, and to get up such a feast as was enjoyed by young and old, without loss of their independence and self respect. This pauperizing of the so-called poor has gone on so long that it has about destroyed their real Christmas spirit and reduced them to beggary which is open and shameless. Any one of the dozen tales should be singled out for special mention. This is Mr. Ford's second venture into bookland, his previous "Horses Nine" being well remembered by readers. Another of Charles Scribner's Sons' productions.

The Very Small Person

Annie Hamilton Donnell seems to have chosen for her particular field the portrayal of one phase of child life, the lonesomeness and shut-in-ness of very young children, who fight out their difficulties without appealing to their elders for assistance. To those who cannot read between the lines, it may seem that Mrs. Donnell is one of those new-fangled philanthropists who are bent on seeing children only as misunderstood and abused innocents, whereas, in fact, the hidden problem which she has searched out is but one corner of an ordinarily joyous existence. Children attach an undue importance to very little things and busy parents and elders do not even suspect what, if anything, may be troubling the minds of the champion eight-year-old catcher of the base ball nine, or the motherly heart of a five year old matron. What could be more perfectly absurd, for example, than the perplexity which finally drove a nine-year-old boy to inquire of an elder sister how people got married. She, girl-like, began to describe the ceremony, costume and festivity, but was interrupted by "I know all that part. How do you know when you have to?" Upon being enlightened as to attraction and affinity, he heaved such a mighty sigh of relief with his, "That's all right, then, if you get any say about it," that further questioning was resorted to, and behold! With prophetic fears, the child had been worrying himself because, somehow or other he had caught the impression that "they caught you and made you get married even if you didn't want to." To be sure there is more than a grain of truth in the notion, but who would have suspected a lad of his years, busy with his out door games and romps with his dog, could be harboring such a fancy? Mrs. Donnell's children often overhear some chance expression which they misinterpret, like the little girl who had so often heard it regretted by injudicious elders that she was not a boy to inherit the titles and estates, that finally she borrowed a suit of boy's clothes and cut off her hair in her efforts to correct the mistake of Nature and please her parents. Then, there was that other little one who, hearing some of her schoolmates gossiping over the discovery they had made that one of their little band was but an adopted child, fitted the remarks to her own case, and spent a grievous afternoon and evening until she learned that it was not she but her chosen playmate who was the waif. "The Princess of Make Believe" is rather to be envied than pitied, since she could make believe so delightfully, and live in a dream castle clothed in silks and velvets and fed from silver dishes, and could find her Prince Charming in the freckle-faced lad who had some of the same gift of imagination. Nor are fashionable mothers always heartless and the poor invariably kind. The truth is that we are all, old and young, in our inmost hearts alone. There is always the end of the passage beyond which none but ourselves can penetrate, and the veriest little chatterbox that ever blurted out embarrassing questions and unsuspected knowledge has this secret side, this something that it cannot or will not put into words. Mrs. Donnell has a family of bright little people of her own and has had ample opportunity to study the "Very Small Person" at close range. She would probably be the first to deny any intention of posing all children as tragic figures and flaying all parents for not divining all their moods. Illustrations to "The Very Small Person," which is published by Harper and Brother, are by Elizabeth Shippen Green.

AUTOMOBILE NOTES

Mr. W. F. Hunt of San Jose was in this city last week and purchased a type "XIV" Winton from the Pioneer Automobile Company and drove same through to his home.

Mr. C. F. Fout of this city made a trip to Pescadero and return on Sunday last in his Thomas "Forty" Touring Car, going by way of La Honda. He makes special mention of the bad roads encountered and, in summing up the trip, Mr. Fout says he does not believe there is another car built which will duplicate the performance of his Thomas "Forty."

That the West leads the way in more than one thing is shown by the fact that the supervisors of Alameda county, California, have just bought a Thomas Forty touring car for the sheriff. The car will be used by him in the performance of his official duties and it is not improbable that before the year is over tales of stirring hunts for fugitives from the law will begin to come in from Alameda county. The supervisors of the county became convinced that the automobile was a necessity for the sheriff through their use for two years of the Thomas Flyers owned by C. F. Horner, a member of the board. Mr. Horner has just bought a 1907 Flyer.

Baiting Our Plutocrats

George Eliot says that a difference of taste in jokes is a great cause of domestic discomfort. Which reminds us that a difference of taste in graft prosecutions, when it is intolerant, causes much ungenerous feeling. There is far from being a unanimity of public sentiment in this city today respecting the course of the very industrious and highly patriotic gentlemen who have earned our eternal gratitude by their achievements in the cause of civic righteousness. For having disrupted the strongly intrenched forces of graft they are entitled to popular acclaim, and doubtless they will receive the earnest commendation of posterity. But it is obvious that their contemporaries do not enthusiastically concur in their judgment of the policy that is being pursued. It has been ever thus. The passions, prejudices and self-interests of the times always affect contemporary judgment. Some philosopher of two or three generations hence with the advantage of perspective will perhaps form an accurate conception of these times and of the motives of our leading citizens. It is for us merely to speculate and grope for conclusions. In doing so we are bound to yield to constitutional inclinations. Town Talk's viewpoint in all probability is not the popular one. We have no hesitation in confessing that it would please us more to see Ruef, Schmitz and the Supervisors go to jail than to see them granted immunity in consideration of their supplying the evidence upon which may be established the guilt of the rich corruptionists in our midst. But more yet would it please us to see all hands go to jail, not because it is gratifying to see men in jail, but because we approve of salutary lessons for the benefit of society. The crime of bribe-giving is not in our opinion a venial offense. We appreciate the enormity of it. We are not without contempt for prosperous citizens who profit off the degradation of public servants, but we learned long ago that questions in morals and politics are questions of comparison and degree. So despite our aversion to actions which are inimical to the civic welfare, we feel that there is a vast difference between crimes that humiliating circumstances and plausible, popular casuistry seem to justify and those that imply a loathsome spirit of knavery and rascality; between crimes that take a coloring from environment, that are the consequence of a feeble public spirit and a complaisant morality, and those that are dictated by a corrupt heart, that stagger even an easy conscience and from which universal nature recoils. But it is not entirely as a result of metaphysical inquiry in the field of morality that we have come to prefer the incarceration of the organized grafters to that of the men who supplied the boodle. Knowing that it is difficult to weigh in an exquisitely nice balance the iniquities of men, we are not so dogmatic in our views on these subtle distinctions in criminology as to be intolerant of the sentiment which imputes to the bribe-giver in the abstract preeminence in viciousness. We merely wish to submit that in a community which thrice elected Eugene Schmitz to office, which amiably indulged the proclivities of a Ruef, which sounded the depths of the slums in quest of material for a legislative body, it savors somewhat of Pharisaism to yield to a paroxysm of virtuous indignation induced by crimes which were the logical consequence of our incivism and immorality. It may be urged that this paroxysm is the manifestation of a healthy reaction, of a sudden realization of ideals that are written in promethean characters in the hearts of us; but if so should we not nevertheless discipline our resentment? Have we not already sufficiently yielded to mob sentiment in this city and to the servile agencies that diffuse it? Organized labor created the conditions from which corruption flowed and now, still of obeisant temperament, we cater to its prejudices by granting immunity to its rapacious representatives while invoking the vengeance of the law on the heads of criminals whose crimes we made inevitable if not compulsory. We have no disposition to palliate the crimes of corruptionists, of conscienceless rich men who gladly availed themselves of opportunities to defraud this stricken municipality, but we confess a partiality for even-handed justice and a strong prejudice against demagogic discrimination that pampers and protects the most shameless band of grafters that ever disgraced an American city. We especially loathe demagoguery. We despise the demagogue. We believe he is the most dangerous and vicious of all undesirable citizens. And we believe he is to be discerned in the background of the graft prosecution. Far be it from us to attribute to the civic patriots to whom this community is profoundly indebted the mean purpose of winning the favor of the mob. We merely wish to suggest that they have been carried along on the tide of circumstances to which at the inception of their enterprise they were unable to offer resistance. To appreciate this suggestion one must recall the efforts that were made by Ruef, Schmitz and their blatant defenders to inculcate in the public mind the notion that Rudolph Spreckels and Francis Heney were the agents of organized capital and had begun an assault on the Schmitz machine for the purpose of undermining organized labor. Schmitz and Ruef as well as their numerous touts warned organized labor against the machinations of their accusers. Even Samuel Gompers, the prophet of organized labor, echoed the sentiments of the Schmitz touts and threw in a few of his own to make good measure. At a banquet in Washington given in honor of Schmitz after the adjustment of our differences with Japan Prophet Gompers denounced Spreckels as a capitalistic conspirator and proclaimed our infamous Mayor "The Greatest American since Lincoln." Meanwhile the anti-graft crusaders and our patriotic newspapers, among whom there has long been a keen and most edifying rivalry for the favor of organized labor, vociferously disavowed the sinister motives attributed to them, and to persuade the unions that their intentions were honorable affirmed their inflexible resolution to punish the plutocratic friends of the Mayor and his unspeakable mentor. In those days it was understood to be of the greatest importance to alienate union sentiment from Mayor Schmitz in order to solidify public opinion and persuade its acquiescence in all the extreme measure which Judge Dunne with a curious docility was ready to take to facilitate the routing of the grafters. And as time went on and industrial friction was intensified, the coddling of labor became the recognized programme of the graft prosecution. The baiting of the plutocrats of the public service corporation became the chief feature of that programme. To be sure they have only themselves to blame for being in a position to be baited. But that circumstance should not blind us to the wheels within wheels, nor to the fact that labor's champions, some of whom have been the champions of Schmitz and Ruef, are today guiding public sentiment in San Francisco. Surely the situation is one that invites to philosophic reflection. And surely one may break into the celestial harmony of it all with a jangling note of discord without being suspected of an immoral obsession. When we see stern moralists blinking the crimes of anarchists, demanding at the same time the rigid enforcement of the law against the representatives of one class and approving of discrimination in favor of the representatives of another we find it impossible to resist the impulse to challenge the sincerity of it all.

Socialists and Demagogues

Though socialism with us is not yet a formidable political power it is rapidly becoming an aggressive and organized force, and is building up an army of federated associations inspired by principles which are antagonistic to our form of government. American publicists are beginning to take alarm at the spread of socialism and the suggestion has been made that a propaganda be organized against it with a view to spreading a knowledge of the shallowness and viciousness of its philosophy. The spread of socialism is unquestionably fraught with dangerous consequences, and the importance of arousing an aggressive sentiment against it cannot be too strongly emphasized. The menace of socialism is much more to be dreaded than that of plutocratic domination but it is not likely to meet with opposition from those stern patriots who are so vociferously championing the rights of the plain people on the bema and in the columns of sensational newspapers. The swatting of the plutocrat is a pastime which is most congenial to the stern and noisy patriot since it insures him the privilege of the large and flowing ear of the mob, whereas to assail the socialist is to deprive himself of a large part of his constituency. One cannot be a very sincere patriot and be tolerant of socialism, whose apostles, says Karl Marx, are content at present with laying the foundation of revolutions but who expect to excite hatred and contempt for all existing institutions by waging war against all prevailing ideas about religion, state, country and patriotism. A religious propaganda is perhaps the most effective one that can be waged against socialism, but such a one is not feasible in this country at this time. The next best is one boldly and fearlessly devoted to the diffusion of the truth respecting the evils of demagogism. It is the demagogue who is mainly responsible for the spread of socialism since it is he that foment the discontent upon which socialism feeds. We might well follow the example of the Socialists of France and begin our propaganda in the schools. In France, where Socialism is most successful and where as a consequence there is less liberty than in any country except Russia, no concealment is made of the purpose to do away absolutely with love of country, and the beginning is made in the schools where it is destroyed in the hearts of the children. It would be well for us while inculcating the familiar precepts conducive to a strengthening of the sentiment of patriotism, at the same time to paint the demagogue in his true colors and make him an object of loathing and contempt.

What the Boise Trial Means

Not alone William D. Haywood, the secretary-treasurer of the Western Federation of Miners, is on trial at Boise but the whole of organized labor, and with perfect understanding of this fact the newspapers throughout the country are supplying their readers with exhaustive accounts of what promises to be one of the most momentous legal struggles of the age. Whether Haywood, Moyer, Pettibone and the others of the mysterious "inner circle" of the federation were or were not responsible for the murder of Governor Steunenberg matters not so much in the long run as the manner in which organized labor in the United States will receive the verdict of the jury which is being laboriously drawn to try the first of the suspects. The temper of the union men throughout the country in relation to the case was given extraordinary and disconcerting exemplification in New York when twenty thousand workingmen gathered to denounce the president for his now famous letter about "undesirable citizens" and to express their confidence in the men who have been charged with murder. If that mighty assemblage meant anything at all it implied the unqualified approbation of Haywood, Moyer and Pettibone without any reservation as to their guilt or innocence, and if that is the attitude of the labor unions outside of New York, it seems to follow that even their conviction of a dastardly crime will not cause the three men to forfeit the esteem of unionized workingmen. Here is food for serious cogitation. With the eyes of the whole country, including the keen optics behind the pince-nez glasses at the White House, fixed upon the courtroom at Boise, it is not likely that justice will be tampered with during these trials and if convictions are obtained it will be because complete proof of guilt of the three accused men has been forthcoming. Are their followers in the Western Federation of Miners and their present sympathizers in other labor associations to persist in idolizing these men in that eventuality? Their present feeling, manifested with unmistakable frankness at the New York and other meetings, indicates that they will do this. That will be equivalent to sanctioning violence, an endorsement of anarchy which involves approbation of the methods followed by the Russian terrorists. Organized labor, therefore, stands in a perilous position during these trials and unless reactionary counsels prevail, the widening breach between union men and the other classes of our population is destined to become a gaping chasm. Of course there is more than a possibility that the three men will be cleared of the ugly charges lying against them. One need not be ultra-sceptical to suspect the veracity of a man of Harry Orchard's type and on his confession the ease of the prosecution almost entirely depends. But nevertheless the outcome of the trial is going to have a mighty influence on the labor union idea. It is a case well worth careful study.

Keeping Corey in the Limelight

With the steel magnate and his actress bride in the earliest hours of their blissful dream of marital happiness, there is talk of deposing Corey from the presidency of the corporation which Schwab dishonored when he tried to break the bank at Monte Carlo. Evidently the steel trust which has never before been suspected of cherishing the luxury of a moral code has taken umbrage at Corey's repudiation of the helpmeet of his less prosperous years and his indecent haste in tumbling into matrimony with a chorus girl. Without going into the ticklish question of an employer's right (whether that employer be an individual or a corporation) to censor the private life of an employee, it must be said that a large section of the public will regard this determination of the steel trust to oust the bridegroom as most unfortunate involving as it does further exploitation of the disagreeable Corey personality. This whole matter has taxed very heavily the not-over-sensitive stomach of the American people. It has forced on our attention a crowd of vulgar persons whose only claim to notice consists in their relationship either to the millionaire or to the young woman with whom he became infatuated. It has also brought the unpleasant spectacle of a clergyman willing to perform the marriage ceremony amid all the bizarre circumstances wherewith the astonishing groom saw fit to surround it but stricken with immediate penitence when his complacency threatened the loss of his benefice. The natural shame right-thinking people feel as they survey this mass of vulgarity is deepened by the consciousness that Europe has been given another chance to sneer and gibe at our boasted civilization. Small wonder that American pretensions to taste and culture are received with such incredulity on the other side of the Atlantic when such a disgusting exhibition as the Corey-Gilman affair is possible.

Our Civic Spirit

Shortly after the April fire it was thought that a change was coming over this city. Manifestations slight enough in themselves but which were taken in their mass to indicate the direction of the current of events pointed to the emergence of San Francisco from the circumscribed condition of a small town and its progress to the prouder estate of a large city. But the civic development of this community still lags far behind its swift growth in population and in area; so much so indeed that San Francisco has only the soul of a village in the body of a metropolis. This peculiarity which cannot be grasped by those who passed their entire lives here and which is imperfectly understood by many who have had better opportunities for comparison, accounts for a great deal of the fascination of the old town that was blotted out by fire and earthquake, while at the same time it explains the most aggravating of the defects that have retarded our progress. The spirit of the city is still essentially parochial, made so partly by our detached geographical position and partly by a heady self-sufficiency, a combination of brains and brag, of resource and recklessness that have lingered so long only because strangers found them piquant and alluring and so confirmed us in the determination not to surrender them for more modern attributes. What we should dearly welcome is an impulse to doff our swaddling bands and stretch our limbs toward unrestrained development, for the day when San Francisco shall not be afraid of bogeys, when it shall not take alarm at shibboleths, when slogans shall have no power to cast it into panic and when intramural disputes shall not seem of supreme importance. It is a day that every man with the welfare of this city at heart should welcome, for with its approach we shall cease to be the sport of opposing factions; no clique will dominate us; the city will be paramount.

cance may or may not attach to the fact that he came from Los Angeles, a city which for many years has developed on liberal lines that have been the horror of self-satisfied San Franciscans. Certainly Governor Gillett afforded many of us a new vantage point from which to survey ourselves; he conferred upon the city the privilege deemed inestimable by the poet, of seeing ourselves as others see us. The Governor showed a most daring indifference in regard to the tremendous issues that are dividing the town into two camps; he seemed actually to doubt the worldwide importance of the principles for which the strikers and the strike-breakers are battling. To his view the one great principle that must be insisted on is the preservation of public order and the safeguarding of property. It need not be pointed out that this is a novel viewpoint for San Franciscans. To this city the laws have ever been like pie-crust, made to be broken; at least, to be broken whenever two factions in our midst arrayed themselves for a fight. Never in their wildest dreams have Mayor Schmitz or Chief of Police Dinan considered the enforcement of order and the repression of violence of more importance than the settlement of a dispute between capital and labor. Hence our strikes have usually been bloody and have never passed without some infractions of the peace; and it must be said that, unused to any other condition, our citizenry has rarely protested against the occasional disturbances that have varied from time to time the comparative monotony of life in San Francisco.

Perspective Impressions

Mrs. Howard Gould says that her husband is unfit to live with on account of his personal habits. It took her a long time to find this out.

The Carmen's Conference Committee reported through the columns of the complaisant press last week that two grammar school teachers had been seen riding on a street car. Teachers, beware! Do not labor under the delusion that you are living in an American city.

The striking longshoremen of Seattle have won more pay and their employers have won recognition of the open shop principle. Perhaps Calhoun wouldn't object to vouchsafing that sort of victory.

President Roosevelt's bull terrier, Pete, was thrown down, gashed and crippled, last week, by a mongrel cur of no official status. A case of lese-majeste with a vengeance.

Abe Ruef says that a great load has been lifted off his mind. But it is the one that has been lifted off his purse that he has been most happy to think about.

Dr. Benjamin Ide Wheeler says that if Ruef is really repentant he will give back his tainted money. Perhaps he's afraid it wouldn't be accepted.

From what Mrs. Stetson says one might infer that when the old gentleman married her he was of the same temperament as the average penniless Duke who indulges the ambition of an American heiress for mention in Burke's Peerage.

Chief Dinan says he thinks it was the United Railways Company that put an infernal machine on one of its own cars. If some one were to invent a machine that would discourage Chief Dinan from thinking that he thinks or could think he would be hailed as a public benefactor.

The Great Curse of France

By Major Ben C. Truman

I know of no single glass of drink so exquisitely and deliciously stimulating as that one of absinthe. It is a little green devil, and no mistake; this is because it is so enticing and so dangerous. But nothing ever manufactured of an alcoholic nature is so heavenly, so fascinating, so comforting—and, I might honestly say, so harmless as a single half gill of absinthe, into which a gill of cold water has been slowly and artistically dripped, and to which a teaspoonful of maraschino or green chartreuse may (or may not) be added. This single potation is a queen, beside which even the cock-tail—another nice little thing with horns and hoofs—is an ordinary subject. It courses through every portion of the body—it touches the brain, the heart, the blood, the very tips of the fingers and the toes. It electrifies the mind, it soothes the spirit, it caresses the whole body, and sets off the soul. To sip it slowly and genteely, after the day's work is done, perusing the evening paper, or chatting with an agreeable friend, between sips, there is nothing more delectable or comforting, nothing more ambrosial or stimulating, nothing more harmless or proper. But will this single potation suffice?

Let us examine France, where there is at least a seeming if not a real degeneracy. In the first place the 38,000,000 people of France drink eight times more wine than the 200,000,000 of inhabitants of the United States, Great Britain and Germany; and much of this wine is hot, adulterated muscatel, which is generally indulged in by the commoner classes after the consumption of a sophisticated red or white vin ordinaire at their two daily meals. They drink half as much beer and cider as the people of the United States; and, to the surprise of all statisticians on such subjects, France leads the world in the consumption of spirits, the exact figures for 1900 being France 1.94, Germany 1.89, Great Britain 1.08 and the United States .86 gallons per head.

And the worst of it is, France drinks the vilest and most dangerously adulterated of all, with the romping, fascinating, crazy-making, death-dealing absinthe at the head. Here is your fiend that is ruining the people of France. It is the voice of this demon that shouts the loudest at political meetings and threatens the destruction of the Government.

Absinthe is the great curse of France. It was given to the French army in Algiers in 1844 as a remedy against fever, thereby being introduced into France, and has done more than anything else to sap the strength and manhood of the country. Far worse than morphine or cocaine, it is taken to such an alarming extent in Paris that if the Government does not take some step to prevent its sale it will surely make the nation die prematurely. Once having drunk absinthe the fatal habit is formed, and in a terribly brief space of time the victim is either a ferocious madman or an idiot. It is, unfortunately, cheap, and there is no drinking place in Paris where it is not obtainable. It was at the bottom of Boulangism, nationalism, and every unpatriotic war cry that has of late years excited its crazy victims. It accounts for the fights in the Chamber of Deputies, the infamous ways of the journalists, the indecency of French literature, the mercenary actions of landlords and shopkeepers and the bad temper of most of the people.

The spread of drunkenness in the army is already engaging the attention of the wise. As a consequence of inquiries that have been made on this point, the Minister of War lately addressed a letter to the generals in command of the various army corps. In this document, the Minister says that he has considered two alternatives, one of which was simply to restrict the hours during which spirituous liquors might be sold at the regimental canteens, the other the complete abolition of the sale of these, and that he has decided that the latter was the only satisfactory course. "I have decided," he says, "to interdict absolutely the sale in the canteens of all eau de vie, or spirituous liquor of any kind, as well as the innumerable preparations known as appetizers." The last term is meant to cover absinthe and the various bitters which a digestion weakened by indulgence craves for. The General does not however, forbid the sale of ordinary fermented liquors, such as wine, beer, cider, perry, and, of course, permits the sale of tea, coffee, chocolate, and the like. It is only spirits that the interdict deals with. Perhaps the General thinks, as do many people, not altogether foolish, that pure wine and beer are not very unwholesome or dangerous drinks.

Of all the thirty-two thousand odd communes of France and Navarre, Marseilles is the one where the most absinthe is consumed. Paris comes next, that is to say in proportion to its population. Formerly the good Marseillais used to chiefly patronize the brand known as "Pernod" and appears to have been very well satisfied therewith until M. Jules Guerin visited their town and informed them that the "manufacturer of Pernod was a Jew." The Antisemites and "Patriots" at once adopted a brand known as "Berger," and the Dreyfusites and the Anti-Dreyfusites could easily be recognized at the cafes according to the brand of absinthe they favored.

Now, however, the Anti-Dreyfusites have discovered to their horror that M. Berger, whose brand they have been patronizing for nearly two years, is not only a Protestant but also a foreigner, a Swiss, and it is rumored that they have determined to drop absinthe altogether for the future, unless some enterprising member of the League of the Patrie Francaise starts a new "patriotic" brand which could receive the official sanction of those newspaper pirates, MM. Dru-mont and Coppee.

This green devil absinthe is at the bottom of half the reckless crimes that are committed in Paris. This Mephistopholes of the still urges his victims on to scold, revile, thrash, bite and shoot, and the French papers are full of the consequences each morning. I have preserved a few items selected from hundreds:

Ruef in His Latest Pose

By Theodore Bonnet

Abe Ruef's pose in the role of an idealist overwhelmed by temptation, corrupted because of his zeal for a political machine which was consecrated to the interests of workingmen, is the meanest sham ever foisted on a deluded public. Instead of the tears he evoked there should have been jeers and hisses. His words were not uttered in an atmosphere of verity and sincerity. His language about those dear ones at home for whom he was sacrificing his pride was nothing but sniveling cowardice, cant and hypocrisy. That whine was not unfamiliar to me. I heard it in the halcyon days of Ruef's predatory raids through the tenderloin when the captains of illicit traffic were paying for the privilege of imparting atmosphere to a wide open town. Whenever the thrifty boss was branded as a grafter it distressed him because of the effect it would have on the dear ones at home. When a man is really concerned for the dear ones at home he does not persistently make of himself an object of universal loathing. I cannot sympathize with the hysterical vapors of the man who debauched this city, who made of himself a stench in the nostrils of the community and who pretends to believe that he has done the manly in propitiating his prosecutors by making terms for his own immunity which involve the misery of men whose shame is upon his soul. One needs a faint memory to forget the monstrosity of his career and savor the moral intention with which his recent act is inspired. Howsoever charitable a man may be his gorge must rise and his stomach turn at the mawkishness and maudlinism of it all.

As I was not among those present when Abe Ruef, as a hysterical reporter tells us, held up his bleeding heart for inspection, it is not hard for me to discuss dispassionately the latest aspect of the heroic movement for the avenging of some of San Francisco's wrongs. Had I been present it is quite possible that I might have been carried away in the gale of emotion, for the effect of such scenes is infectious, but I am sure that on the subsidence of my feelings I should not have been impelled to grasp the hand of the prisoner at the bar. Yet I am not entirely unsympathetic. As many a time I have leaned over the rail of a prisoner's dock to shake the hand of Guilt I feel that I am not insensible to the sufferings of transgressors. Nevertheless I cannot compassionate Abe Ruef, and there are nine hundred and ninety-nine reasons which I could give for being averse to yielding a responsive vibration of the heart strings to his dithyrambic appeal. One of them will suffice. It is this: the confession obviously made for a sordid, selfish purpose and in every sense characteristic of the man seems to me to be the crowning infamy of a career black with iniquities.

It is to be doubted that the gentlemen swayed by Ruef in his fluent melancholy on the occasion of his palpitant tableau were fully aware of the significance of his plea of guilty. It was later that they learned of his confession. However it would have been pretty hard to resist that deftly contrived bit of theatricism, so superbly timed and so indicative of a fine sense of climax. Ruef has a large supply of that imponderable quality called magnetism, as they will attest who were swayed by his shallow sophistries in campaign times when he was vociferously protesting his innocence. It will be easy for them to believe that his dramatic performance in court was a prodigy of emotion, convincing and thrilling and acutely pathetic. That Abe captured the imagination of his audience, and with the deftness of a thaumaturge translated the heart of every mother's son in the court from thoracic cavity to cranium is not to be doubted when we find imperturbable journalists, the eye-witnesses of a thousand sensations, punctuating their descriptions of the scene with sobs, and in the spell of profound emotions volunteering the testimony that Abe was not wholly bad since it is of record that he never told a lie—to reporters. A little more of that and we might be able to make of Abe a Brian de Bois Guilbert, the heroic gentleman who gave this solemn assurance to Rebecca: "Many a law, many a commandment have I broken, but my word, never." Somebody has said that we ought to see far enough into a hypocrite to see even his sincerity. If we were to penetrate to that darkest and most real part of Abe Ruef where sincerity resides we might discern in him a silent inextinguishable prejudice against paying the penalties of his crimes; nothing more. Being convinced of this I doubt whether I could have wept with Ruef even in the humid atmosphere of hysteria generated by him in Judge Dunne's emporium of justice. Even in the matter of sympathy which is largely a matter of heart one may be capable of discrimination. And to sympathize with Abe Ruef one must be entirely oblivious of his past, deluded as to his nature and too dull to appreciate his motives. While it is quite natural to sympathize with repentance it is nothing more than unreasoning maudlin sentimentality that weeps over Abe Ruef's confession; a confession accompanied by a whine over the failure of his rich accomplices to hire counsel for him and therefore induced by a reluctance to part with any of his boodle even for his own defense; a confession instinct with treachery to men whose crimes were made possible by his unparalleled rascality.

We have been taught that the repentance of man is accepted by God as virtue. One of the finest institutions of antiquity was that solemn ceremony which repressed crimes and soothed the despair of the guilty by permitting the redemption of transgressions by modes of penance. But in those days remorse preceded expiation. And in those days there were crimes of such magnitude that nothing could effect their expiation. Nero though an emperor could not obtain initiation into the mysteries of Ceres. It was considered necessary for the protection of society that the most flagitious crimes should be deemed incapable of expiation that the prospect of absolution might not invite to their committal. What crimes could constitute a greater menace to the security of a community than those perpetrated by Abe Ruef? It was Abe Ruef that debauched this community. He is the leading heavy villain of the graft drama, and he is to be absolved as absurdly as was Jason of the murder of his mother-in-law. He is to take the rest cure for two years. He is to be relieved of all the anxieties, all the wear and tear of court procedure, with nothing to do but compute the interest on his half million dollars of plunder as it piles up in the interval of his retirement from the madding crowd.

Is he repentant? Well hardly. He snarls and snaps at his critics with his old time vehemence, protesting the while the sensitiveness of his nature and affirming the spotlessness of his character up to the time that he was corrupted by the present Board of Supervisors. He prates of his ideals and wishes us to understand that to a man of his proud nature it was a tremendous sacrifice to plead guilty, one that involved unspeakable mental anguish. Sympathetic reporters kindly impart color to these virtuous and poignant pretensions by telling us of Abe's education and refinement. If the whole city were suddenly stricken with a sense of humor it would find itself in hysterics over the acceptance in the guise of a trousered Magdalen of this rapacious rogue who never differentiated friend or foe in exacting tribute for the privilege of doing business in this charming metropolis.

What he probably means when he says that he is a man of ideals is that he learned at school of the ideals a man should have. A man is not to be condemned for not living up to his ideals. That is something that few are able to do. But it is gratifying to have ideals and make them our goal howsoever short one may fall. To be sensible of the ideals one should have and be entirely indifferent to them is abominable. The most potent factor in luring men away from their ideals is the superior opportunity for money-making in other directions, and to that lure Ruef yielded very early in his career. I have known Abe Ruef more than twenty years, and during all that period he has borne the reputation of a shifty, cunning lawyer of the type that does not reflect credit on the profession. On emerging from the university where ideals are dispensed he began his career as the attorney for the men and women of the tenderloin. He was the associate of Martin Kelly in politics and in the work that was being done outside the court room for Nettie Craven when that bold adventuress was trying to break into the Fair estate. He lured Jack Chretien into the commission of a crime which that unfortunate fellow is now expiating in the penitentiary. He inspired that hideous conspiracy against Police Commissioner Hutton which involved the ruin of a young woman's reputation, and all for the purpose of facilitating the extortion of money from the French restaurants. He—but why recapitulate the salient ugly events of this refined and educated lawyer's career. Allusion to them is made because he invites it, and because there should be dissent from the seemingly popular notion that the policy which is being pursued toward him is based on a noble conception of ethics and decency and has been most shrewdly designed to conserve the moralities. For while it is not to be doubted that Mr. Heney and Mr. Spreckels have done very much good, it is to be regretted that the redemption of the city must be accompanied by an anomaly instinct with so unfortunate a lesson as that of the compromise with Ruef and his pals. It was bad enough to give the shameless supervisors the "immunity bath" and retain them in office, but it would be hard to conceive a more startling perversion of justice than that by which the protagonist of the carnival of graft is to win leniency to a degree that amounts virtually to acquittal. This is perhaps the first time in the history of crime that the tempter has been deemed the least deserving of punishment. For Ruef was the serpent of the Schmitz dispensation. Why there should have been compromise with the head and front of all the rascality that has outraged this community nobody has taken the trouble to explain. In view of the fact that the attorneys for the prosecution repeatedly assured us that there was not the slightest doubt of their ability to convict all the big grafters it is most curious that they should have suddenly assumed so amiable an attitude toward Abe Ruef. Their conduct can be accounted for only upon the theory that they believe in the super-sensitiveness of his nature and are convinced that the mental agony he must endure is equal to life imprisonment in the case of the average mortal.

The Birth

By Mabel Porter Pitts

Around the spot rank grasses waved and bent,
And bird notes turned to discord shrill and harsh;
The scarlet lichen half its poison lent
To tint the seepings of the neighb'ring marsh;
Above the sod dead leaves in legion rolled,
Beneath, the darkness and the sodden mold.

Keen eyes, gray-filmed, from some repulsive head
Peered out in eager earnestness for prey;
The quickened body spoke the conquered dead,
And silence warned the life which crept that way.
'Neath heavy mosses, from the cypress swung,
Showed naught of color save the serpent's tongue.

But lo, one day, where brake and thistle grew
And brackish waters sunk most deeply in,
A shaft of golden sunlight filt'ring through Brought forth from where but loathsomeness had been A pure, white flower that tenderly was pressed
With gentle touch upon a maiden's breast.

Her Lover

(Translated from the Russian of Maxim Gorky by R. N. Bain.)

An acquaintance of mine once told me the following story.

When I was a student at Moscow I happened to live alongside one of those ladies who—you know what I mean. She was a Pole, and they called her Teresa. She was a tallish, powerfully-built brunette, with black, bushy eyebrows and a large coarse face as if carved out by a hatchet—the bestial gleam of her dark eyes, her thick bass voice, her cabman-like gait and her immense muscular vigor, worthy of a fishwife, inspired me with horror. I lived on the top flight and her garret was opposite to mine. I never left my door open when I knew her to be at home. But this, after all, was a very rare occurrence. Sometimes I chanced to meet her on the staircase or in the yard, and she would smile upon me with a smile which seemed to me to be sly and cynical. Occasionally, I saw her drunk, with bleary eyes, touzled hair, and a particularly hideous smile. On such occasions she would speak to me:

"How d'ye do, Mr. Student!" and her stupid laugh would still further intensify my loathing of her. I should have liked to have changed my quarters in order to have avoided such encounters and greetings; but my little chamber was a nice one, and there was such a wide view from the window, and it was always so quiet in the street below—so I endured.

And one morning I was sprawling on my couch, trying to find some sort of excuse for not attending my class, when the door opened, and the bass voice of Teresa the loathsome, resounded from my threshold:

"Good health to you, Mr. Student!"

"What do you want?" I said. I saw that her face was confused and supplicatory . . . It was a very unusual sort of face for her.

"Look ye, sir! I want to beg a favor of you. Will you grant it me?"

I lay there silent, and thought to myself:

"Gracious! An assault upon my virtue, neither more nor less.—Courage, my boy!"

"I want to send a letter home, that's what it is," she said, her voice was beseeching, soft, timid.

"Deuce take you!" I thought; but up I jumped, sat down at my table, took a sheet of paper, and said:

"Come here, sit down, and dictate!"

She came, sat down very gingerly on a chair, and looked at me with a guilty look.

"Well, to whom do you want to write?"

"To Boleslav Kashput, at the town of Svyepstsyana, on the Warsaw Road. . ."

"Well, fire away!"

"My dear Boles . . . my darling . . . my faithful lover. May the Mother of God protect thee! Thou heart of gold, why hast thou not written for such a long time to thy sorrowing little dove, Teresa?"

I very nearly burst out laughing. "A sorrowing little dove!" more than five feet high, with fists a stone and more in weight, and as black a face as if the little dove had lived all its life in a chimney, and had never once washed itself! Restraining myself somehow, I asked:

"Who is this Boles?"

"Boles, Mr. Student," she said, as if offended with me for blundering over the name, "he is Boles—my young man."

"Young man!"

"Why are you so surprised, sir? Cannot I, a girl, have a young man?"

She? A girl? Well!

"Oh, why not?" I said, "all things are possible. And has he been your young man long?"

"Six years."

"Oh, ho!" I thought. "Well, let us write your letter. . ."

And I tell you plainly that I would willingly have changed places with this Boles if his fair correspondent had been not Teresa, but something less than she.

"I thank you most heartily, sir, for your kind services," said Teresa to me, with a curtsy. "Perhaps I can show you some service, eh?"

"No, I most humbly thank you all the same."

"Perhaps, sir, your shirts or your trousers may want a little mending?"

I felt that this mastodon in petticoats had made me grow quite red with shame, and I told her pretty sharply that I had no need whatever of her services.

She departed.

A week or two passed away. It was evening. I was sitting at my window whistling and thinking of some expedient for enabling me to get away from myself. I was bored, the weather was dirty. I didn't want to go out, and out of sheer ennui I began a course of self-analysis and reflection. This also was dull enough work, but I didn't care about doing anything else. Then the door opened. Heaven be praised, someone came in.

"Oh, Mr. Student, you have no pressing business, I hope?"

It was Teresa. Humph!

"No. What is it?"

"I was going to ask you, sir, to write me another letter."

"Very well! To Boles, eh?"

"No, this time it is from him."

"Wha-at?"

"Stupid that I am! It is not for me, Mr. Student, I beg your pardon. It is for a friend of mine, that is to say, not a friend but an acquaintance—a man acquaintance. He has a sweetheart just like me here, Teresa. That's how it is. Will you, sir, write a letter to this Teresa?"

I looked at her—her face was troubled, her fingers were trembling. I was a bit fogged at first—and then I guessed how it was.

"Look here, my lady," I said, "there are no Boleses or Teresas at all, and you've been telling me a pack of lies. Don't you come sneaking about me any longer. I have no wish whatever to cultivate your acquaintance. Do you understand?"

And suddenly she grew strangely terrified and distraught; she began to shift from foot to foot without moving from the place, and spluttered comically, as if she wanted to say something and couldn't. I waited to see what would come of all this, and I saw and felt that, apparently, I had made a great mistake in suspecting her of wishing to draw me from the path of righteousness. It was evidently something very different.

"Mr. Student!" she began, and suddenly, waving her hand, she turned abruptly towards the door and

San Francisco's Traditional Spirit

Never in the history of San Francisco has there been so much need of harmony among those of its citizens who have some substantial interest in its welfare as at the present moment, and as usual there is a recurrence of inflammation in that same old traditional ungenerous spirit which energizes unweariedly in this community. Several gentlemen of fairly good reputation and some ability got together the other day to see what they could do toward repairing a very much damaged government, and with the suddenness of a bolt from the blue and the gratuitousness of a swift kick from a capricious mule they found themselves under a crushing weight of suspicion. Being somewhat timid and unaccustomed to rebuffs, typifying collectively the meekness of the apologetic public spirit of this supine community, they noiselessly receded into the background, leaving not a ripple on the surface of things. Evidently there is not an encouraging prospect of the counsels of common sense triumphing in a city whose pygmy citizens see only within the narrow circle of petty maneuvering and chicanery in which they move. The only man who sees his duty at this time, and who has the courage to perform it is Governor Gillett who is not to be intimidated by anarchists or disconcerted by the conspiracy to discredit him with the assistance of that now pliable scoundrel Abe Ruef. But now that the proud untrammelled press has grown tired of being unanimous the situation may soon be improved. The noble editors having smashed the entente cordiale are once more at loggerheads, and we may felicitate ourselves on this circumstance, for a community of interests in newspaperdom is not conducive to the exercise of fair play or the enlightenment of the public.

The Question of Sentiment

While in a community so miscellaneous in its tastes and its prejudices as this one it is impossible to ascertain its predominant sentiment, my impression is that outside of the labor unions sentiment is strongly opposed to government by proxy especially when the proxies are held by degraded wretches for whom there could not be found a more fitting sphere of action than a pig-sty. But since Rudolph Spreckels tells us that is the best he can give us perhaps we should not be too fastidious. It would be most gratifying if he were to consider it consonant with his dignity to co-operate with the Governor and the Committee of Seven, but I am not inclined to find fault with his preferences or his prejudices respecting the matter of government. I feel that we should pay homage to him for taking hold of things when most of our leading citizens were either skulking in the background or occupying the foreground with Schmitz and Ruef. It would be unfair to question his motives in the matter of procedure so far as the municipal government is concerned, before anything has happened to justify suspicion.

Phelan in the Background

While Mr. Spreckels may be above suspicion that is not the status of his bosom friend, the Hon. James D. Phelan who is reputed to be his adviser. Despite Mr. Phelan's reputation as a civic patriot, in club circles where he is best known he does not inspire an unwavering confidence in his sincerity. And now that some of our leading citizens are finding themselves pursued with merciless resolution they are recalling all the happenings to which might be attributed the sharpening of Mr. Phelan's appetite for revenge. Mr. Phelan is unquestionably a man of ideas, and he would not grudge his friend Mr. Spreckels the use of them. He is young in years but sage in counsel. His talent for administration is surpassed by nothing but his talent for manipulation. In shrewdness he is a host in himself. He keeps in the background because there must be no taint of anti-unionism on this prosecution and there has been a black mark against Mr. Phelan ever since the teamsters' strike when he ordered the police onto the trucks, the only time he ever risked the disfavor of the mob and the only time he acted inadvertently.

Fighting Back

It was by grace of Mr. Phelan that Mr. Spreckels was made President of the First National Bank, and by the way that institution seems to be suffering somewhat from reprisal these days. The financial interests suspecting that the strings of a thousand political intrigues are being fingered with Mr. Phelan in the conductor's chair, are hitting back and the stock of the First National has taken a big drop. It will be interesting to watch the outcome. There are animosities being stirred up in this town today that cannot be assuaged in one generation. At this moment Spreckels and Phelan have the upperhand but I seriously doubt their ability to carry the fight through to a successful issue. Some impracticable persons who sympathized with them in the beginning have amended their sentiments since it was learned that Ruef was to become the chief witness for the prosecution. That is little more than they can stand. That this crafty rogue who has been wallowing in a cesspool of rottenness for years, whose mendacity bears the stamp of original genius, should be accepted as a civic patriot, converted to respect for truth merely because he cowered before the whip of justice and pleaded for mercy and the privilege of keeping his filthy ducats, is an idea that inspires revulsion.

The Bulletin's Change of Attitude

As soon as Ruef startled the town by pleading guilty the Bulletin's attitude toward him changed. That paper showed no disposition to gloat. Considering how long and how bitterly the Bulletin fought to reduce him to his present position this argues more than ordinary self-restraint. As soon as the boss had capitulated young Roth ceased his series of stinging cartoons and turned his attention more particularly to Schmitz and Calhoun. Since then all the pictures of Ruef in the Bulletin have been the work of the snap-shot artist. Ruef has noticed this considerate attitude on the part of the paper to which more than to any other influence is due the credit for his downfall. He commented on it a few days ago and was told that Mr. Fremont Older could not help pitying his condition. This was something Ruef never counted on and it kept him dumb for a few minutes. "Well," he said finally, "if Older is sorry for me, how must other people feel? I must still have a lot of friends left." I do not know whether Mr. Older, who inspired the prosecution of Ruef, really does feel sorry for that whining individual. I doubt it because there is no reason for compassion. It would be more logical to felicitate than to compassionate Ruef now that he sees the end of his troubles and no end of his coin, and Editor Older is above all things logical. Moreover the Bulletin's change of attitude toward Ruef may be explained on a coldly logical hypothesis. It would not be extravagant to infer that when the once bold and brazen boss relaxed his defiant front, shed his mask, and cringed at the feet of the men whose attacks he had met with villification and foul slander, Editor Older found himself enervated by nausea and incapacitated for comment. It should also be suggested that the Bulletin is in sympathy with the policy of Heney and Burns, and now that those gentlemen are to use Abe in the pee-pul's cause it is not advisable to keep on depicting him in his true colors. As a witness for the prosecution he should have some standing and he is getting it. The newspapers have succeeded in melting the town with compassion for Abe. And yet there are scornful critics who tell us that the newspapers do not affect public opinion!

A Bit of Unconscious Humor

From the Examiner we learn that the story of the career of Abe Ruef is "a tale of lost opportunities more striking than any that has been told in many years." This is not an excerpt from one of Wex Jones's funny effusions. It is the solemn utterance of a grave and reverend writer of sedate and luminous editorials. Its sober setting and the congruity of the sentiment in its relation to those by which it was accompanied argue its sincerity and the improbability of its having been intended as a gem of facetiousness. It is therefore a fine sample of unconscious humor. If ever an opportunity for improving a shining hour or a fuliginous hour or any fraction of any kind of hour ever escaped Abe Ruef from the day that he first extended his prehensile hand for a fee in San Francisco up to the moment when he gladly availed himself of Heney's immunity bath there is absolutely no record of it. As a matter of fact Ruef was endowed with a special quality of genius for seizing opportunity. In no tide in his affairs did he ever fail to take the current when it served. It has been his habit to anticipate the critical minute. He never forgot that old proverb from the Latin: "Opportunity has hair in front, behind she is bald; if you seize her by the forelock, you may hold her, but, if suffered to escape, not Jupiter himself can catch her again." Abe took no chances; he sat in her lap. Pleasure never lured him from that seat of vantage. Hence it is that Abe had few vices, and that he and his clerical friends were able to affirm his wonderful chastity. Attending to one vice kept him busy. He could not be seduced except by Opportunity, which Shakespeare, by the way, pronounced "The midwife and the bawd to all our vices."

The Opportunity That Never Came

Ruef's unswerving devotion to opportunity was evidenced by his impetuous leap after it when the Home Telephone Company invited him to quit the pay-roll of the Pacific States Telephone Company. In his passion for opportunity he wouldn't stay bought. And yet he is so unreasonable that he expected the bribe-givers to hire counsel for him. He has been berating them for deserting him. What he probably expected them to do was to purchase his silence and thus give him the great and glorious opportunity of his life, that of achieving a really artistic triumph of rascality. Would Abe, think you, object to accepting the immunity bribe after pocketing the price of his silence? That would be a species of villainy meriting comparison with Lord Bacon's prosecution of his benefactor, the Earl of Essex, but perhaps now that Abe with gold-lined pockets has a rush of virtue to the head we should not ascribe to him such capacity for foulness. The erstwhile unspeakable boss is now enjoying his apotheosis. He is accepted as a reformer in embryo intent upon scattering a glorious message of truth and wisdom, to inform and instruct, enhearten and redeem his native city. It is an inspiring spectacle, this of the tenderloin pirate sanctified by confession, preparing to charge the foul citadel of graft. Ruef's claims to recognition as a self-sacrificing hero are not universally recognized. There are some sceptics with opportunities for inside information who relate that the story of his physical collapse and of the grief that gnawed at his heart was purely a fabrication. They assert that life to the outskirts still presents to him an appearance of pleasing serenity, and these cynics are of the opinion that by the time all the letters felicitating him on entering the ranks of civic purity are in, he will be more strongly convinced than ever that the dear pee-pul love to be humbugged.

Scared By the Doctors

There were many influences that combined to persuade Ruef to confess. But concern for his own health operated on him more potently than all else. The physicians who examined him the day before he pleaded guilty gave him an awful scare. The wide reaches of the boss's culture have never extended to the art of Hippocrates and Galen and when he was told that he had organic lesions his face went white and his blood went cold. Then the physicians kindly explained that the organic lesions consisted of an enlarged heart, an enlarged spleen and an enlarged liver and Ruef was ready to capitulate. When he was told that the heart examination had disclosed a "murmur," he felt that one foot was already in the tomb; and when informed that his lungs were not just as they ought to be, that a collapse of the cells had been noted, he was prepared to tell Burns everything. Now that it is all over those physicians are quietly chuckling to themselves. The fact is that there is nothing in Ruef's condition to prevent him from living for years. The organic lesions which scared him so, as any doctor knows, will have the effect of making him old before his time but they need not deprive him of the hope of longevity. As for the collapse of the lung cells, it is in no way connected with tuberculosis and, as a matter of verity, it was only suspected and not by all the diagnosticians either.

Schmitz's Polite Swearing

Let it be told among the Y. M. C. A., the W. C. T. U., the Y. M. I., the Christian Endeavor and the Band of Hope that Eugene E. Schmitz never uses the name of the Lord in vain. No low, vulgar oaths escape the Mayor's lips even under the greatest provocation. In fact, such repression is unrecorded in history, since certain prowling iconoclasts have shown that the immortal Washington did make the air blue on occasion. For the day following Ruef's confession, Gene was not to be seen. However he emerged soon and proclaimed his innocence with housetop vociferation to acquaintances. "Gosh dang it," exclaimed the Mayor testily, "who would have thought that man Ruef could tell a thing like this. My Golly! Why, I never took a dollar for my influence in my life. Goodness Gracious, how could a man be guilty of telling such falsehoods. But I will yet rout my traducers, confound them, and I will show them up to the public good and plenty. Gosh hang the whole crew!"

Remember, dear little boys and girls, that men who become mayors of great cities have pure thoughts and undefiled tongues.

When Bribes Are Not Forthcoming

The old reporter sitting through many regimes of supervisors utters a low, sardonic laugh over the gush relative to poor, innocent men and rich corruptors and gold slipped into unsuspecting pockets. He minds him, for instance, of the time directly after the conflagration when the Union street road applied for a trolley franchise. There were no strings, it is remembered, to the city's gift to the United Railroads, but the Union street line became at once a matter of extreme public concern. Preliminary delays exhausted, Chairman Gallagher one afternoon, his neck turning a royal purple as he said it, demanded that the company file its completed plans that the board might pass technical judgment thereon. The next blocking came when Gallagher, radiating purple, stated that he must first seek the city attorney's opinion as to the terms. Even after the pressure of North Beach had forced the craven board to pass the permit, the company was forbidden to excavate more than two consecutive blocks of roadbed at a time, or to operate what road had been completed. All construction was stopped for a time in an unjust demand that the company should build up a street torn away by the quake. And so on. No one who has watched the incumbent City step-Fathers in session is disposed to dispute the statement that Ruef says he made to Schmitz last election, namely, that these men would eat the paint off a house.

To Give Langdon Battle

At this time District Attorney Langdon is confident that he will be re-elected to office on the strength of his having appointed Francis Heney to a deputyship, but when he hears who his opponent is likely to be the news will be productive of agitation. Let it suffice for him to know at this time that a gentleman standing very high in the profession has consented to give him battle, one who, if elected, will not find it necessary to call for a specialist to perform the duties of the office. This gentleman will pledge himself to prosecute the crooked supervisors, who at this time are under the impression that they have been guaranteed immunity. While the law is sometimes defined as whatever is boldly asserted and plausibly maintained, there are eminent practitioners in this State who deny that it can be plausibly maintained, though it has been boldly asserted, that a district attorney can guarantee immunity to a man who has not been indicted. The formality of indicting the supervisors has thus far been neglected, and therefore the immunity contract is not worth the paper it is written on. So the supervisors are not yet out of the woods and as there are many people in this city who are not in favor of their emer-

Pardee Finds Fault With Gillett

Almost forgotten in the irritating obscurity of private life ex-Governor Pardee is still as riotously funny as when he wore his collapsible opera hat in the Roosevelt sunlit parade. Gone from public notice the doctor keeps in touch with a minor parochial constituency through the columns of his paper, the Oakland Enquirer, from which we learn that in consequence of his remoteness from the centre of vital activities he does not share the popular impression that Governor Gillett is an executive of exceptional ability. He does not even know that Governor Gillett is receiving praise from the leading newspapers of the country. He is conscious of nothing but that Gillett has failed to abandon the legal profession and for that grievous offense against the dignity of the State, he is censuring the Governor in language that burns fitfully. It is true that Governor Gillett has not withdrawn from his profession but he is not engaged in active practice. However were he inclined to earn a fee it is not likely that he would be reproached by the people of the state. When Jim Budd was Governor of the state he was retained as one of the attorneys in the Fair estate. When Gage was Governor he appeared in court on more than one occasion. And by the way when Pardee was Governor, though he ceased practicing medicine, he did not abandon the practice of politics. Gillett appears to be demonstrating that it is quite possible for a man to be Governor without using his patronage power for the purpose of getting control of a convention.

The Galveston Plan

A very simple solution of the problem that confronts San Francisco may be found in the Galveston plan which is proving so popular in Texas and being adopted in Ohio and other states. This plan was adopted in Galveston after the destruction of a great part of that city some years ago and it gave general satisfaction. The plan is simply the government of a city through a commission appointed by the Governor. To put this plan in operation it is necessary to call an extra session of the legislature and formulate a Constitutional amendment for submission to the people at a special election. It is feasible to consummate this project within ninety days. And in the present temper of the state there need be little doubt that the amendment would carry. It is a matter that concerns the whole state, and the whole state is aware of the fact. It is not only the shameful condition of affairs existing here that concerns the whole state, but the industrial disturbances that affect business interests even in remote counties. And surely it would be impossible to conceive a situation more urgently demanding an emergency call for an extra session than that existing in this city where the exercise of police power is farcical; where for nearly three weeks it has been admittedly hazardous to operate a street car after dark; where the employes of some of our largest firms are denied by their employers the privilege of suiting their own convenience in their hours of leisure; where school teachers are being traduced in the public prints by union blackguards; where on all sides is being exercised a species of intimidation that since the French Revolution has been practiced nowhere beyond the borders of Russia; where in short human life would be absolutely without protection were it not for the reluctance of the forces of anarchy to give the Governor of the state a pretext for putting the city under martial law. If there was good reason for calling a special session of the legislature after the earthquake, there is surely good reason for calling one now.

Police Sympathy

"I have found that the police have methods of standing in with the unions aside from arresting offenders," said a tourist at one of the hotels on Saturday. "I arrived at the ferry this morning, and after looking around for a bus from the hotel asked a policeman if it would be down. He assured me that it would in a very short time. I waited for half an hour, then approached him again, and remarked that I might as well go out on a car. He threw up his hands in horror and told me it was as much as my life was worth to attempt it. 'Better wait for the bus,' he said; 'street car travel is too dangerous.' I waited, but as the bus did not come I at last took a car, on which I arrived here without any trouble. By comparing notes with others, I find it is the regular practice of the police to

How Subscribers are Lost

The Examiner got an amusing taste of unionism the other day. One of its solicitors was out in the Mission canvassing for subscriptions, and among those whom he secured was a house painter. When the transaction had been closed the solicitor boarded a passing car for down town. Shortly afterward the telephone in the business office of the Examiner rang and a voice came over the wire with the announcement that the owner of it wanted his subscription to the paper stopped. "What's the matter—any trouble about the delivery?" asked the clerk. "It ain't been delivered at all, yet," was the reply; "I just subscribed for it a few minutes ago, and the feller who took my name got on a car to go down town. I'm a good union man, and I ain't going to take any paper that has people working for it that will ride on seab cars." By their solicitors shall ye know them! On account of the dereliction of an employe the Chronicle has been for many a year under the ban of an old farmer who lives away up in the country. He was approached by a Chronicle solicitor for a subscription recently. "No," said the farmer, "I used to take the Chronicle, and I liked it mighty well. But one day a feller come along gettin' subscribers, an' hired a horse off'n me to drive around the country. He promised to send me the two dollars for it, but never done it. I quit the Chronicle then an' there, an' ain't had it in my house since." "How long ago was this?" asked the solicitor, interested in this lapse of his fellow-worker. "I don't exactly remember," said the farmer. "but it was a matter of some fifteen year ago."

A Honeymoon Split

The Sunday papers throughout the United States have exploited "A Honeymoon at the Loneliest Place on Earth," describing the situation of Lieutenant Nevins of the United States Marine Corps, now in command of the detachment of marines at Midway, and his bride. But as it turns out the Sunday papers missed the best feature of the story. Lieutenant and Mrs. Nevins' honeymoon is proving lonelier than the Sunday newspapers described it. The reason is as my Honolulu correspondent informs me, the bride and groom have been separated by cruel fate. He is marooned with his command on Midway while she is two thousand miles away from him in Honolulu. She is unable to go to him because there is no way of her getting there. He is unable to join her because of his orders stationing him at Midway. His original orders were to go to Midway on the U. S. S. Annapolis from San Francisco. He asked permission for his wife to accompany him. This was refused as under naval regulations women are not allowed to travel on war vessels. Permission was obtained however for both to sail on the transport Sherman to Honolulu, he to proceed from there by the Annapolis. They hoped that Mrs. Nevins would find some means of transportation from Honolulu to Midway, but so far none has been found and the prospect is not very gratifying. Very few vessels go to Midway. The regular mail steamers do not touch there except in rare cases, such for instance as that of a man with a pull like Vice-President Ward of the Pacific Commercial Cable Company, who wanted to stop off there for a few hours. And the only time this happened the Mongolia went on the reef, and so it is not likely that another mail steamer will be allowed to stop there in the near future. The cable ship makes trips at rare intervals to Midway, but she is a British vessel and cannot carry passengers between American ports, and besides she is not licensed to carry passengers at all. The Pacific Commercial Cable Company sends a supply vessel from Honolulu to Midway at long intervals. These are usually either schooners or small steam vessels of the Inter Island Steam Navigation Company. If Mrs. Nevins ever gets to Midway, it will probably be on one of these. And if she does, when her husband is ordered away from Midway, the same difficulty will present itself. She will have as much trouble in all probability to get away as she has been having to get there.

Ancient History

Haig Patigian, the San Francisco sculptor, has had his statue "Ancient History" accepted for exhibition in the Paris salon. The picture herein is a reproduction of a small photo of the statue sent to me from Paris by the elated artist. A smaller figure realizing this same conception was modeled by Patigian just before leaving this city, but the one in the salon is on a much larger scale and is a great improvement on the original. The figure is slightly under life size but with the pedestal it measures seven and a half feet. If one may judge from the picture it is an example of spiritual beauty exhibiting delicate lines that teach how grace can chasten nudity. Patigian writes that he has been hard at work and has had his work criticised by Alix Marguet, a noted French sculptor whose technique and anatomical knowledge are excellent. He feels that he has been very much benefited by this artist's suggestions. He expects to return home in September.

Goldberg is Making Good

One of the extensive colony of California newspapermen who are making names for themselves in New York writes me that "Rube" Goldberg has never regretted the day when he resolved to quit making sporting cartoons for the Bulletin and to try his luck in the metropolis. He has a splendid berth on the Mail and Express which also employs Homer Davenport and his half-page cartoons are attracting a great deal of attention. Hitherto Bob Edgren and "Tad" had this field almost to themselves in New York and the advent of a third Californian has created quite a stir. Goldberg and "Tad" are both undoubted humorists and their work is being compared by those New Yorkers who set up as critics in such matters. The knowledge of this fact has excited a great deal of friendly rivalry between the two young artists and as a consequence their respective employers are getting the very best work of which they are capable. Arthur Brisbane of the Journal sent for Goldberg recently and promised him a fine salary if he would join the Hearst forces but Goldberg is doing exceedingly well where he is and would not consider the offer.

When the Thumb-Screws Failed

In these parlous times there are various ways of treating with the members of the labor unions as Calhoun, Schwab, Scott, the Laws, Horace Platt and numbers of contractors will lucidly and vehemently testify. Here is a little anecdote I heard the other day regarding the Lindgren-Hicks Co., contractors, and the way in which they avoided a combination strike, walkout, boycott and everlasting condemnation of Czar McCarthy and his exasperated cohorts. One day a union man quit the employ of the company and went around to the office to demand his pay. Like all concerns employing labor on a big scale the Lindgren-Hicks Company has a system of checks on pay which must be lived up to in order to insure accuracy in the accounts. The disgruntled union employe was told to put in his time check and it would be passed through the several departments. This did not suit his unionship and he demanded spot cash. He was told he couldn't get it till the boss he had worked under put in the proper voucher. He went away grumbling, saying that he'd come the next day. He did, but his vouchers, being out of the regular pay line, had not yet reached the cashier. Forthwith he unburdened his mind and declared the company must pay him for the time since he quit to the moment he was paid. The cashier declined to make any such payment. The man left, vowing he'd see McCarthy, who would bring the company to its knees and force it to pay such honest debts.

McCarthy Argues Union Law

True enough McCarthy appeared and laid down the union law to fit the situation. By this time the man had figured out that his bill was $21; $1.50 for his original claim and $19.50 due him for time lost in trying to collect it. McCarthy argued the proposition as only McCarthy can, but the more he talked the less the company inclined to pay the extortionate demand. Finally McCarthy threatened to call out every man, jack and steam winch that was working for the Lindgren-Hicks Co. The company calmly faced the hectoring McCarthy and told him he could call out every union in the state were he so disposed, that he could follow them to Halifax because the firm was not in a place where it could be caught by his thumb screwing practices, as it had no contract with labor unions but instead collected 10 per cent on all its contracts with the owners of the property worked on. McCarthy swallowed his choler as best he could, the lambkin accepted the $1.50, minus the $19.50 charged for lost time and angrily departed from the office.

The Ten Per Cent Sanctuary

This "ten per cent" clause is a refuge to which contractors have been driven for protection since the repeated demands of the union have grown so persistent and so extortionate. Now instead of directly employing the various members of the labor unions needed on a big structure they name the kind and number of men required, make out lists of all the materials required and have the architect or owner's agent do all the employing and buying on the job. In other words they order the hiring of the men and the materials required and the owners pay the bills and assume all the responsibility on shifts in prices of materials and demands of labor. On all the bills and payrolls the contractors collect a straight ten per cent, which they account a fair price for directing the affair. Under this system when a union strikes the blow falls on the owner of the property and the contractor, not being under bonds for time, calmly sits back till the shindig is over. Lindgren-Hicks were in this position. That's why they laughed at McCarthy's threat to call out the unions because $19.50 overtime was not paid while trying to collect a "time" bill for $1.50.

When Principle is Abandoned

A curious but altogether human flop in attitude from that of employe to employer is obvious in the buses run by the Carmen's Union. The carmen are fighting for the sacred principle of eight hours and three dollars. With self sacrificing devotion to their cause they are determined to remain jobless until their union sympathizers go broke. Yet the carmen's bus system is a gray horse of another color. There is no eight hour day nor limit to the load that these poor, Petaluma-doomed brutes must haul. It is dawn to dark and a meal of straw, otherwise ten-cent fares would not "pay." And suppose the horse owners organized in protection of their beasts and demanded the same hours and load limitations as enjoyed by the debris and building material teams—what a unionized howl for squeezing would result! These buses, however,

"Scotty's" Bluff Called

The bluff of Walter Scott, the "Scotty" of high splurging fame, the self-intoxicated miner who is ambitious to pose as the greatest spender in the world, was called, and called hard, according to a group of Rhyolite operators who were discussing that spectacular individual in the cafe of the Fairmont the other day. "Scotty" behind four jumping mules and a cloud of dust had just whirled into Rhyolite from the desert whence he had come from a visit to his famous "hidden mine." It was the return from that conspicuous trip on which Scotty had promised to show his wife the wonders and riches of his much-discussed treasure crypt. Mrs. Scotty descended from the wagon in an irritable frame of mind because at the last moment her husband had weakened on betraying his secret and had left her out on the desert while he drove off alone to fill his pockets and several canvas bags from the rich specimens littering his treasure house. As usual he was bubbling over with animal spirits and self assurance and invited all Rhyolite to take the first drink with him.

Flashes Fistsful of Gold

That evening he drifted over to the leading saloon where he butted into a group of operators among whom was Louis Schloss, just in from Goldfield, to look over some of his holdings. Schloss was in the act of peeling a $10 bank note signed by Malcom MacDonald off a small wad of bills. "What are those things good for?" demanded "Scotty," affecting curiosity. "Money," responded Schloss, simply. "They'll buy most anything." "Well, they're poor specimens of what money ought to be," returned "Scotty" glibly. "Now here's the real thing," and as usual his hands dived into his capacious pockets and brought out two fistsful of ore fairly bristling with sparkling gold. "That's the kind of stuff you can't mistake. There's no chance of fake about that," and he scattered them ostentatiously over the bar with his usual air of triumphant bravado. Then he added significantly, "and there's plenty more where that came from," implying as usual that he had the wealth of Golconda safely stowed away within his fingers' reach.

A Fortune on a Dice Throw

"Yes, its the real thing sure enough," responded Schloss in his cool fashion, "but I'm not so sure about the fake. I'll tell you what I'll do, 'Scotty,' he went on, calmly diving one hand into an inside pocket and producing a roll of bills that would have paid his way around the world several times over. He peeled off a $1000 bill and tossed it on the bar. "I'll tell you what I'll do, 'Scotty.' I'll put that thousand against your specimens and shake you for the lot—one rattle out of the box." The crowd craned closer and "Scotty's" face began to set fixedly. "Just to keep up the fun, I'll go further," continued Schloss, coolly peeling off another $1000 bill and tossing it next its fellow on the bar. "Dig up some more specimens and I'll put that against them and we'll shake for the bunch—one rattle out of the box. And just to make it a trifle more interesting and to keep up the fun go dig up the fancy gold samples you say you've got in the canvas bags you've just brought to town and I'll put this wad against them and shake you for the lot—one rattle out of the box."

The Climax of a Big Bluff

"Scotty's" face was a study for caricaturist Oppen. A broad grin began to break over the intent faces of the increasing crowd, for the electric whisper had shot through the town that "Scotty" was being called for a show down. "I'll go further than that, 'Scotty'; just to keep up the fun," went on Schloss, imperturbably, "Set a price on this 'hidden mine' of yours and I'll send an expert to examine it and if he says your figures are anywhere within reason I'll dig up the price of the mine and shake you for the whole blamed outfit—one rattle out of the box." "Scotty" gulped something and slowly began to gather up the specimens scattered over the bar. "You're bluffing," he said, weakly, but his cocksure air was gone. The crowd laughed.

"Scotty" as a Spender

"'Scotty's' a bluff," said Schloss to a small group of his friends afterwards. "I always thought so after I had a chance to examine some of the ore specimens he flashes so freely on the public. Any man who knows Nevada ore and the way it is worked can tell at a glance how 'Scotty' manufactures his gold bristling specimens. It's a trick, but a trick any man can do after he is taught it. As for his owning a desert mine of fabulous values, it's all rot. He may have a mine somewhere but I don't believe it is anything out of the ordinary. His money splurges are all bluffs. Outside of his special 'coyote train,' which, if report is true, he was hired to undertake for an ad. did you ever hear of him rolling more money than a thousand or more men do in Nevada every month? Did he ever go up against a great gambling game or any other proposition where money passed freely in bunches of thousands or tens of thousands? His plays of enormous wealth are all flashes in the pan. He's a bluff."

Plucky Mrs. Whiting

A friend who rode on the street cars while it was still a most hazardous undertaking told me of an incident which escaped the alert eye of the reporters. According to my informant the first woman to ride on the Sutter street car was Mrs. Whiting, the wife of Admiral Whiting who has made his home in Berkeley since retiring from the Navy. Mrs. Whiting was one of the interesting Afong sisters of Honolulu and evidently has plenty of pluck in her makeup. There were only two other passengers, and they were men who chanced a ride on the experimental run down Sutter street. Mrs. Whiting and a lady companion jumped on the car while it was slowly feeling its way over the uncertain track. My friend, who recognized her as Mrs. Whiting, asked her whether she realized the danger. "We've got to get to the ferry," said the Admiral's wife nonchalantly, "and I don't know any quicker way of getting there," and they settled into a corner as unconcerned as though they were being safely carried on a queen's litter flanked by armored knights. I hear that Mrs. Whiting occupies a very pleasant niche in the rather slow going society of Berkeley. She has plenty of verve and dash and entertains with the same ingenuous hospitality that made the Afong home in Honolulu a magnet for the visiting naval officers and other dignitaries. The Whitings have a pretty home in North Berkeley on what is called "Admiral" Hill, a cognomen which clings owing to the fact that several retired admirals have pitched their shingled tents on that commanding spot. Mrs. Whiting still retains the extreme slenderness which distinguishes her from her plumper sisters and while she has not the regular features that some of the Afong sisters possess, to my mind she is the most attractive member of that interesting family whose history is woven in the social woof and warp of Honolulu. She was graduated from one of the big Eastern colleges, Vassar, I believe.

Heard at a Curtis Auction

An amusing contretemps occurred at a recent Curtis auction. Mrs. Bull, the wife of the naval commandant at Yerba Buena, was bidding on some fine old English china. Mrs. Bull has perhaps the most beautiful porcelain and china in California, much of it having been collected in China. An old Staffordshire tea set at Curtis's interested her, she bid for it spiritedly and it was finally knocked down to her. Bidding against her was a lady whom Mrs. Bull did not know. She was evidently irritated at Mrs. Bull's success and, turning to a lady who accompanied her, said audibly, in French, "I don't believe the woman knows its value." To this Mrs. Bull replied, "Merci beau coup pour le compliment, Madame," to the utter confusion of the other bidder, who was Mrs. Washington Dodge. Mrs. Dodge, it should be said, is very near sighted and does not see well even with her lorgnettes.

Mrs. Breckenridge in Paris

I hear that Addie Murphy Breckenridge is cutting a wide swath in Paris society this season and is something of a rival to Mrs. McKee who appears to have everything her own way in the French capital. It was not until recently that Mrs. Breckenridge could afford to compete with the rich hostesses of the American colony but since the earthquake which shook Papa Murphy out of his job at the First National Bank he has loosened his grip on the purse strings and his daughter is as swagger as any of 'em. She has the backing of Mrs. Sharon, which counts for something in the American colony.

Paid a Bridge Debt With a Bracelet

A badly bitten tongue has been wagging down Burlingame way and as a result there has been a tremendous shaking of Marcelled heads over an incident that might otherwise have been smothered under the hot house rose. The last few weeks Burlingame has been suffering from the blight of the commonplace, with not a spray of spicy gossip to add to the bouquet of life. And then, suddenly, a woman, whose unfettered speech has touched the button of many a story, gave out a piece of gossip that makes the tea tables vibrant with animated discussion. She was one of four bridge "fiends" who got into a little game at the home of a woman who lives at Burlingame the year around. They spent six hours at the card table and when accounts were balanced it was found that one of the players owed the hostess about a hundred dollars. The unfortunate player, whose purse is a great deal slimmer than her social position afterwards confessed to the gossip dame that she was nearly four hundred dollars in debt to the hostess and she didn't see her way clear to paying it. A day or two after this incident the lady who won the money was seen wearing a valuable bracelet that had almost invariably clasped the dimpled wrist of the unlucky young woman who was in card debt to her. Dame Gossip cocked her eye and put two and two together with alacrity. And now the refrain of all whispered conversation is something like this: "So she took the bracelet in payment," and "wouldn't you think she'd buy herself a bangle of three golden balls" or "she doesn't hesitate to wear the bracelet though she must know people will recognize it," and so on for the illumination of those who love to lend a pliant ear to this sort of thing.

In spite of pulpit thunderings at bridge and the frappe regard of one or two society leaders the game still clinches the interest of most of the smart set. But it must be admitted that high stakes and the inevitable scandals bred by unrestrained betting have not been common out here. When the game is played for money the limit is usually a cent a point and when it is raised until a woman may lose a hundred dollars at a sitting, conservative comment bristles with indignation. Which shows that after all our wings are not plucked down to pin feathers. For in Newport society leaders have frequently confessed to losing four and five times that amount without causing comment to stand on its hind legs.

Mrs. Tower's Guest

Last winter an old Californian friend of Mrs. Charlemagne Tower's girlhood was visiting the Towers. Mrs. Tower wished to give the lady a dinner but the guest protested that she was not rich and had no dinner gown suitable to meet great people in. Mrs. Tower waived these objections and invited some twenty notables to meet her girlhood friend. The friend had been away but returned on the day in question and in her room found an exquisite Empire gown of white satin and all the accessories of a beautiful toilette from gloves to slippers. When arrayed everything was found to fit perfectly and the guest of honor enjoyed the dinner as she never had anything in her life. It all sounds a good deal like the Adventures of Cinderella but in this case nothing happened at midnight and the gown remains a souvenir.

Sporting Events Projected

During the coming three or four months there will be sports of many kinds at that favorite resort of society, Del Monte. Beginning with the first Saturday in June, golf tournaments will be held every Saturday during June, July and August. They will be handicap competitions, the purpose being to encourage all who take an interest in the Scotch game to enter. Handsome prizes will be offered for men and women. Each weekly victory will be recorded on the trophies and, at the end of the series of competitions, the man who has his name engraved most frequently on the trophy for men will become its possessor; and the lady whose name appears oftenest on the ladies' trophy will carry it off. Should a tie result arrangements will be made for playing it off. The competition for women will be a handicap over eighteen holes, medal play, and will take place each Saturday morning. The men's event will be of a similar nature and will be held on Saturday afternoons. In addition to these events there will be competitions in driving, approach-putting and in putting on the pretty clock green opposite the clubhouse. To add to the general gayety, the clubhouse will be opened. An excellent view of the clock green is obtained from the porch of the clubhouse.

An Auto Run

Towards the end of June or early in July it is probable that the Automobile Club of California will hold a run to Del Monte and a gymkhana on the race track, which will be put into order for the automobilists. The executive committee of the Automobile Club of California some time ago proposed to hold a run to Del Monte during the present month, but the event was deferred on account of the street car strike in San Francisco and also because of the endurance run given on Monday, May 19, through San Mateo county, under the management of the Automobile Dealers' Association. In order to provide novelty in the gymkhana a prize will be presented by the Automobile Club of California to the member who devises the most original and amusing "stunt." From July 2nd to 7th, both inclusive, there will be a "golf week," during which there will be competitions for the Del Monte Cup for men, for the Del Monte Cup for women, mixed fours, ones and other events, for handsome trophies presented by the Pacific Improvement Company. There is also talk of holding a harness meet on the race track. Arrangements will be made for a lawn tennis tournament, to which several of the strongest players will be invited; also for bowling contests, swimming and other aquatic events. The bathing establishment has been much improved, a board walking having been built from it to the Custom House at Monterey and a grill provided. From September 4th to 9th the regular fall golf tournament will be held.

Helen Dean, I hear, is one of the most popular girls in New York. She does not go in for society with a big S but seems to prefer a Bohemian set. Miss Dean, so the rumor goes, has had more proposals than any girl her age.

Mme. Artsimovich's Gowns

Apropos the gowns of Madame Artsimovich who is making such a social success in Berlin where her husband is the Russian Minister, a recently returned traveler remarks that the Countess is no longer as chic as when she lived in San Francisco. At that time she was undoubtedly the best dressed woman in San Francisco. In Berlin she would like to dress as well as she did here, she explained to her San Francisco friend, but she does not dare. The German women are great frumps and they do not like a woman who dresses better than they do. They consider it immoral for a woman to look too well. Consequently, to preserve her husband's popularity, Madame Artsimovich dresses very plainly while in Berlin but when the couple go to the Riviera in winter or north in summer the Countess blossoms out and wears beautiful raiment with the same enchanting style which made her remarkable in San Francisco.

Vendome Guests

Among the guests of the Hotel Vendome in San Jose last week were T. J. Schuyler, Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Martin and Mrs. R. McMurray of this city, Dr. and Mrs. J. F. Wolle of Berkeley, Isabella Curl of Los Angeles, H. C. Taft of Oakland, A. B. Rosman of New York, and Mr. and Mrs. J. Coryell of Menlo Park.

Gadski Coming

Will L. Greenbaum announces that his opening attraction next season will be Mme. Gadski in three concerts. The artist is now admitted to be the best of the Wagnerian prima-donnas. Conreid was compelled to engage her at her own terms in order to save the last season at the Metropolitan Opera House. She will appear here about October 14.

Droll Nat Goodwin

Nat Goodwin has in "The Genius," the play in which he is convulsing audiences at the Novelty Theatre, a light and airy farce that does not in the slightest degree hamper his own genius. In other words it permits him to play himself and that is something that he has not always been able to do, for there are some playwrights who have miserably failed in their conception of America's premier comedian, and have actually defied him to make good. As a consequence Goodwin has not had all the laughs that were coming to him. He has staged plays that completely smothered his magnetism, plays that could not be redeemed even by the herculean efforts of this irresistible comedian. When we see how easy it is for Goodwin to crown his efforts with success in "The Genius," we marvel that anybody possessed sufficient talent to render him innocuous in a series of theatrical episodes. The achievement seems incredible. Mr. Goodwin is a wonderful adept in the art of reducing the character creations of miscellaneous playwrights to himself. Either that or he is a wonderful adept in the art of contriving to fit exactly into the character creations of playwrights. But whatsoever the fact of the matter he is at present diffusing a warm glow of satisfaction through the audiences at the Novelty. He is as deliciously humorous as his most appreciative admirers could wish, and I am convinced that the speeches that have been put into his mouth have from that circumstance alone taken on a drollness that surpasses the author's fondest hopes.

When the Weberfieldians were contributing to the gayety of O'Farrell street in the heyday and gladnights of Fischer's and the Maud Ambers and Georgie of a sprite of a girl who didn't receive money enough to justify the purchase of silk stockings. So she danced in cotton ones with a partner who could afford the more glossy fibrous substance yielded by the bombyx mori, and the contrast was so offensive that I chided the Johnnies of O'Farrell street for their parsimony until they came through with fitting adornment for as pretty a pair of calves as ever twinkled beneath a proscenium arch. I predicted for that sprite of a girl a glorious career on Broadway, and now it is my pleasure to report that while big Maud Amber with the calliope howl is playing one night stands somewhere in Asia and Georgie O'Ramey is doing her amateur parlor stunt along the minor vaudeville routes, little, chic and dainty Flossie Hope, erstwhile of the cotton hose, is about to experience that dearest of all thrills known to an actress, the one that comes from reading her name in electric lights. For Flossie Hope has arrived.

JAMES J. MORTON
The Clever Monologist Who Will Appear at The Orpheum
Next Week.

SUTCLIFFE TROUPE

Scottish Novelty Acrobats, Pipers and Dancers, at The Orpheum Next Week.

She has been announced as the star of "The Dairy-maids" which is to be produced at the Criterion Theatre, New York, in August. She recently returned from Europe whether she went to attend the marriage of Millionaire Oscar Lewisohn and the beautiful Edna May, the musical comedy singer.

Otis Skinner's Engagement

No local playgoer who keeps abreast of the times in the matter of theatricals will miss the opportunity of seeing Otis Skinner here next week at the Van Ness Theatre when this brilliant actor makes his appearance after an absence of a number of years. He is to play an engagement limited to six nights and there will be matinees on Wednesday and Saturday. Charles Frohman presents Otis Skinner this season in a Parisian success, "The Duel," which is pronounced by critics of France and America to be one of the strongest, truest and most human love stories that the modern stage presents. The central character in the play is an ideal type of a priest of today. The production is complete in every detail and the supporting company will be found one of the strongest on tour this season, including as it does such people as E. M. Holland, Walter Hitchcock, Alfred Hudson Jr., Keith Wakeman and Sarah Fadden.

The Frawley Season

T. Daniel Frawley has organized a special company in New York for a summer season at the Novelty Theatre and will inaugurate the season on Monday night, June 3, with an elaborate production of "Leah Kleschna." Marie Shotwell is the leading woman of the company. There will be a special scale of prices for the Frawley season.

A SCENE FROM OTIS SKINNER'S PRODUCTION OF "THE DUEL"

Goodwin in Repertoire

For the second and last week of his engagement at the Novelty Theatre, Nat C. Goodwin will present a fine repertoire including five of his greatest successes. The week should see a series of crowded houses as the various bills are all favorites and have great drawing power. On Monday and Tuesday nights Goodwin will offer "An American Citizen," a play of exceptional comedy worth and in which the star is at his best. On Wednesday and Thursday nights and at the matinee on Saturday "When We Were Twenty-one" will be produced on an elaborate scale. On Friday night he will appear in "The Gilded Fool." "The Genius" will be played for the last time on Saturday night and for the closing performance of his engagement on Sunday night Goodwin will appear in the clever comedy, "A Gilded Fool." Seats for the coming week at the Novelty Theatre are in big demand.

Orpheum Vaudeville

It is doubtful whether at any time during its career the Orpheum's programmes have attained such a high excellence as at the present. The bill announced for next week is fully up to the high standard that has been established. It is headed by James J. Morton who is appropriately styled "A Fellow of Infinite Jest." He is a great favorite with San Franciscans. He is one of the most successful of monologists. His stories are all his own and his manner of telling them is inimitable. The Four Fords, brothers and sisters, who were last here with the Orpheum Road Show, are a family of international fame. They introduce dancing in every branch and many of their terpsichorean efforts are new to modern audiences. The Sutcliffe Troupe of novelty acrobats, pipers and dancers will make their first appearance in this city and should particularly appeal to the Caledonian colony, for they are "native and to the manor born." They are seven in number and all clad in Tartan. Their performance includes in addition to pipe playing some dancing and acrobatic features and one of them, a mere youngster, performs a triple somersault from the shoulders of one performer to the shoulders of another. Werden and Gladdish will introduce in next week's programme ballads illustrated by semi-oil paintings. Their performance is enhanced by ingenious machinery which enables them to produce most realistic effects. Valerie Bergere and her company will present "A Bowery Camille," which is held in most pleasant memory as one of the happiest efforts of this clever actress, and it will be the last week of the Royal Musical Five, Carroll and Baker and Papinta and her beautiful dances.

A Graft Drama

The managers of the New Alcazar Theatre promise to create a great sensation with their production of "The Undertow." This play will be put on for a run at Belasco and Mayer's pretty showhouse on Monday evening. It is said to be the nearest approach to the "great American play" that has been written. It was at Los Angeles that Belasco and Mayer "tried it on the dog," as the expression goes, in reference to first productions, and there it aroused a world of enthusiasm. Since that time it has been entirely rewritten, the strong features of the play increased and the weak points eliminated. "The Undertow" tells a story of American politics and business life that is intensely interesting from beginning to end. It deals with the adventures of a newspaper reporter who, being in employ of a man who is a political boss, refuses to do the latter's bidding and resigns. He has radical views regarding municipal government and he becomes a reformer and organizes a party and elects the mayor of the municipality. This mayor is pledged to honest government but becomes a grafter and under the guidance of a boss sells a number of valuable franchises. The newspaper man organizes a revolt against the grafters and brings the mayor to justice. A powerful love story runs through the play with the newspaperman and the society editor as the leading figures.

Idora Park

"When Johnny Comes Marching Home" is renewing its popularity at Idora Park where the splendid stock company is giving an admirable production of the popular patriotic opera. Edith Mason and Tom Persse have received a warm welcome from their old and new friends. Cunningham sings "My Own United States" with all his old-time enthusiasm. The production is an admirable one in every particular. The next opera will be "The Wedding Day."

E. M. Holland has just joined the Otis Skinner company and during the San Francisco engagement of "The Duel" will be seen in a great character part. Holland has not appeared here since he played in "Raffles." He is exceptionally popular with theatre-goers.

During the past week over two hundred mail orders for seats have been received by Gottlob, Marx and Company for the coming engagement of Maude Adams in "Peter Pan." The outlook is for a record breaking run.

AUTOMOBILE NOTES

You don't hear of any one giving a Model "A" Oldsmobile to his mother-in-law, so they must be good.

Mr. E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company has received word from Mr. E. R. Thomas that the company in the East has just turned out the celebrated 70 H. P. Thomas "Flyer" racing runabout. Mr. Thomas states that the car has done seventy-three miles an hour and will make a sensation all over the country.

Mr. and Mrs. L. C. Larsen, and Mr. and Mrs. E. Steffens have just returned to this city after a three weeks' tour in Southern California. The trip was made in Mr. Larsen's new 1907 Thomas "Flyer." Mr. Larsen states that the coast road is in first class condition, with the one exception of a patch of sand about 1,500 feet in length near the Santa Maria river, and advises all who wish to make the trip to Los Angeles by automobile to go at this time, as the roads are free from dust and the touring is ideal.

With this pleasant weather, the automobile will be whizzing to all parts of the State. Last Sunday Mr. W. F. Hunt of San Jose made a run to San Juan. "This is my first run of the season with my new Model 'M' Winton," says Mr. Hunt, "and I had a most pleasant outing. The day was ideal and the roads in splendid condition for this time of the year. An interesting feature of my trip was the fact that I did not have a particle of the usual trouble credited to automobile drivers, and was obliged to crank my engine but once."

What constitutes a really high grade touring car? What should be its capabilities? Workmanship, material, design and finish, in the order named, are, perhaps, the true test. A demonstration may seem much or little, according to the views of the purchaser, but no car should be selected which has not extraordinary hill climbing ability, for, in this State, one can figure on having ten per cent of the running up grade and the average hill looks like a precipice to the Easterner. To combine the aesthetic with the strictly practical is a difficult matter, yet it is a fact that the model "A" Oldsmobile is a machine which suits all classes and, whether the car is used on the level road of the Santa Clara Valley, or over the hilly deserts of Nevada, the verdict is always the same: "A car built first for service, but of such design that it suits the most fastidious."

Among the arrivals during the past week at Byron Hot Springs were the following from Menlo Park: Mr. and Mrs. F. W. McNear, E. W. Hopkins and Sam Hopkins; from San Francisco, Mr. and Mrs. Jonathan Sweigert, Jas. A. Snook, George Sweigert, Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Hilmer, Dr. L. D. Bacigalupi and Dr. Wm. Fletcher McNutt Jr.; W. W. Shannon of Sacramento, Dr. C. C. Shinnick of Oakland, Dr. J. W. Stitt and Dr. C. A. Meeks of Berkeley, Dr. James P. Tormey of Haywards, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Welsh of South Bend, Wash.

and two friends had drank more absinthe than was good for them, and by the time they had reached the dessert, having consumed much wine, all three were more or less intoxicated. A sudden idea passed through the head of Lelarge. "I'll bet you," he said, "that I will fire my revolver at the first person I see passing." "You won't dare," replied his friends. "All right, we'll see," cried the young man. As he spoke he raised his arm and fired through the window with a revolver of heavy calibre. Unfortunately for him, a young painter, M. Beranger, who was going to his work, received a bullet behind the ear. A. M. Gille, living in the Faubourg Saint-Honore, came to the assistance of M. Beranger, but he in his turn received a bullet above the eye. The witnesses of the scene, now thoroughly sobered disarmed M. Lelarge, and handed him over to the police. The two victims were sent to the Saint-Antoine Hospital.

From La Patrie:—Without the slightest provocation a young ruffian of nineteen, named Laroche, who had been indulging in absinthe, plunged a dagger into the neck of a peaceful old gentleman, M. Denis Sonazo, who was sitting on a bench in the Champs-Elysees on Wednesday evening watching the people come out of the music halls. M. Sonazo was taken to the Beaujon Hospital.

From La Presse:—Just as the matinee performance of the Maison du Rire—one of the numerous side-shows in the Rue de Paris—was about to begin yesterday, a man in the audience named Felix Forget, residing at 19 Rue d'Antin, got up and drawing a revolver aimed at one of his neighbors who promptly decamped. Three shots were fired after him and one of them slightly wounded one of the attendants in the upper hip. The author of the little occurrence was arrested, but his victim, who was an American, has never been heard of again. Forget declared that he had been indulging in a glass of two of absinthe and thought he would have some fun. He didn't like Englishmen, he said, and thought he would try his new pistol on the first one he saw; and when informed that he had been shooting at an American he seemed to enjoy his fun better yet.

From La Parisienne:—A Parisienne, who bites like a ferocious dog, created a sensation yesterday. She is a pretty and attractive-looking girl, and was sipping a grenadine au kirsch outside a cafe on the Boulevard Rochechouart. At the table next to her sat a sewer-man, Gustave Vernaut, who had washed and changed after his day's work, and was tuning his young mind to gallant thoughts over a glass of absinthe. Exactly what happened nobody knows, but all in a moment Mademoiselle Josephine had flown at Monsieur Gustave like a tigress, and, without even waiting for an introduction, threw his absinthe, glass and all, into his eyes, clutched him by the ears, and actually and literally bit off his nose and both his lips, and proceeded to tear at one of his cheeks. By the time this she-devil could be torn away from her victim the poor fellow was in an absolutely unrecognizable condition, and had to be carried off on a stretcher to the Bichat Hospital. Josephine was carried off by five policemen.

From l'Echo de Paris:—M. Victor Leger, living at 7 Rue Asseline, was seized with hydrophobia yesterday while seated at his absinthe at a cafe in Rue Asselin, and howled, foamed at the mouth, and ultimately sprang up and rushed at the persons seated near, calling on them to escape or they would be bitten. A girl of fourteen, named Emilienne Fiolet, was not quick enough to escape him and was bitten in the arm. The unfortunate man was seized and bound by the police, taken to the nearest station, while his victim was conveyed to the Pasteur Institute to undergo a course of treatment for rabies.

When to all this wine, beer, cider, spirit and absinthe is added more coffee per head than is consumed by any other people—and the vilest and bitterest coffee ever doctored—and a greater use of the villainous cigarette, which is largely indulged in by women as well as by men—and a profligacy that may be seen at the theatre, the clubhouse, the church, at the cafe, on the curb, and in nearly all other places, I prophesy that in fifty years there will be no French nation as such; that the Government will meanwhile be overpowered many times, that the churches and picture galleries of Paris will be turned into barracks and hospitals, and that the whole people will become a sickening, pitiful mass of invalids, imbeciles, and knaves—unless there is an abatement of immoderate absinthe drinking and some of the other indulgences I have named. The army has been commenced with. Let all others beware!

went out. I remained with a very unpleasant feeling in my mind. I listened. Her door was flung violently to—plainly the poor wench was very angry. . . . I thought it over, and resolved to go to her, and, inviting her to come in here, write everything she wanted.

I entered her apartment. I looked round. She was sitting at the table, leaning on her elbows, with her head in her hands.

"Listen to me," I said.

Now, whenever I come to this point in my story, I always feel horribly awkward and idiotic. Well, well!

"Listen to me," I said.

She leaped from her seat, came towards me with flashing eyes, and laying her hands on my shoulders, began to whisper, or rather to hum in her peculiar bass voice:

"Look you, now! It's like this. There's no Boles at all, and there's no Teresa either. But what's that to you? Is it a hard thing for you to draw your pen over paper? Eh? Ah, and you, too! Still such a little fair-haired boy! There's nobody at all, neither Boles, nor Teresa, only me. There you have it, and much good may it do you!"

"Pardon me!" said I, altogether flabbergasted by such a reception, "what is it all about? There's no Boles, you say?"

"No. So it is."

"And no Teresa either?"

"And no Teresa. I'm Teresa."

I didn't understand it at all. I fixed my eyes upon her, and tried to make out which of us was taking leave of his or her senses. But she went again to the table, searched about for something, came back to me, and said in an offended tone:

"If it was so hard for you to write to Boles, look, there's your letter, take it! Others will write for me."

I looked. In her hand was my letter to Boles. Phew!

"Listen, Teresa! What is the meaning of all this?"

Why must you get others to write for you when I have already written it, and you haven't sent it."

"Sent it where?"

"Why, to this—Boles."

"There's no such person."

I absolutely did not understand it. There was nothing for me but to spit and go. Then she explained.

"What is it?" she said, still offended. "There's no such person, I tell you," and she extended her arms as if she herself did not understand why there should be no such person. "But I wanted him to be . . . Am I then not a human creature like the rest of them? Yes, yes, I know, I know, of course. . . Yet no harm was done to anyone by my writing to him that I can see. . ."

"Pardon me—to whom?"

"To Boles, of course."

"But he doesn't exist."

"Alas! alas! But what if he doesn't? He doesn't exist, but he might! I write to him, and it looks as if he did exist. And Teresa—that's me, and he replies to me, and then I write to him again. . ."

I understood at last. And I felt so sick, so miserable, so ashamed, somehow. Alongside of me, not three yards away, lived a human creature who had nobody in the world to treat her kindly, affectionately, and this human being had invented a friend for herself!

"Look, now! you wrote me a letter to Boles, and I gave it to someone else to read it to me; and when they read it to me I listened and fancied that Boles was there. And I asked you to write me a letter from Boles to Teresa—that is to me. When they write such a letter for me, and read it to me, I feel quite sure that Boles is there. And life grows easier for me in consequence."

"Deuce take thee for a blockhead!" said I to myself when I heard this.

And from thenceforth, regularly, twice a week, I wrote a letter to Boles, and an answer from Boles to Teresa. I wrote those answers well. . . She, of course, listened to them, and wept like anything, roared, I should say, with her bass voice. And in return for my thus moving her to tears by real letters from the imaginary Boles, she began to mend the holes I had in my socks, shirts, and other articles of clothing. Subsequently, about three months after this history began, they put her in prison for something or other. No doubt by this time she is dead.

My acquaintance shook the ash from his cigarette, looked pensively up at the sky, and thus concluded:

Well, well, the more a human creature has tasted of better things the more it hungers after the sweet things of life. And we, wrapped round in the rags of our virtues, and regarding others through the mist of our self-sufficiency, and persuaded of our universal impeccability, do not understand this.

And the whole thing turns out pretty stupidly—and very cruelly. The fallen classes, we say. And who are the fallen classes, I should like to know? They are, first of all, people with the same bones, flesh, and blood and nerves as ourselves. We have been told this day after day for ages. And we actually listen—and the Devil only knows how hideous the whole thing is. Or are we completely depraved by the loud sermonizing of humanism? In reality, we also are fallen folks, and so far as I can see, very deeply fallen into the abyss of self-sufficiency and the conviction of our own superiority. But enough of this. It is all as old as the hills—so old that it is a shame to speak of it. Very old indeed—yes, that's where it is!

"The Lovers' Club"

Fifteen years ago there was in New York a coterie of young men who dreamed dreams of a new literature, something above and beyond the commonplace, out of the rut, but their dreams were destined to remain dreams, for the established publishing houses would have none of them. There did not seem to be readers enough, outside of the ranks to make their work a paying proposition, and "The Greeks," as they called themselves, were not rich enough to indulge in literary pursuits for fun. Two of the four, Richard Hovey, poet and dramatist, and Philetus Brown, are dead. The other two turned their attention, temporarily, at least, in other directions. They have prospered and "The Old Greek Press" of Chicago, Boston and New York established by these two survivors, is in some sort a memorial of the dead, the first issue being Philetus Brown's "The Lovers' Club." Though the avowed creed of "The Greeks" was to "Paint the passions of the human heart; paint them boldly, paint them truly, paint them with beauty," seekers after what is so often described as "strong" will be sadly disappointed if they imagine this will prove one of those volumes to be hastily thrust out of sight when a footstep is heard, or disembowelled and made to masquerade under the cover of some similar-sized book of poetry. While it cuts straight and deep, the cuts are clean, and there is no festering sore left where the knife has been withdrawn. The scheme is this: A number of men and women, all of an age to intelligence, and experience to enable them to give the subject serious thought, have been brought together by the half-humorous suggestion of one of their number that the fine art of love-making is deserving of study and a "school for lovers" a desirable thing. The members meet informally on Wednesday afternoons at the home of one of their number, and discuss various phases of the subject, illustrated by stories often drawn from their own lives and always from some known experience. There are touches of humor, sentiment and philosophy, and the problems enunciated are not to be solved off hand by a simple yes or no. Should a woman, bound only by the legal tie to an indifferent husband remain with him and die of heart starvation or should she leave him to form a new, if unsanctioned union, and live? Is the man who "sows wild oats" and leaves his successive companions to harvest the crops unaided any worse than the female flirt who drives men to destruction? Should society condone one more than the other? Is it less criminal to wrongfully bring a human life into the world than it is to send a soul forth in death? Is not the unfortunate child of an illicit union the real sufferer? Is love more than duty? Such are some of the questions discussed if not solved. Sherwin Cody, who stands sponsor for The Old Greek Press, is not seeking for infant prodigies to exploit, but is ready to help any really meritorious new comer to a public hearing. He has made a good beginning in "The Lovers' Club."

"Poison Island"

A treasure hunt with A. T. Quiller Couch as pilot could not fail to prove a delightful adventure, whether the treasure were unearthed or not, therefore those voyagers who set sail for "Poison Island" will not regret their passage. The crew and the captain bold, the mate, and all the rest of the seekers, are quite out of the ordinary. Imagine a company composed first of all, of a fourteen-year-old schoolboy who is sadly in need of discipline, an English woman, landed proprietor, eccentric to the last degree, and inclined to masculinity; an elderly lady with literary proclivities, who breaks out into poetry on every occasion, an English country magistrate, a young carpenter and a retired sea captain, recently an usher in a school. Except that Captain Branscome is the navigator in charge there is virtually no head to the enterprise, and only a cheerful confidence in providence to guide them. The voyage itself proved all that could be desired, and the treasure hunt was successfully prosecuted, though these staid and god-fearing folk made the acquaintance of one of the greatest scoundrels who ever escaped hanging before they had completed their search. This amiable gentleman, whose last alias was Dr. Beauregard, had made himself the proprietor of the island and virtually possessed himself of the treasure. Two caches had been unearthed—the third still escaped him, but he had abundance for all he needed. He was a practical chemist, and had perfected his processes. With a home ideally situated, it was his pleasant practice to invite those whom he pleased to visit him, and when he tired of their company, to poison them by wholesale, and to complete his pleasure by laying them away in his private cemetery, with duly marked headboards to identify them by. Old Danny Coffin had a superstitious belief that if the loot of Puerto Bello passed into innocent hands it would cease to be an instrument of evil. Nothing further removed from the usual make-up of a treasure-hunting crew could be imagined than these half-dozen. There is a carefully concealed love-story which surprises the readers quite as much as it did Mr. Rogers, who really ought to have taken the hint and persuaded Miss Lydia Belcher to follow the example of her companion, Miss Plinlimmon. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

"The Giant's Strength"

The richest man in the world brought to bay by his own pampered child is the theme of Basil King's novel, "The Giant's Strength." Paul Trafford, originally a New England coal dealer, has pursued "modern business methods," of which indeed, he was the pioneer, until he controls practically the whole coal traffic of America. He is the idol of his family, all branches of which have risen with him, and he stands, the great embodiment of the American idea, financial supremacy. He has one child, a daughter, Paula, born after he had already achieved great wealth, and, like most children of the rich, she has been carefully shielded from any knowledge but that money will buy everything and people without it are envious of the more fortunate. Paula is not a particularly brilliant girl. She is beautiful, accomplished and amiable, but she has been accustomed to accepting things all her life as due her, matter of course. For some years the family has resided mainly in Europe because, in America, it was becoming more and more a custom to look underneath piles of dollars and question methods, and Paul Trafford's only justification for many of his transactions was that they were strictly legal and phenomenally successful. Trafford was anxious for Paula to marry abroad, and had every hope that the suit of the Duke of Wiltshire would be successful. He did not wish her to become a prey of some fortune hunter, and he earnestly desired that she should be placed in some secure social niche where she would be forever untouched by the criticisms and condemnation which in increasing force were directed against himself and his coal monopoly. Paula herself was not in love with the Duke of Wiltshire, but then, she was not in love with any one else and the probabilities were more in favor of than against the marriage being eventually accomplished. But eventually she falls in love with a poor portrait painter whose family fortune had been wiped out by Trafford. Then the complications begin. The painter was a romantically proud young man who had great contempt for Paula's father and who would not wed her unless she came to him dowerless. To accommodate him the remorseful man of millions set about making wholesale restitution. The Paul Traffords of real life are too busy making money and their wives and daughters too happy spending it to have any time for remorses and restitutions. However "The Giant's Strength" is a rattling good story. Published by Harper and Brothers.

The Spirit of Discontent

Mr. William V. Rowe, in his zeal for our "continuous development as a nation," has entered, through the medium of the North American Review a solemn and earnest plea "for the national life and Constitutional centralization and for the only sane and effective regulation of wealth and its activities and correction of prevalent abuses by the use of certain of the practically unlimited powers of the Federal Government." Mr. Rowe has much contempt for the charlatans of journalism and the demagogues who preach the virtue of cure-all legislation. He knows that the wrongs of business and ills of humanity which arise from the imperfections of human nature cannot be cured by statute. He has no faith in isms and panaceas but he has confidence in an intelligent public opinion. He believes that it will safeguard the public interests and will insist that absolute justice be measured out to all. While Mr. Rowe condemns charlatans and demagogues he has not resisted their influence. Unconsciously he has permitted himself to be persuaded to think as they pretend to think. For example he has come to think that the alarming spirit of discontent in this country is based on certain fixed ideas respecting the abuses of wealth, ideas which have been fostered by reflection, aided by the constant campaign of exposure and investigation maintained by our newspapers and the public authority. This is the notion which the charlatans of the press and the demagogues have been sedulously disseminating, and undoubtedly they have caused some resentment, but it has not become as Mr. Rowe says, "a crystallized public opinion." The abuses of wealth have caused indignation and dissatisfaction and impelled the people to give their enthusiastic support to President Roosevelt in his efforts to smash trusts and discipline corporations. These popular emotions need occasion no alarm. They are manifestations of a healthy conscience, of a vigorous patriotism. The spirit of discontent is peculiar to our laboring class through which the maxims and principles of socialism are being diffused, boldly by the apostles of anarchy and deftly by the charlatans of the press and ambitious demagogues. It is a vague but turbulent spirit having no sympathy with suggestions for the purification of our government. It is a remarkable anomaly inasmuch as it is coeval with unprecedented prosperity. It has no justification and is not based on fixed ideas but rather on the consciousness of power. It does not flow from a grievance against despotism, or from a sense of injustice, or from concern for the national welfare. It is a cynical spirit,—animated by a hatred, not of the frenzied financiers and the corruptors of government but rather of all employers of labor. This hatred is fostered by a direct appeal, as, for example, in cartoons depicting the tyranny of the employers and the cruelties inflicted on workingmen. Never do the mountebanks that foster this hatred make an appeal to civic pride; never do they seek to awaken sentiments of patriotism, but always is disaffection fomented by cynical pictures that contrast the arrogance of wealth with the miserable lowliness of the wage-earner. Obviously, the passions of these discontented ones are not to be abated by tinkering with the Constitution. Nor are they to be rendered amiable by prohibiting the watering of stock. The quickest way to improve their manners is to improve the manners of the vicious citizens who, to subserve their own selfish ends, keep the mob in a state of agitation.

The Grievance of Our Intellectuals

According to Mr. Rowe the spirit of discontent is a phenomenon which is increasing in our intellectual classes and leaders of thought who are not led or misled by mere demagogic clamor or journalistic charlatanism." And he adds, "Our boasted prosperity has benefited chiefly the wage-earner and the man of wealth. The great class of salaried and professional men has felt no corresponding improvement." This is not to be disputed, but Mr. Rowe is unquestionably in error in concluding that our salaried and professional men attribute their failure to share in the prosperity of the country to the abuses of wealth. They have too much sense to do that. They resent the abuses of wealth because they apprehend the demoralizing effect of those abuses on our government. But among them is to be found the true life-blood of the country. They constitute the barrier against the despotism of the mob, the corruption of wealth and the liberty of the press so far as it has become the vent for anarchy. They are in favor of the pursuit of right ends by right means. They know that their failure to share in the prosperity of the country is because of the aggressions of organized labor which have increased the cost of living beyond reason and in despite of economic principles which cannot be ignored without causing confusion and injustice. They are not dissatisfied with existing governmental institutions; and we should not spend any time assuaging their feelings by promising political reforms. Such promises will only have a tendency to mislead them. What Mr. Rowe and other publicists should be doing is organizing that important class of our citizenship in a revolt against the demagogism which is magnifying self-interest and destroying faith in the wisdom of our political institutions. That class should not be deluded into the notion that the abuses of wealth are mainly of an economic character. It should be understood that they are abominated because of their effect on government and because they afford the demagogues of politics and the charlatans of the press a pretext to inflame resentment and irritate passions out of all proportion to the magnitude of the reprehended evils. To get contentment in this country we should discourage the differentiation of classes, we should rely for the redress of wrongs on the enforcement of just laws, we should exact decent behavior from the rapacious union man as well as from the predatory rich man, and above all we should endeavor to bring people to a just estimate of the character of the pernicious demagogue who is forever grinding at the hurdy-gurdy of magnified grievances and while affecting a zeal for government is sapping the foundation of all government.

The Czars of the Nation

A fine sample of the methods employed to persuade the mob that it is omnipotent and that it may rule this country should it so desire appeared in the Examiner the other day. Its inspiration was an excerpt from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which contained nothing more than a plain statement of facts. "Speaking generally," said the Court, "it may be observed that the judicial power of a nation extends to all controversies justiciable in their nature, the parties to which or the property involved in which may be reached by judicial process, and when the judicial power of the United States was vested in the supreme and other courts all the judicial power which the nation was capable of exercising was vested in these tribunals, and unless there be some limitations expressed in the Constitution it must be held to embrace all controversies of a justiciable nature arising within the territorial limits of the nation no matter who may be the parties thereto." Why this mere assertion of principles which are familiar to many laymen and every student of law in the first year at school should have provoked the comments that followed it is difficult to conceive. But that Mr. Hearst's editor discerned in this mere assertion something of quite sinister import, something that savored of wanton and vicious arrogation which should be promptly and fiercely challenged for the sake of the easymarks of this oppressed land is obvious. Hearken while he ululates:

"The statement that unless the Constitution gives the people the power to question a judicial decision that decision cannot be questioned anywhere, no matter who the parties thereto may be, is simple folly."

The people of the United States in 1776 gave jobs, salaries and power to certain judges.

And the people of the United States today, in 1907, give jobs and salaries to certain judges.

But they do not give the United States to those judges, and they don't give the territory or the property of the United States to those judges, and the people reserve the right to change at any time any decision, or change any constitution, or put any judge off the bench, or overrule any decision if they see fit.

All the power in the United States is in the people. The people own the country. They own the judges, the President, they control every official, every inch of ground, every dollar. All decisions of every court from the Supreme Court of the United States down to the little justice in a village are subject to the people's approvement and endorsement. If the people don't like a decision they can overturn it. It is their right and the Constitution provides it."

A curious rodomontade that, all out of proportion to the provocation. The gratuitousness of it warrants the inference that the author had it on his mind and had to get rid of it. The Supreme Court merely defined the nature of its judicial power and the scope of its jurisdiction. There was nothing in its language to warrant the suspicion that it was indifferent to the exalted character of the imperious pee-pul. And yet it is quite possible that the Justices of the Supreme Court do not at all agree with Mr. Hearst's editorial writer respecting the power of the citizenry of our country. In all probability those jurists are not of the opinion that when the people dissent from the court there is a conflict of judicial authority. Nor is it likely that they concern themselves about popular opinion before rendering a decision, for it would be somewhat quixotic of them to reckon with the people since they are so far removed from the multitude that it is practically impossible for the multitude to reach them. To say that the people can remove them if the people don't like them is an extravagance that amounts to sublimated claptrap. It would be less extravagant were the senate elected by direct vote of the people as the demagogues demand, because in that event the senate would be ruled by the mob and the demagogues would rule the mob. Obviously Mr. Hearst's editorial writer is under a delusion respecting the supremacy of the people in matters of a judicial nature. From his sentiments we infer that he misapprehends the philosophy of our government and has an imperfect understanding of its mechanism. He probably believes that the opinion of the majority governs this country and governs it absolutely. He does not know that the founders of this Republic shrewdly safeguarded it against the ignorance and despotism of the majority; that in making a Constitution they were conscious of the fact that in all the relations which the social state admits and to which it gives birth from domestic order to political order, the presence of a power which may give and maintain the role of action is a necessary condition of the very existence of society. They were conscious also that the only power which has an inherent legitimacy is the power of reason, justice and truth, and that the object of government should be to realize that power and represent those elements in society. And they carefully adjusted the machinery of this government with a view to preventing the sovereignty of the people being reduced to the sovereignty of the majority. To familiarize one's self with the thoughts and motives of the fathers of this Republic is to become impressed with their dread of demagogues and their burning desire to anticipate the evils that in all ages have beset mankind in consequence of the chicanery of selfish and conscienceless politicians. They had no superstitious confidence in the infallibility of the majority. They remembered that it was a majority of the Israelites who would have murdered Moses and force Aaron to become the priest of idolatry. They recalled that it was a majority that brought Christ to the cross. What a miserable government would they have given us had they supposed that the majority possessed right by the mere circumstance of its being the majority, instead of understanding that the true law of government is that of reason, truth and justice, which no one possesses but which certain men are more capable than others of seeking and discovering. And it was because of their distrust of majorities that they gave us a Congress one house of which is not created by direct vote of the people but by men who would be likely to be selected because of their capacity for performing the special duties imposed upon them. And to minimize still further the influence of majorities they gave us a court created by an authority superior to legislation and beyond the reach of executive power, clothed with an authority above the law it was appointed to administer, and charged not only with the general course of public justice but with the limitations of the powers of political bodies and the adjustment of the conflicting claims of sovereign states. Such is the Supreme Court of the United States, the most powerful tribunal in the world, and one of which there is no other example in judicial history. Not only does it interpret the Constitution, but it determines its construction and enforces its precepts. So while the Constitution rests on the foundation stone of popular sovereignty that sovereignty does not amount to arbitrary power. In England an act of Parliament is supreme. In the face of it the judges of England are powerless. The founders of this Republic extended the judicial protection of human rights not only against the rulers of the people but against the representatives of the people. Having as colonists had experience with parliamentary oppression they resolved to safeguard personal rights even against the popular will, and made a constitutional judiciary the final custodian of the liberty of the subject. It has been truly said that we have a court which is beyond the reach of popular assemblies; that it is the bulwark of the people against their own incendiary action, designed not only to save them from their enemies but also from themselves. And this is the court whose decisions according to the Examiner are like pie crust in the hands of the people, and the judges of which may be so easily removed if the people don't like them.

The Preliminary Skirmish

In Ohio where the game of president-making has been the most popular sport for many years and where the fortunes of politics show many surprising variations there is a mighty concern just now over the personality of the next Republican candidate for the Presidency. And with an unquestioning faith in their state which smacks a good deal of parochialism the resourceful Ohians are seeking an answer to this question which shall not carry them beyond their own boundary line. Having dismissed all other candidates for the exalted position with an impatient wave of the hand, the good people of Ohio are earnestly asking one another whether it will be Foraker or Taft. Just at present Taft looms large in a sense not merely physical. His star is burning with a bright luster and Foraker's light seems considerably dimmed. But the Senator has not earned his nickname of "firealarm" by false pretenses and he may be relied upon to stay with the fight until he is driven into the last ditch. The spectacle of these two maneuvering to outwit each other and the study of their widely different methods of campaigning are the two absorbing things in Ohio today. Outside of Ohio, however, there is a strange apathy. Neither Taft nor Foraker has yet gripped the national mind in connection with the presidential nomination. Enthusiasm has not yet spread the contagion of either personality beyond the state line. New York and Pennsylvania journals are devoting considerable space to the contest, it is true, but reading their comments one somehow fails to take the idea of strong conviction. The editorial pen seems to move uncertainly, without finality; the editorial mind seems waiting, as though conscious that decision is yet premature.

Thought Centers on Roosevelt

Everybody seems expectant of a sign and instinctively all eyes turn in the direction of the White House as to the place whence that sign will come. It is a situation not without its humorous side. With a vehemence exhibited on no other occasion unless it be when electing a member to the Ananias Club—the President has iterated and reiterated his determination never again to be a candidate for the headship of the nation. He has averred until it has become more than impolite to question his averment, that he will not accept a nomination from the convention under any conditions whatsoever. And yet his statements might just as well have remained unuttered for any change they have produced in the common mind. Day by day senators, congressmen, state officials and men prominent in all sorts of politics, even including John Temple Graves, announce their belief that Roosevelt will be the choice of the next Republican convention and that he will be again returned to the White House. The President cannot stay in the background. His personality has gripped the general imagination so strongly that no effort of his to prove that he is going to seek the quiet of private life at the expiration of his term can be anything but nugatory. How long this situation is to continue none can say. It may last until the time comes for the convention to make its choice of a candidate and on the other hand some unexpected event may put an end to it and straighten out as remarkable a tangle as ever kinked American politics. That the original Foraker man who is of course none other than the senior senator from Ohio is not pleased by the uncertainty and doubt induced by this abiding shadow that darkens his path, goes without saying. That the trend of events is perfectly satisfactory to Taft seems equally obvious. His is no case of the man seeking the office any more than it is a case of the office seeking the man. He has been picked by outsiders to make the race and has entered with sincere unwillingness, for his ambitions pull him another way. It is quite probable that if Taft's deepseated conviction could be ascertained it would prove to be that Roosevelt and not Taft or Foraker will be the next Republican candidate for the Presidency. And it is because they share that conviction, whether rightly or wrongly only time will tell, that people outside of Ohio vouchsafe a lukewarm interest in the sparring of Taft and Foraker.

Another Outbreak of American Vulgarity

Out of St. Louis where, it would seem, the forces of virtue and vice are perpetually aligned against each other, panting eagerly for the fray, comes the latest outbreak of furious American virtue. St. Louis has suddenly awakened to a realization of the appalling fact that in its art gallery, open for all the world to see, there are actually a number of nudes, copies of the world's most celebrated masterpieces of sculpture. On this discovery the peculiar brand of modesty characteristic of a certain class in every city of this country immediately became rampant and there has arisen a mighty ado over the naked and unblushing marbles. Greater righteousness could not be manifested if St. Louis were New York with Anthony Comstock to censor its morals. Such an occurrence as this should never be allowed to pass without vigorous protest. Not only does it indicate a lack of artistic appreciation which is humiliating, but it also reveals a prurience of mind, a willingness to see evil where evil is not; that is nothing less than immoral. Not everyone can appreciate the full measure of beauty in a Greek statue; that is largely a matter of education and it is too much to ask at this stage of American culture that there shall be many Paters in our midst. But everyone who lays claim to a respectable share of culture and refinement can look upon a marble Venus or a plaster Antinous with eyes which see something besides bodily exposure. To call these delectable prudes of St. Louis philistines or iconoclasts is to fling at their modestly bowed heads cant terms which have come by much use to mean very little. In plain English they are vulgarians. Such conduct as this has already brought too much reproach on this country and the day when education shall have removed this ridiculous ignorance cannot come too quickly. When Dickens came across the Atlantic to take a few American notes his keen eye was quick to see the rampant virtue and the bridling modesty that then as now were overwilling to find impropriety where none was meant. He satirized this characteristic when he drew in Martin Chuzzlewit the portrait of the woman whose delicate sensibilities were outraged when somebody mentioned the naked eye. Probably the fault is not so common now as it was fifty years ago. Already no doubt education has done much to broaden the general mind in these matters. But there still remains a great defect to be remedied. There must come a greater realization of the fact that virtue need not always be on the defensive. Meanwhile St. Louis and its solemn prigs who sit in self-satisfied criticism on the glories of ancient art should digest the meaning of the good old garter maxim.

Educating Revolutionists

Judge Cabaniss remarked the other day, in dismissing a teacher baled into court for disciplining an unruly boy, that in his opinion corporal punishment should be more frequently administered. It is unfortunate that there is so widespread a prejudice against corporal punishment. Unfortunate also is the prevalence of the notion that all children are of the same temperament, as well as the fact that neither parents nor guardians can be depended upon to differentiate the children who are not to be improved by corporal punishment from the children who are absolutely in need of hand raising. The main objection to the punishment of unruly children is that it inclines them to slavish compliance with unjust demands and a tendency to lie and conceal faults. Doubtless these are the effects of a rigorous discipline, but the stubbornness that calls for constant application of the rod is much more to be deprecated than servility. It never seems to occur to the modern parent that to encourage a child to resist a salutary rule is to encourage him to resist all government. What we need in the world today is more obedience and less refractoriness. There is quite a difference between an inclination to resist authority and a disposition to rebel against a despotism, and the trouble is most of the agitation in favor of resistance is among people who are congenitally stubborn and too ignorant to appreciate the philosophy of legitimate authority. Experience teaches that it is easier to start a revolution than to put a stop to one; also, that the invariable sequence to a resolution is a despotism. Since the beginning of the present industrial disturbances it has been evident that we are educating an army of revolutionists in San Francisco. And it is also evident that the revolutionary sentiment is inculcated at home, for nothing more certainly reflects the temper of the adults at home than the actions of the children abroad. A teacher in one of the south-side schools last week cautioned her pupils to keep away from the car-houses and do nothing to obstruct the tracks. A bright lad wonderingly inquired: "Can't we even fire rocks at the scabs?" and he received his negative answer with as much surprise as if he had been cautioned not to say his prayers.irate mothers are calling upon teachers and in violent language threatening them that if cars are patronized the schools will be boycotted. These lessons are not lost on the children. By and by, when they adopt strike methods to gain their own ends; when they break windows and crockery and play truant and stay out nights, who will be to blame? When the Juvenile Court is called upon to take cognizance of their misdemeanors, and reform schools and detention homes are filled to overflowing; when, later on, the county jail and the penitentiary claim their quota, there will perhaps be some sentimental blubbering over the gray hairs of sorrowing parents, and the heads of fond mothers bowed in shame.

The Green Kitten

Translated by R. Nisbet Bain from the Russian of Maxim Gorky.

The round window of my chamber looked out upon the prison-yard. It was very high from the ground, but by placing the table against the wall and mounting upon it, I could see everything that was going on in the courtyard. Beneath the window, under the slope of the roof, the doves had built themselves a nest, and when I set about looking out of my window down into the court below, they began cooing above my head.

I had lots of time to make the acquaintance of the inhabitants of the prison-yard from my coign of vantage, and I knew already that the merriest member of that grim and grey population went by the name of Zazubrina.

He was a square-set, stout little fellow, with a ruddy face and a high forehead, from beneath which his large bright, lively eyes sparkled incessantly.

His cap he wore at the back of his head, his ears stuck out on both sides of his shaven head as if in joke; he never fastened the strings of his shirt-collar, he never buttoned his vest, and every movement of his muscles gave you to understand that he was a merry soul and a pronounced enemy of anger and sadness.

Always laughing, alert and noisy, he was the idol of the yard; he was always surrounded by a group of grey comrades, and he would always be laughing and regaling them with all sorts of curious pranks, brightening up their dull and sorrowful life with his hearty, genuine gaiety . . .

On one occasion he appeared at the door of the prison-quarters ready to go for a walk with three rats whom he had dexterously harnessed as if they were horses. Sometimes his inventiveness took a cruel form. Thus, for instance, he once, somehow, glued to the wall the long hair of one of the prisoners, a mere lad, who was sitting on the floor asleep against the wall, and, when his hair had dried, suddenly awoke him. The lad quickly leaped to his feet, and clapping his slim lean hands to the back of his head, fell weeping to the ground. The prisoners laughed, and Zazubrina was satisfied. Afterwards—I saw it through the window—he fell a comforting the lad, who had left a no inconsiderable tuft of hair on the wall.

Besides Zazubrina, there was yet another favorite in the prison—a plump, reddish kitten, a tiny, playful little animal, pampered by everyone. Whenever they went out for a walk, the prisoners used to hunt him up and take him with them a good part of the way, passing him on from hand to hand. They would run after him, too, in the yard, and let him cling on to their hands and feet with his claws, delighting in the sportive tricks of their pet.

Whenever the kitten appeared on the scene, he diverted the general attention from Zazubrina, and the latter was by no means pleased with this preference. Zazubrina was at heart an artist, and as an artist had an inordinately good opinion of his own talents. When his public was drawn away from him by the kitten, he remained alone and sat him down in some hole or corner in the courtyard, and from thence would watch the comrades who had forgotten him just then. And I, from my window, would observe him, and felt everything with which his soul was full at such moments. It appeared to me that Zazubrina must infallibly kill the kitten at the first opportunity, and I was sorry for the merry prisoner who was thus always longing to be the centre of general attention. Of all the tendencies of man, this is the most injurious, for nothing kills the soul so quickly as this longing to please people.

When you have to sit in a prison—even the life of the fungi on its walls seems interesting. You will understand therefore the interest with which I observed from my window the little tragedy going on below there, this jealousy of a kitten on the part of a man—you will understand, too, the patience with which I awaited the denouement. The denouement was, indeed, approaching. It happened in this wise.

On a bright, sunny day, when the prisoners were pouring out of doors into the courtyard, Zazubrina observed in a corner of the yard a pail of green paint, left behind by the painters who were painting the roof of the prison. He approached it, pondered over it, and, dipping a finger into the paint, adorned himself with a pair of green whiskers. These green whiskers on his red face drew forth a burst of laughter. A certain hobbledehoy present, wishing to appropriate Zazubrina's idea, began forthwith to paint his upper lip; but Zazubrina spoiled his fun for him by dipping his hand in the pail and adroitly besprinkling his whole physiognomy. The hobbledehoy spluttered and shook his head, Zazubrina danced around him, and the public kept on laughing, and egged on its jester with cries of encouragement.

At that very moment the red kitten suddenly appeared in the yard. Leisurely he entered the courtyard, gracefully lifting his paws, trotting along with tail erect, and evidently without the slightest fear of coming to grief beneath the feet of the crowd frantically careering round Zazubrina and the bespattered hobbledehoy, who was violently rubbing away with the palm of his hand the mass of oil and verdigris which covered his face.

"My brothers!" someone suddenly exclaimed, "pussy is coming."

"Pussy! Ah, the little rogue!"

"What ho, ginger! Puss, puss, puss!"

They caught up the cat and he was passed from hand to hand; everybody caressed him.

"Look, there's no starving there! What a fat little tummy!"

"What a big cat he's growing!"

"And what claws he has got, the little devil!"

"Let him go! Let him play as he likes!"

"Well, I'll give him a back! Play away, puss!"

Zazubrina was deserted. He stood alone, wiping the green paint off his whiskers with his fingers, and watched the kitten leaping on to the backs and shoulders of the prisoners. Whenever he displayed a wish to sit still on any particular shoulder or back, the men would wriggle about and shake him off, and then he would set off leaping and bounding again from one shoulder to the next. This diverted them all exceedingly, and the laughter was incessant.

"Come, my friends! let us paint the cat!" resounded the voice of Zazubrina. It sounded just as if Zazubrina, in proposing this pastime, at the same time begged them to consent to it.

There was a commotion among the crowd of prisoners.

The Solitary Flagon

Charles Bandelaire

Translated by Harry Curwen

A tell-tale glance from deep passionate eyes,
Which glides toward us, as the white rays glide
From the lazy moon to the trembling tide,
Where in naked splendor her beauty lies;

The last purse of gold in a gambler's fingers;
A libertine kiss from your lips, my dear;
The sound of music, as thrilling and clear
As a cry where mortal misery lingers;—

All these are not worth, O Flagon profound!
The healing balms which you scatter around;
You bring to the poet—heart-sick, down trod—
Gushings of hopeful youth, and pride, aye pride—

A treasure to those who have naught beside!
To make us heroes!—liken us to God!

Perspective Impressions

It is a significant fact that Abe Ruef's confession was written on yellow paper.

San Francisco's plutocrats were never so thoroughly united as they are now.

One touch of boodle sets all Burlingame aching. This was indicted without the assistance of Heney.

Richard Cornelius says he is going to devote the balance of his precious life to "the furtherance of municipal ownership." Of what? Soup-kitchens?

As Cleveland was called the stuffed prophet we shall probably, in the event of Taft's election, dub him the upholstered protege.

"My nation," says General Kurowi, "wants peace in which to develop the opportunities that are hers." It would be easy to applaud that sentiment if it did not appear that so many of those opportunities were in San Francisco. But come to think of it, the Japs are the least of our troubles at present.

We might have guessed that the brewery strike would be called off. With a famine in steam beer some of the most enthusiastic and vociferous strikers in town would be deprived of the source of their energies.

The Spectator of Portland edited by Hugh Hume, formerly of this city, has not forgotten his San Francisco. He says: "San Francisco suffered much from the dishonesty of her officials; she will suffer more from the jealousy of her private citizens."

The Grave of Torquemada

By Edward Hutton.

It was already midday when I came to the great silent monastery of Santo Tomas that lies in the plain below Avila. I had been in the saddle since dawn; all day the tawny passionate landscape had unfolded itself before me, sierra rolling after sierra more barren than the waves of the most desolate sea. Weary with the heat and the dust of the way I thought I would rest in the church before entering the city. Having tied my mule in the shade I passed into the coolness of the church under the great western coro where it is always twilight, past the high altar on its arch, across the transept where in a beautiful ruined tomb Prince Juan, the only son of the Catholic kings, lies sleeping, into the sacristy where I thought to find a priest of whom I might ask a cup of water. As I opened the door I saw a white frock disappear a little hastily through the passage that led, as I supposed, to the monastery. It must be, thought I, that I have disturbed a siesta; but before I had time to think what to do, an old man in the Dominican habit came towards me and very courteously and kindly asked me what I needed. When I had told my tale he led me, with a certain familiar gentleness that I think is peculiar to Spain, into the monastery, where he insisted upon my partaking of some bread and fish—for it was Friday—with a little wine mixed with water.

After I had thanked him he offered to show me the church and the house which he explained was now used as a seminary for the education of those young friars who go to the Philippines. The time passed quickly in his company, so that the bell began to ring for Vespers before he had shown me all. "And is there nothing, Father," I ventured to ask, "in yon sacristy that is old, curious or holy?" He did not reply for a time, and then quite suddenly the bell stopped, and he turned towards me. "Nothing you would care for," said he quickly, "perhaps, tomorrow . . .", and then after he had made me promise to return there to sleep that night, he bade me good-bye.

After Vespers I set out for Avila scarcely more than a mile away on her hill. In the sweet evening light she seemed a vision from some ancient missal, a beautiful mediaeval city surrounded by perfect rose-colored granite walls, where the apse of the cathedral is just a bastion with the rest. Within there is the city. But its aspect upon those infinite stretches of sierra in a country as stony as Judea I can never forget. It is impossible to convey in words anything of the immensity of this land or its strength. It is like a passionate and difficult silence.

As I passed the great convent of Encarnacion, coming into the city at last, as I always preferred to do, by the Puerta S. Teresa, it was of that great Saint I was thinking, and it seemed to me for a moment that it was easy to renounce the world in a land without trees, flowers, or birds; and yet everywhere there are hedges of sweetbriar, which, notwithstanding their sweetness, as she would have reminded herself, hide thorns. I came to the inn at last to find it full of tourists, Americans, who, under the guidance of one of their number, had been "doing" the city as they informed me. They seemed to think I should be glad of their company. At dinner, which is an early meal in Avila, they told each other of their adventures. But he who was the leader and guide began to speak of Santo Tomas in a loud voice, so that we all might benefit by his knowledge. I did not hear the beginning of his discourse, for I was talking with an old Spaniard who sat beside me; but my attention was caught when I heard him say, ". . . and so I spat right there, on the Tomb, and the monk didn't dare say anything, but he just looked, I can't tell you easily how he looked." My Spanish friend moved in his seat and asked me, "It is of the Tomb of Torquemada that he speaks?" I did not know, but at his request I asked: "Yes, sir, I'm telling you, aren't I? I spat right there on the tomb. I'm a free-born American, a liberty-loving educated Independent minister and I'm glad to have the chance to show the Spanish idolaters what I think of their man-burning devils." "And so say all of us," said a young man across the table with a laugh, while the others smiled and seemed to enter into the spirit of the thing.

A small part of this I told my neighbor: but alas, he had understood. "But it is too long ago, surely it is too long ago—to bear malice," he said in a quiet but agitated voice. "We are Christians: it is very necessary to forgive, is it not so?" . . .

But that strident voice that was used to domineer over many congregations would not have it so. "And yet," said my friend to me in the hubbub that followed, "and yet it was us he burned; if we have forgiven, why should he remember?"

It was night when I returned to Santo Tomas, but the Father was waiting for me in the sacristy. After a minute he said "My son, you are troubled, you are angry, what has happened? It is not well to sleep when one is angry." And somehow I told him all. Once or twice he smiled, but there were tears in his eyes as he led me to the bare slab of slate in the midst of that great room beneath which Torquemada sleeps. "It is true," he said, "we have forgiven him." There was a long silence, and then with a great deference he turned towards me and said, "If you will, senor, we will pray for him and for us all because—is it not so?—wherever one who is in need is left unaided, there passes an executioner and where two or three are gathered together in unkindness, there is the Inquisition." As we knelt I saw him wipe away the mark of scorn from the grave, with the strap of his cloak.

It is said that when a certain woman collected for interment the insulted remains of Nero, the pagan world surmised that she must be a Christian—only a Christian would have been likely to conceive so chivalrous a devotion towards mere wretchedness. Something of this kind came into my mind as I knelt with the old Father beside that rude slab of slate and tried to pray as of old that it might please Him to have mercy upon all men.

The Jurors' Anguish

One cannot but feel profound sympathy for Foreman Oliver and his companions of the grand jury, who, according to Mr. Oliver were in a state of nervous collapse after the session last week at which they voted to indict several men who were their friends. Owing to their agony of mind they had to take a vacation. It was a pathetic and touching picture that Mr. Oliver painted of the misery of himself and his associates who, in the intensity of their high public spirit, had voted to put shame and stripes on their unfortunate and sinful friends. It is to be hoped, however, that Mr. Oliver's picture is highly impressionistic and that it will not bear close scrutiny; in other words that he has confounded friendship with mere casual acquaintanceship, and therefore that the feelings which accompanied the filing of the indictments were not quite so harrowing as one might, from his utterances, be led to imagine. To vote to indict a friend is a pretty serious matter. Which reminds me that I read somewhere the other day that there are persons in this city who put their friends above their country, and that they are among the loathsome individuals who sympathize with the accused financiers. Now it isn't quite fair to assume that a disposition to set the rich boodlers of this city free is fatally prejudicial to the interests of this country. It isn't even as fair as to assume that to encourage the anarchistic unions of this city is to indicate a treasonable spirit. But the idea of being more faithful to one's friend than to one's country is not so shocking as some people imagine. A very distinguished citizen once asserted that the laws of friendship are as austere and eternal as the laws of nature and of morals. In ancient Greece law givers thought so much of friendship that they studied more earnestly how to promote it than how to maintain even justice. History tells us as if to teach us what a sacred thing is friendship that when in the presence of the Roman consuls Caius Blossius was asked how much he would have done for his friend, the condemned Tiberius Gracchus, he replied, "All things."

"And what if he commanded you to fire our temples?" was asked. "I would have obeyed him," he replied.

"And, Montaigne says that answer was such as it ought to be."

How They Might Have Felt

But Caius Blossius had such faith in his friend that he was sure that Gracchus would never have ordered him to fire the temples of his country. And he said that also. And it is by having that faith in one's friend that one may avoid violating friendship. The ideal friendship is that which has an audacious and unalterable trust in the truth of a friend's heart. The ideal friendship is not alone for the asphodel meadows of life, for the days of serenity, but for the storms of the terrestrial journey, for the days of poverty and persecution. The essence of friendship is unwavering confidence. So it is unlikely that Mr. Oliver or his associates were the true friends of any of the indicted financiers. If they were they would not have indicted them on the word of Abe Ruef. On that infamous person's word I wouldn't send a stray dog to the pound. And even on stronger testimony than Ruef's one might easily have persuaded himself that the payment of a fee to that individual was not a bribe, especially after it had once been determined in the case of the French restaurants that it was extortion.

A Curious Distinction

In the case of the Parkside franchise it must have been only by the most subtle reasoning that the sensitive jurors of the mental agony persuaded themselves that the crime of bribery had been committed. For this case was on all fours with the French restaurant cases in all but one particular: the French restaurants were being operated not in the public interest, whereas the Parkside magnates were promoting a project designed to benefit a large section of the city. Moreover the Parkside financiers earnestly endeavored to obtain the franchise legitimately, but were waylaid by Ruef with his blackjack. Such is my understanding of the case. As it is possible that I may be in error I shall not add that I can readily understand why the grand jurors had nervous prostration after that day's work. Perhaps it would be doing them strict justice to say that they had nervous prostration before beginning the day's work, a circumstance that might be explanatory of their failure to recall that they had indicted Ruef for extortion in the French restaurant cases. Of course it may be said that they were deeply impressed by that portion of Ruef's confession in which he represented that he was the weak, frail victim of plutocratic temptation. But then we have the affidavit of Rudolph Spreckels to the effect that in his case Ruef was the tempter. Ruef unfolded a glittering scheme for money making out of the bond issue to Mr. Spreckels, but Mr. Spreckels from the mountain top surveyed the glad prospect without batting an eye. He ordered satanic Abe out of his office.

Putting Money in Circulation

Howsoever we may differ as to the policy of the graft prosecution we shall agree as to one thing: that Mr. Heney is very kind to his profession. He is doing more to enrich it than was ever done by any other man in the world's history. The more plutocrats he indicts the richer will be the harvest of the gentlemen with a fine taste for litigiousness and fat fees. It is already evident that the apparatus for the administration of justice is destined to be working overtime for many a day while the luxurious men of fortune thread their way through the maze that Heney has contrived. Whether they will be brought to trial I am inclined to doubt, for the probability is that the efforts made by Ruef and Schmitz to set aside the indictments will be renewed. And it will not be surprising if with all the legal talent now engaged for the defense some new points are discovered. Since the Ruef and Schmitz cases were in the Supreme Court public clamor has subsided in a measure and that tribunal may be found to have undergone quite a change of temperament. I have heard, by the way, that the court had almost made up its mind to release Ruef from the custody of Elisor Biggy when at the behest of the prosecution Ruef withdrew his petition. It is unfortunate that the decision was not handed down, for it might be edifying to know what the court thought of the denial of Ruef's right to bail. It is by no means certain, however, that the distinguished jurists would venture into elaborate comments on that subject. When a writ of habeas corpus is kept under advisement six weeks it is fair to infer that the court is not eager to say anything very much. And yet there is very much for the court to say, and I am inclined to the opinion that eventually it will be said.

Spreckels and Reformers

"Many a reformer," said that great and good man Ralph Waldo Emerson, "perishes in the removal of rubbish." Of which I have been reminded by the forecasting of the finish of Mr. Rudolph Spreckels, the distinguished civic patriot and plutocrat who is now striving to send most of the other plutocrats in town to jail. This is a herculean task that Mr. Spreckels has undertaken, the successful achievement of which depends in a large measure on the loyalty of public sentiment. Should the motives of Mr. Spreckels and of his associates be successfully impugned they would soon encounter some very formidable obstacles. And it is no easy matter for a reformer to safeguard his motives from scepticism. From Eschines to E. P. E. Troy reformers have found it a rather wearisome job trying to keep their motives out of quarantine. Whenever a man starts out to renovate things around him society, with a cynical air and a perverse indifference to his zeal for the public welfare, demands that he first renovate himself. This is unfair, for a man may have good intentions and some vices. But society is inexorable in its prejudices. And its suspicion of reformers is instructive. Perhaps this is due to the fact that so many of the notable reformers in the world's history were tediously good merely for their own sordid interests. Though there is not yet any indication of a waning of public confidence in Mr. Spreckels, a restless, prying, conscientious criticism of the methods of the prosecution has broken out, a disposition to scrutiny and dissent. Mr. Spreckels is hearing something besides diapasons of enthusiastic reverence, he is inhaling something besides the incense of passionate devotion. There is no longer that concord of ecstatic sound suggestive of the successful titillation of popular emotion. There is obviously an undercurrent of distrust.

The Spirit of Distrust

When William J. Dingee offered himself as a Schmitz bondsman, "Ha! ha!" said the gents who are skilled in the science of psychology and who can scent a motive from afar off, "another plutocrat uncovered; they'll get on his trail next." No man is above suspicion these days. There is a strong and overwhelming sentiment against permitting any man to seem to be animated by noble motives. Even Mr. Spreckels has been scoffed at by the cynics ever since he began his career as a public benefactor, and yet he was unquestionably inspired by the most praiseworthy motives when he started his crusade. It is the disposition of small minds to challenge virtue whenever it becomes aggressive. I have before me a marked copy of the Salt Lake Tribune of Sunday, May 19, in which there is an interview with Judge William H. King, one of the leading lawyers of Utah. He had just returned from a visit to this city and he said to the reporter: "It should be borne in mind that Heney is really the special counsel for the State engaged and paid by Rudolph Spreckels and other citizens who have private axes to grind. Heney in my opinion is anxious to convict those whom Spreckels wishes convicted and cares nothing for those who are not in Spreckels's bad books." Of course Judge King's views are merely those of a casual observer. He gave articulate expression to that spirit of distrust which disposes men to impugn motives. And it is this same spirit which views with suspicion the relationship existing between Dingee and Schmitz. As Dingee has had much experience as the magnate of a public service corporation suspicious and cynical minds are convinced that it would be profitable to scrutinize their relations. But it is not improbable that their friendship was of an entirely disinterested character. Dingee is a man whose experience has inclined him to despise reformers; for it has happened that he has met some very tough ones. He took an interest in Schmitz in the Mayor's first campaign, and the Mayor appointed him Park Commissioner. They have been intimate friends ever since. As to the quality of Dingee's friendship there are several men in California who give very enthusiastic testimony. He does not endow churches, or erect statuary along the highways, or resort to any of the usual methods of acquiring a reputation for philanthropy or high ideals, but he has made some of his friends very happy, and the consciousness of having done that is about the most gratifying thing that I have ever been able to conceive.

McCarthy's Latest Switch

From the first day that it became known that Rudolph Spreckels, filled with righteous indignation at the looting of this city, had resolved to rescue it from the clutches of its despoilers, his motives have been challenged. First it was the labor leaders of San Francisco who were sceptical of Mr. Spreckels's intentions. They pronounced him a capitalistic conspirator and charged him with hostility to union labor. But now he enjoys their confidence. So obvious has it become that Mr. Spreckels does not intend to injure the unions that even the blatant protean McCarthy, the lightning-change artist of organized labor, is giving the prosecution his ardent sympathy and pompous encouragement. This chameleon agitator who, until recently was one of the main wheels of the Schmitz-Ruef machine was on the platform last Sunday telling the carmen what the prosecution was going to do with Calhoun. Furuseth, Casey and Macarthur have all been converted to confidence in the prosecution and it is said that when the reformers come to prepare for the next municipal campaign all those gentlemen will have a hand in the shaping of events. But while Mr. Spreckels has gained the sympathy of labor he has lost the sympathy of the leading lights of the financial world, and also of that large element of the community which has become intolerant of unionism, and in which the belief is prevalent that union labor sentiment is as prejudicial as the lust of the boodlers to the interests of the city.

Doing the Popular Stunt

It is not strange that in a community divided against itself there should not be unanimity of sentiment in a matter that directly concerns the vital interests of the city. Under normal conditions Mr. Spreckels would be a great, popular hero, for he is doing the very thing that is always most agreeable to the multitude: trying to humiliate and punish the rich. Aristotle, the wisest of men, tells us that this policy was very successfully pursued even by demagogues in ancient times. "The confidence of the multitude," says the Stagirite, "was the great engine by which these politicians assailed the freedom of their country, and the pledge of this confidence was their hatred and persecution of opulence and nobility." And he tells us that it was by persecuting the wealthy Pediaci that Pisistratus enslaved Athens; that Theogenes pursued the same plan at Megara and that Dionysius by the impeachment of rich men raised himself to the throne of Syracuse. So Mr. Spreckels is engaged in a very popular occupation, but unfortunately he does not find it clear sailing. At this time the city is in great distress owing to the industrial strife through which many thousands of people have been sorely afflicted. It happens that one of the salient figures of that strife is Patrick Calhoun, who happens also to be one of the rich men whom Mr. Spreckels fondly hopes to put behind prison bars. Furthermore it happens that Patrick Calhoun, though he stands accused of having done some things that all good citizens reprobate he is now fighting for a principle the triumph of which is a consummation most passionately desired by everybody who has the interest of the city at heart. And thus we see the situation involves a conflict of salutary designs. For while Reformer Spreckels is trying to improve the morals of our political government and Reformer Calhoun is trying to improve the morals of our industrial system, Reformer Spreckels is intent on sending Reformer Calhoun to jail.

Calhoun the Martyr

In the foregoing summing up of the situation, my contemporaries are not likely to concur. Breathing as they do the air of the transcendental regions they are at present strong on idealism, which, by the way, George Bernard Shaw has pronounced only a flattering name for romance in politics and morals. My contemporaries might stand for the reforming of the government by somebody who is less than an angel, but when it comes to reforming the labor unions the reformer must show a clean bill of health; there must be no flaws in his character; the labor unions are not to be renovated except with kid gloves and sterilized intentions. The newspapers have a strong prejudice in favor of labor unions. And the newspapers have been very sympathetic toward labor unions throughout the existing strikes. Moreover they have given the prosecution of the grafters and especially the pursuit of Calhoun their very enthusiastic support. It is of course highly creditable to be zealous for the enforcement of the law against transgressors, but zeal for justice is not vindicated by an implacable hostility to bribe-givers when it is associated with complaisance toward pestiferous labor leaders who promote industrial strife and disorder. This is said in no querulous spirit but merely to establish a basis on which to venture the opinion that the newspapers have not persuaded the public that Calhoun is wholly bad and that the unions are wholly good. This is a conviction of mine which I am sure is much stronger than the faith of Cornelius in his theory that Calhoun has been employing men to throw rocks at his own ears. And having this conviction I am not to be influenced by the disinclination of my contemporaries to accept Patrick Calhoun in the role of industrial reformer. Indeed it has been made so obvious that a kick at Calhoun is assumed to be tantamount to an obeisance to Cornelius, that I shall not be surprised if long before the railroad magnate feels the impact of the last boot he takes on in the public eye something of the aspect of a martyr.

A Case of Confusion

Stern moralists will agree that a city that would condone the crime which Calhoun is charged with is in urgent need of regeneration. And perhaps stern moralists are right. But despite the moralities you cannot rid some people of the common sympathies of human feeling. They clear away masses of ponderous gravity simply by indulging their sense of the ridiculous which somebody has described as a combination of sound moral judgment and good humor. And there has been much occurring in this community that appeals to a well developed sense of the ridiculous; much that has been inspired by the gentlemen who are vociferously behind the prosecution and encouragingly behind the labor unions. They say they are not behind the labor unions. Rudolph Spreckels says so. I found myself wavering in my confidence in Mr. Spreckels the other day when I read that he was complaining of the inflammatory statements made by Patrick Calhoun through the press which were calculated to constrain the gentle union men to break the peace. As I have never read an inflammatory statement made by Calhoun I marveled at the Spreckels complaint. But after thinking it over I concluded that Mr. Spreckels had inadvertently confounded Calhoun and Cornelius. For whereas Calhoun has been merely insisting on his rights as an American citizen Cornelius has been indulging in coarse, vulgar abuse of the thousands of people who ride in street cars. It has seemed to me that his statements were designed to incite the lawless; that they were intended to create the impression among brick-throwers that it was not a crime to assault anybody that would ride in a street car. It is highly improbable that Mr. Spreckels would deliberately give color to Calhoun's charge that the graft prosecution was being conducted in the interest of the strikers for the purpose of injuring the United Railroads. The more color that can be given to that charge the more sympathy will Calhoun have. Of the fact that he has already gained the sympathy of rebellious instincts one may obtain abundant proof by a little interrogation. Men that some months ago were inveighing against him most bitterly and as he deserved for stringing this city with deadly trolley wires, and who hoped that he would be sent to the penitentiary if it were shown that he bribed our city officials are now praising him for his fight against rapacious unionism. They are not yet clamoring for his canonization, but they look to him to turn a jostling anarchy into an ordered productivity, and they argue that such a consummation would be hardly less deserving of popular acclaim than the success of Rudolph Spreckels in his campaign against graft. When it was said the other day that he had been scheming for a lock-out and that Macarthur, Furuseth and Michael Casey were great heroes since they saved us from a sympathetic strike, it was remarkable how many people there were who failed to appreciate the heroism of that pacific trio. If Calhoun favors a lock-out he is not alone in that sentiment. And singular as it may appear there are many people who are so weary of being under the hoofs of organized labor, and so profoundly affected by the misery of the city they love that they would favor a lock-out though it meant bankruptcy, believing that it would bring surcease of torments quite as painful as the humiliation to which we were reduced by our corrupt officials.

"Come Through, Abe"

I learn from the Call of Friday of last week that Ruef's original confession was not all that the prosecution desired. According to the Call his confession was not complete, and it was to his interest to "come through" with the information that was wanted because all the big magnates were ready to confess without reservation, and the cases against Ruef had been made so strong that his trial would be a mere formality. The Call's article read as though it were authoritative, as though, in fact, it might have been inspired by Mr. Heney, for the intentions of the prosecution were elaborately set forth, as for instance: "It is not the desire of the prosecution, so far as known, to mete out extraordinary punishment to Ruef, but it is said that the boss has all but forfeited his chances of leniency." In all probability when Ruef read the Call that day he sent a hurry-call for Detective Burns, and in all probability Burns was expecting it. The most significant statement in the whole article was one to the effect that when Ruef went before the grand jury he asked for but one concession: that no record be kept of his testimony; he wanted no record of his own shame. Why should Ruef have asked for such a concession? He knows that a record must be kept of his testimony when he goes into court; that there is no way of preventing a record of his shame. As a lawyer he knows these things. So it is highly incredible that he made such a request. But if, as the Call says, no record was kept then Ruef will have no difficulty in making a confession in a way that will insure leniency.

The Doors Are Open for Schmitz

In another article, the other day, the Call said that Schmitz was not under surveillance, and that if he attempted to get away nobody would stop him. If such is the attitude of the prosecution then one might infer that it was not very sanguine of the Mayor's conviction. But the ways of the prosecution are inscrutable. And it must be admitted that for achieving results they are not at all bad. Detective Burns started out at the instance of Mr. Spreckels to put an end to the carnival of graft, and in that he has been successful. Even though nobody goes to jail and the desired moral effect is lost, the city at any rate will have been redeemed from the looters. And the success that has been achieved has been almost entirely due to Burns's genius for "fourflushing." Up to the time that Loneragan was trapped the prosecution was in possession of no evidence of any value, but Burns and Heney pretended to have enough information on hand to send every boodler in town to jail. With the confession of Ruef it was supposed that they would have no difficulty in convicting Schmitz, but now they are reported to be willing to let him run away. And meanwhile Schmitz is presenting a remarkable front. He told a friend the other day, when questioned in reference to the rumor that he intended to resign, that he wouldn't resign because of the inference that might be drawn. "I wouldn't resign," he said, "if they agreed to dismiss every charge that has been made against me."

The Real Thing in Justice

Obviously Judge Dunne has determined that Mayor Schmitz shall be given the benefit of no subtle technicality by which he might wriggle through the meshes of the law. Judge Dunne will see that justice is meted out in strict accordance with a stern uncompromising and outraged public opinion. He will be as fair and impartial as it is possible for a man of his breadth of view to be. He is probably not an ideal jurist from the standpoint of the transgressor; his virtues are most easily appreciated by special counsel for the prosecution whose hired talents are consecrated to the holy task of rendering escape impossible to a defendant. Judge Dunne will make a record for himself in the Schmitz case, a record that will appeal to every honest and enlightened citizen who has been emancipated from the effeminate and fatuous tradition that every accused man should be presumed to be innocent until his guilt has been established in accordance with the forms of law. Judge Dunne being a stickler for the forms of law, Mayor Schmitz will have no reason to complain that those forms have been overlooked. He will get all that the forms entitle him to and perhaps a little more, as he deserves. It all depends on just how much he deserves and that Judge Dunne, the inflexible, will endeavor to find out. Knowing that we may go to beds o' nights feeling absolutely certain that Judge Dunne is not to be swerved from what he conceives to be the straight and narrow line of his duty, I have naught to suggest save that it might be well to repress the attorneys for the prosecution, since they represent the State and since the Supreme Court which isn't at all times and under all circumstances to be influenced by public clamor, has been known to set aside a verdict of guilty on account of conduct on the part of the public prosecutor which might have prejudiced the jury. Judge Dunne must discipline special counsel; not harshly but gently. He must restrain them in their bursts of righteous enthusiasm; and they will appreciate his sage monitions, for they know the importance of keeping within certain boundaries, and appearing to give the defendant fair play. I want to see Schmitz convicted. I want to see Schmitz go to jail. And therefore I would anticipate the wanton interference of our Supreme Court, a tribunal which sometimes diverts the stream of justice from the direction given to it by the able and impartial jurist who is trying our Mayor. Far be it from me to give Judge Dunne the impression that I would animadvert on his irreproachable conduct as the agent of the blind goddess. It is for me merely to caution politely and deferentially in the interest of the law which Judge Dunne is administering in a way that makes it obvious

Automobile

You hear many people say that an automobile is a nice thing to have and all that, but costs too much to keep it up.

Maybe that's true—in many cases. But cost of upkeep depends largely on the kind of car.

We have had an opportunity to obtain definite data as to the Cost of Maintaining a Single-Cylinder Cadillac.

147 owners residing in almost every State who have kept accounts of their expenses covering gasoline, oil and repairs have made affidavits which we have on file, showing that their repairs (not including tires) have averaged

Less than $2.50 Per Month.

Their cars have been driven from one to four seasons, and as high as 30,000 miles.

The affidavits also show that the averages obtained have been about

19 Miles Per Gallon of Gasoline,

an average of less than one and one-third cents per mile per car or, on the basis of four passengers each, less than

One-third of a Cent Per Mile Per Passenger.

Remember these are not a few special cases, but averages of 147 owners. Furthermore, these records are not of automobiles in general, but single-cylinder CADILLACS only.

Most any make of automobile can show a good performance sometimes, but what interests you is what a car will do "as a rule."

When a dealer makes claims as to low cost of operating the cars he sells, ask him to prove them. We can prove ours.

There are over 15,000 single-cylinder Cadillacs "making good" all over the world.

Single-cylinder Cadillacs truly afford all there is in motoring—except the troubles.

Dealers are always glad to demonstrate.

even to the most obtuse layman that the pee-pul's side of the case is not to be disadvantaged though the heavens fall. I caution because I have had some misgivings. I read the other day that Prosecutor Heney characterized something that Attorney Barrett said as false and that Attorney Barrett, the superior nimbleness of whose wit has been vindicated in more than one contest in repartee with the inflammatory Heney, fired back a retort that was strictly responsive; all this I read, and also that Judge Dunne ignoring Heney's conduct threatened Barrett with punishment for contempt. Judge Dunne should remember the case of Samuel Shortridge. He should remember that there is a court higher up, a loathsome tribunal, perhaps, but it is there. There's no use kicking against the pricks.

In the Limelight of Graft

With graft discussions filling every household and graft cases choking the court calendars, with banks and security companies gathering money to loan on graft bonds and graft news filling the whole pages of the local prints, with our coming artists turning out graft cartoons for the dead walls of the city and the theatres putting on the latest up-to-date graft plays, with the ministers hurling anathemas at graft in all its forms and Heney delivering lectures on graft at both universities, with both universities sending its students on government to the city to study graft among the arch grafters and the correspondents of the biggest Eastern magazines and papers among us to depict the city as the home of graft and with more graft revelations promised by the Grand Jury surely San Francisco may be said to be experiencing the very golden era of graft. In the eyes of the curious world the great Jamestown Exposition in the East, showing how our hungry forefathers landed in this country in the 1600's and how they proceeded to develop its resources, cuts but a small figure while San Francisco in the West is exhibiting the spectacle of how their descendants in the 1900's have developed the art of cutting up the profits.

But the most pregnant sign of change is already here. The lawyers have entered the scene. Never since the happy day when Fortune flung the golden apple of the Blythe case before the hard grinding local bar has there been such alluring opportunities for fame and fortune. The Blythe case laid the foundation of big bank accounts with numbers of attorneys and the graft cases promise to have a much wider influence for starting law libraries in edition de luxe bindings. The first call to the defense this week has certainly formed a notable gathering both of the old and the new guard: Judge Garber, Garrett McEnerney, D. M. Delmas, Jas. H. Budd, Joseph C. Campbell, Harry T. Creswell, W. H. Metson, L. M. Hoefler, John J. Barrett, T. C. Coogan, A. A. Moore, Frank Drew, C. A. Fairall, W. P. Humphrey, James C. #### Burns at His Best

San Francisco's much bedraggled and ragged grafter's cloak has attracted the hackney riding "chief among ye taking notes, and faith, he'll prent it." Sure he will, with copious notes, sketches, photographs, cartoons and effects warranted to add verisimilitude to the situation. Detective Burns was cornered by a cordon of Eastern writers in the foyer of the Fairmont, last week, and put through one of his own heart rending sweating processes that yielded the delighted Easterners a handsome batch of round unvarnished tales. S. S. McClure of magazine fame led the attack and George Kennan, Lincoln Steffens, Samuel E. Blythe and others of lesser note joined in the hold-up. Our own Jimmie Hopper arrived from Carmel just in time to assist McClure to land a study on the philosophy of graft. As for color and picturesque background, Confessor Burns gave them enough color to paint graft in rainbow colors all over the publications they represent and he took them on an hour's auto spin through the highways and byways of graft where they were afforded every opportunity to cut whole slabs of background out of the altorelievo atmosphere. If they fail to turn out a picture of San Francisco graft that will rank as the classiest of classics it is because Ruef has made another confession in the meantime and again has completely turned the graft world topsy-turvy.

The Labor Problem, East and West.

Incidentally, while here, Mr. McClure cast a philosophic eye over the labor situation. From his personal viewpoint he regards the liquor and gambling question in their relation to the police and the labor question as the two leading problems this country must face. The labor problem, according to his idea, differs materially in the East and in the West. He sets the Missouri river as the dividing line. The Eastern labor wing, as captained by John Mitchell, is moved by ideas that differ greatly from those dominating the Western wing. The key note in the Western propaganda is socialism and the indefinite ideas it represents. Many of its members are zealots in their attempts to force their connections upon the community. The result has been the wild and lawless scenes in Colorado, Idaho, Nevada and other Western states. From the magazine viewpoint such radical outbursts are handled simply in their relation to the law—the same law that is meant to curb alike the predatory corporation and the irresponsible labor faction.

History of the Strike

So many and so conflicting have been the statements published about the differences that led to the street car strike and the negotiations that proved futile that I have taken the pains to learn the facts in the matter. When President Calhoun of the United Railroads first agreed with President Mahon of the National Association to recognize the local union it was upon Mahon's representation that one of the objects of the association was to maintain industrial peace through arbitration. Yet in August of last year the carmen struck on the day of Calhoun's arrival here from the East without even proposing arbitration—a procedure forbidden by the general laws of the association. In spite of this violation of the agreement Calhoun offered to recognize the union and take the men back to work pending arbitration. We all remember the long and sometimes stormy session of the arbitration board. The result was that the men were given a twenty-two and a half per cent increase in wages. This increase applied to the time the men worked while the negotiations were on. Shortly after receiving this back pay the men determined to strike again, on May 1, the date at which their agreement with the United Railroads terminated. Calhoun, returning to New York from Europe on March 18, immediately sought an interview with Mahon. Cornelius was with him. Calhoun went to Detroit to see Mahon, having been told that he would be there. Mahon did not appear. Calhoun had a meeting with the executive committee of the Association, Cornelius being present. Cornelius professed utter ignorance of the intentions of the carmen. Calhoun told the executive committee that he would continue to pay the wages fixed by the arbitration board, and that if the men struck he would never recognize the union again. No satisfaction could be obtained at this meeting, and Cornelius was so evidently prejudiced that Calhoun gave up his plans for returning to New York and came immediately to this city.

The Final Conference

When the conference committee of the Carmen's Union called on Calhoun after his arrival here he offered to continue to pay for six or twelve months the rate fixed by the Board of Arbitration. The car men refused and demanded eight hours and three dollars—the demand which had already been arbitrated and denied. On the night when the strike vote was taken Calhoun, Mr. Holbrook, of his company, Cornelius, the conference committee of the Carmen's Union and Mayor Schmitz met in the Mayor's office. As reports of other meetings of a similar character had been garbled, Calhoun had the proceedings reported by a stenographer. After some discussion, Calhoun offered to make a new start. If the carmen were not satisfied, he said, he would again submit to a board of arbitration the carmen's demands for eight hours and a flat wage of three dollars. The conference committee did not accept this offer made by the car company in the interests of industrial peace, but insisted on its demand and as a result the union struck. At this meeting, after Calhoun's offer of arbitration had been refused, he told the conference committee that a strike meant the permanent severance of the relations between the car company and the union. The strike was called with full knowledge, among the leaders, of this fact.

Shifty Cornelius

By taking the action it did the union forfeited the support of the National Union, but that support has not been withdrawn. The strike was ordered without the authority of the National Association. At the meeting at which the vote to strike was taken Cornelius was asked if the National Association approved the strike. He avoided a direct answer—the method he pursued at that memorable meeting in regard to nearly every question asked him. He answered that the Association approved the demands of the carmen. Under the general laws of the Association an approval of demands does not constitute authority to strike. Cornelius knew this. The majority of the men who voted for the strike did not. Moreover, as I have pointed out before, a local union is forbidden to strike without first offering arbitration. This union not only failed to make such an offer but refused the offer of arbitration made by Calhoun. It seems to me, in view of these facts, that the union has not a leg to stand on in the present controversy. Within a year it has twice struck in open and wanton violation of the laws that govern it. It has once refused arbitration and on another occasion has refused to abide by the decision of a board of arbitration. It has forfeited all claims that it had upon either the United Railroads or the National Association, which latter body, however, continues to recognize it.

Giving the Goldfield Remedy

The indications are that local wholesale merchants are applying the same drastic medicine on the local labor troubles that was so successfully used in the recent Goldfield disturbances; namely, threatening with boycott those weak kneed retailers who are bullied into boycotting strike breakers by the autocratic unions. Certain Fillmore street butchers and bakers, notably those in the vicinity of the car barns, refused to sell meat and bread not only to the strike breakers but even to customers who were reported by union sympathizers to have been seen riding on the street cars. This action of the retailers was reported to a certain wholesalers' committee. This committee promptly notified the wholesale butchers and the Flour Millers' Association of the situation and they in turn sent word to the bakers and butchers that their flour and meat supply would be cut off at once if they did not promptly continue to sell to all customers without favor. To refuse meant business ruin. Just now strike breakers and union customers look alike to them and the ban is off.

Bracing Up Spineless Merchants

Weak kneed proprietors of stores who have tipped their clerks not to be seen riding on the cars have also received curt notices to change such instructions else they will find it difficult in the future to fill orders for goods among the jobbers. It's the same brand of boycott medicine that is being handed out by the unions themselves only the reorganized and now thoroughly aroused wholesalers are giving it from the other end of the bottle. It brought about a successful cure of the anarchistic brand of labor troubles in Goldfield and in every other city where the wholesalers hang together. There is no reason why it shouldn't be just as successful here.

"The Spread of San Francisco"

It is refreshing these graft, muck-raking days to open the pages of a magazine whose editor is convinced that there are many people in the world that do not insist on being supplied at every turn of the road with news of corruption in trade and in politics and of the stern activities of patriotic self-constituted instruments of retribution. One may read the June Sunset from cover to cover without being once reminded that Mr. Heney is engaged in his favorite pastime. And yet Sunset affords a wondrous deal of edification and instruction. Many of its pages are devoted to revelations respecting the spread of San Francisco. It appears that despite industrial strife and the driving of reluctant men out of employment by infamous agitators the city is growing rapidly. Rufus Steele calls attention to the fact that the city is now expanding down the peninsula and in a very interesting illustrated article he tells all about the latest engineering feats of the Southern Pacific Company by which San Francisco has been rendered accessible within an hour to residents of San Jose. I learn from this article that at South San Francisco or South City as it is now called which will be the first stop on the cut-off there are unmistakable evidences of activity in anticipation of new and rapid train service. Some time ago a firm purchased four hundred acres comprising two large valleys near South City and has been selling off town lots to wage-earners. This tract has already a population of over five thousand with all the facilities of a modern city. There are several large plants employing two thousand men there, and the American Smelting Company is constructing one of the most extensive establishments of its kind in the world at a cost of $5,000,000. A deep water harbor is in course of construction that will provide docking facilities for ocean-going steamers. Within three months trains will be in operation over the cut-off which, says Mr. Steele, as a time-saver is in a class with the Ogden-Lucien cut-off across Great Salt Lake.

Finance as Insiders View It

The other morning a group of well known men on 'Change were discussing the retirement of John W. Gates from Wall street and the spectacular figure such daring speculators cut in the dazzling financial life of the nation. Their comments to several laymen present threw an entirely new light on the wizards who flit across the world's financial horizon. According to their views, from the days of Daniel Drew down some great man or men have dominated the great field of American speculation. Jay Gould, Villard, Woerishoffer, Lawson and our own Jim Keene are specimens, but their kind are not to be ranked in the same class with the Harrimans, Morgans, Vanderbilts, Hills and Schiffs. Why? Because the latter are constructive financiers, their work is creative and lasting; they build railroads and organize industries and convert deserts into grain fields. No fledgling financier present deigned to notice a query flung into the discussion regarding "undigested securities." In contrast to the constructive financiers are the giant speculators, men of the Jim Keene type endowed with a remarkable capacity for market mastership. But the feats of the wizards in this line appeal only to the galleries, according to students of high finance. Gates is regarded by them simply as a skilful manipulator, a protean artist whose feats in stock juggling astound timid speculators and dazzle only the ignorant public. No man of financial judgment is deceived by them. It is because of this blind admiration and sheer ignorance of financial laws on the part of the public that the lambs among them are led to the regular shearings and slaughter by the arch manipulators of the country. And that is why those who have the money madness, the lost souls with the speculative fever burning up their financial life, follow such leaders blindly. By them Gates will be missed from the investment arena far more than Morgan.

Considering the Severn

I hear that Emil Bailly and Victor Reiter are to lease the now closed Severn and reopen it "after the strike" as a sumptuous dining place. M. Bailly is the St. Regis chef that the Laws brought out here from New York to open the Fairmont. He made a great record for himself in the brief week he reigned before turning over the culinary department he organized to the incoming Palace people. Victor Reiter was the maitre d'hotel under the same management. No man in his position is better known and better liked among the society people of San Francisco.

Her European Triumphs

Mrs. Edward Moore Robinson is, I hear, simply electrifying Europe with her beauty and charm of manner. Paris has long been at her feet, but her biggest social triumph was at Vienna, where she was made much of by what is considered one of the most exclusive of courts. Mrs. Robinson never penetrated the inner sanctuary of New York's 400 but she is thought to have done very well socially as not a few of Mrs. Fish's set asked her to dine not only in Newport but in New York. After these European triumphs she will be even more in favor. Mrs. Robinson's success I am told is largely due to her amiability. She never indulges in unpleasant criticism and therefore never makes enemies.

The Parrotts to Leave Us

All the members of the Parrott family will soon be in Europe and it will be a long time before they again contribute to the gayeties of San Francisco society. The family home in San Mateo will be deserted for more than a year, and the famous Baywood Stud will soon be an institution of the past, for Jack Parrott has decided to abandon that great breeding farm from which has come some of the highest class hackneys in the country. This farm has long been a fad with Jack Parrott, and I have been told that it was excelled by none in the country.

An Auto Party

In order to keep the various cliques and sets properly pigeonholed in the mind one should study a memory system. Then one could get a clue in some such way—"something like music, no it's not an automobile horn but that's nearer. A violin, a fife, a piano, a trombone, a drum—a drum! That's it! Sara Drum has taken the Jim Follises and the Latham McMullins motoring to Santa Barbara. When Mrs. McMullin was Mollie Thomas she was "knit to fit" the set dominated by Helen Hopkins and her sisters. But of late she has affiliated with the clique which consists of Mrs. Jim Follis, Miss Ethel Tompkins, Miss Sara Drum and one or two others who are on the outskirts of this little set.

Sara Drum is one of the few society women who would attempt to make the run to Santa Barbara without an expert driver at the wheel. A great many young women can talk the motor patter and a few drive fairly well but Miss Drum really runs a machine as confidently as any mahout.

There is one person in San Francisco who does not regret the invertebrate condition of the social spine and that is Captain Andrew Rowan who would rather carry another "message to Garcia" than risk the rapid fire entertaining which was aimed for his pleasure when his engagement to Mrs. Josephine de Greayer was announced two years ago. Owing to the difficulties of transportation a great many of the affairs planned in honor of the Rowans, who arrived on the transport Thomas, have been filed for future reference. They are at the Merrill home.

I hear that Mrs. John Merrill Jr. is one of the society women who was threatened because she rode on the non-union manned cars. A union sympathizer followed her from the car to the very door of her home trying to intimidate her with violent abuse of wealthy women who patronize the cars.

A Wedding Bulletin

There has been a change, I hear, in the plans for the wedding of Miss Frances Coon and Oliver Kehrlein. Miss Roma Paxton who was to have been bridesmaid is not to act in that capacity. The wherefore of this change has not been revealed to me, but I am told that social circles in which people are more interested in tittle-tattle respecting such matters than they are in affairs of vital interest, are much agitated by the news that Miss Paxton is not to be the bridesmaid at the wedding.

Landfield May Forswear Berkeley

A friend who met "Jerry" Landfield and his Russian bride in Paris writes me that "Madame Landfield" as she is called over there is a very fascinating young woman but has absolutely no claim to the beauty with which newspapers have endowed her. She speaks a quaint but fluent English with an accent reminiscent of Modjeskas. Her ideas of what life would mean in a university town are very well formed and contrary to current report they evidently have no intention of casting their life lines in Berkeley. In the French-American colony, Madame Landfield is credited with having a snug little fortune that will embroider their lot in a neat, if not gaudy pattern. "Jerry" Landfield did the society "stunt" even while he was at Berkeley and the perquisites of pink tea training are not lost in foreign drawing rooms. They have been entertained in the most exclusive Paris and London drawing rooms and of course their position in St. Petersburg, where they will spend the winter is gilt edgeski. The same informant tells me that Professor Landfield can already swallow the "ski's" and "offs" of the Russian language and cough them out again with a dexterity that would do credit to any linguist..

Mr. and Mrs. Craig will use their Model "M" Winton, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Gibson will use their Model "C" Winton and, in fact, it will be exclusively a Winton party.

The Baywood Stud

That the Baywood Stud will cease to breed and be is deplored by all lovers of the fashionable Cob. There have been many sales of harness horses held in San Francisco during the past ten years, but it is a question if ever such a collection of high class, high stepping, show ring carriage horses as these now consigned to the auction at Fred H. Chase & Co.'s Valencia street horse sales Pavilion on June the 10th were ever presented to the buying public in any sales ring in the United States.

When it became a law that all docked horses in the state must be registered, the Baywood Stud, never behind in anything, complied at once with this ruling, and now, at this dispersal, registered, docked hackneys are to be had directly from first hands.

This breeding establishment has no second handed horses to offer. The important feature of this sale is, that this Stud never allowed an overstock of horses to accumulate, but from time to time sold its output, always retaining its best, as a matter of course, but now, at this closing out sale everything goes.

The cream of careful breeding, the type of form, the best actors, the prize winners and all go for the "High Dollar" at this sale. Never again probably in the history of California will such a collection of prize winning, docked and high acting long tailed horses be offered at public auction.

Dodging the Problem

Otis Skinner's place on the American stage is so conspicuously that of a brilliant and conscientious artist with dramatic ideals of a seriousness belonging to the good old fashion that it is no disparagement of his latest achievement to turn from the actor to the play. Through the clear medium of his interpretation "The Duel" which has been adequately translated from the French of Henri Lavedan, is seen to be an intensely interesting presentation of a problem that is as old as Christianity and as new as the latest atheistic cult. Professedly a problem play the merits of "The Duel" must be determined by its approximation to a solution of the problem with which its author grapples. So considered Henri Lavedan's play must be denied a large measure of commendation. To the stagecraft exhibited by this Frenchman no important technical objection can be raised, but issue may justly be taken with his handling of a theme admittedly difficult and delicate. "The Duel" is fought by two brothers; one has passed through dissipation to the priesthood, the other through piety to atheism; the priest, an "aristocrat of religious emotions," loving God with a "pagan love," is yet a serious worker in a squalid Parisian parish while the atheist's life has been given to medicine as a famous alienist and specialist in children's diseases. When it is stated that an aggressive hatred of religion on one side and a priestly horror of atheism on the other have kept the brothers apart for ten years and that their paths finally cross in a contest over the soul of a woman who flies from her reciprocated love of the atheist to the consolation of the priest's confessional, carrying always the chain of a marriage that has bound her to a hopelessly diseased and degenerate husband, it will be seen that here is a dramatic conflict to daunt even the most experienced playwright. It is the duel of deism and atheism fought by two opponents neither of whom may adequately appreciate the strength and truth of the other's weapon; a struggle between an enlightened and cultured hedonism insisting that the right to personal happiness is paramount and an enlightened and cultured mysticism inculcating the necessity of sacrifice; and it is complicated by the struggles of the woman between the forward impulse of her love and the backward pull of her religion. Merciless logic can deduce only two possible outcomes for this conflict, victory for religion and the priest or victory for the atheist and love; any other trifles with the importance of the problem or compromises with it. Lavedan has weakly compromised with his situation, making marriage with the atheist possible by the convenient dying of the degenerate husband. Here is an exaggeration of the complacency of fate which leaves the serious student of the problem totally unsatisfied. What might have been a straightforward attempt at solution loses all finality in a peal of wedding bells. It looks as though Lavedan lacked the courage of his climax, actually fearing to carry his characters to either of the two inevitable endings. After holding the scales remorselessly for two acts between renunciation and surrender he has weakly cast them from their fulcrum. So the problem is not solved in "The Duel" and a play which has the germ of greatness must depend for praise on the strength of its individual situations. Lavedan does not challenge comparison with Rostand and cannot be ranked with other French playwrights of today until he learns their trick of following a problem to a definite, even if unacceptable, solution.

—Edward F. O'Day.

Goodwin's Lust for Gold

Ashton Stevens scored a very important scoop last Sunday when he gave publicity to Nat Goodwin's intention to retire from the stage. With Nat Goodwin in retirement the stage will be bereft of one of its most interesting personalities, and theatregoers will sincerely mourn the loss of the exuberant companionship of one of the most wholesome comedians, an actor who has towered to an eminence, whose career has been marked by dazzling brilliance that eclipsed most of his contemporaries. But it is a critic's privilege to doubt an actor when he talks of abandoning his profession. Actors are very whimsical. They easily despond, and in their gloomy moods they invariably meditate on the more lucrative triumphs to which they might have confidently aspired had they given rein to their exceptional genius in other fields. Nat Goodwin, greatest of prophylactics against the blues, is addicted to them. Things have not been coming his way of late, and all because the playsmiths, with a wearisome regularity, have been supplying him with comedies that defied his talents in their best form. Besides he has been more successful in speculation than in histrionics, and he imagines that the world is his should he be disposed to embrace it. So he is going after the precious metal in the bowels of the earth, but let us hope that he will soon subdue his febrile passion for gold and return to his art. We shall miss him in the interim more than he appears to miss the beautiful Maxine—if we may rely on the subtle hints of the insinuating Stevens. Meanwhile Maxine is doing nicely, thank you, in Lunnon. She has been doing nicely ever since she severed professional relations with Nat, and that is a curious phenomenon. Before Goodwin snatched her from the burning of a third rate company the public was bovinely indifferent to her charms of person and glitter of talent, but as soon as she was converted from the nebulous state of a provincial stock actress into an electric lighted star she became an object of great interest, and after a season or two with her husband she felt able to radiate alone. Her success has been continuous while that of her lonely husband has been confined to Wall street on occasions. Perhaps if they were to travel in double harness again history would repeat itself. But unfortunately Maxine is in love with Lunnon and Nat is passionately fond of—Goldfield. Another case of an artist divorcing himself from his muse to take up with that miserable jade, lucre.

Graft Drama

The New Alcazar Theatre has caught the public ear with "The Undertow," a drama that mirrors one of the most interesting phases of contemporary life. "The Undertow" is a dramatization of graft, and it has sufficient of the element of universality to render it realistic to almost any community in this favored land. In other words it typifies modern graft methods which are the same in Pennsylvania and Ohio as they are in California. Wherever there is a graft situation "The Undertow" matches it. The play is not good drama as understood by the higher critics but for the people who don't bother themselves about technique or the eternal unities, but who just want to be diverted, to feel that they can see through the plot and appreciate the emotions of the characters irrespective of the probability of those characters ever having been met with beyond the domain of fiction, it is to borrow from the figurative vernacular, all wool and a yard wide. It has made such a hit that it will run for at least another week. Newspapermen have enthused over the play because it pretty accurately depicts the life of the local room. And all other patrons have enthused over the play because the actors have made up to look like some real figures in our own pet graft drama. "The Undertow" will be followed by that perennial favorite "Old Heidelberg."

Viola Allen in "Twelfth Night"

Viola Allen, one of the most popular of American stars, is to present Shakespeare's comedy "Twelfth Night" at the Van Ness Theatre during the coming week with matinee on Wednesday. Miss Allen will appear as Viola. Miss Allen was last seen here as Dolores in F. Marion Crawford's romance, "In the Palace of the King." At the Saturday matinee Miss Allen will appear in a special bill made up of acts from four classics. She will appear as Rosalind in the wooing scene in "As You Like It," as Lady Teazle in the screen scene from "The School for Scandal," as Juliet in the balcony scene from "Romeo and Juliet," and Portia in the trial scene from "The Merchant of Venice."

Haydn to Join Calve

Carl Haydn, the sweet-voiced tenor from Austria, who joined the American Opera Company in this city and is now in Portland with that troupe of singers, has been engaged to sing in concert with Calve on her next tour. He will travel with her around the world. Haydn is a fine artist who has had the advantage of fine training in the conservatory of Vienna. He is a handsome young fellow with a voice of beautiful quality.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The programme at the Orpheum for the week beginning this Sunday matinee will be headed by the Finneys, James and Elsie, champion swimmers of the world. They swim, eat and drink under water in a large tank with glass sides. Mr. Finney stays under water for over two minutes, and performs some wonderful feats. Les Kinners Moulin, French Novelty artists, will make their first appearance in this city. They balance everything from a spoon to a bicycle with the feminine member of the team on the wheel. Among other newcomers are Emerson and Baldwin, two remarkably clever and diverting comedy jugglers whose act is perhaps hard to classify. They prefer to call it a display of dexterity and dementia which being interpreted means that it is conceived for laughing purposes only. James J. Morton, the droll dispenser of inanity, will continue to convulse his audiences with laughter. It will be the last week of the Four Fords, the Sutcliffe Novelty Troupe of acrobats, pipers and dancers, Werden and Gladdish and also of Valerie Bergere who will say good-bye in a dramatic incident by the veteran actor Dodson L. Mitchell, entitled "The Red Thief." It will be its premier on any stage and those who have witnessed its rehearsal are sanguine of its success and believe that in the title role, which is that of a feminine burglar and safe cracker, Miss Bergere will present another of those life portraits in the creation of which she has been so felicitous. New Orpheum Motion Pictures will terminate what promises to be a delightful entertainment.

Idora Park

"The Wedding Day," a charming opera by Julian Edwards, the composer of "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," will be the offering at Idora Park commencing Monday night, June 3. The Idora Opera Company is now the largest and most complete light opera organization in America and it will well repay all who care for that class of entertainment to take a little journey to this beautiful resort. The organization includes the cream of the talent of four of the leading Eastern Circuits. This will be the first appearance of the performers in this territory. Owing to the length of the list of acts there will be no intermission and the curtain will rise at eight o'clock sharp.

The Prices are to be 25c, 50c and 75c.

"Leah Kleschna"

The Frawley Company opens at the Novelty Theatre on Monday, June 10th, presenting "Leah Kleschna." Among the plays to be staged is Bernard Shaw's "You Never Can Tell."

Lives of Irving

Mr. H. B. Irving and his brother Laurence are to publish a biography of the late Sir Henry Irving. No less than six books have been written about Sir Henry since his death, and there are at least two others to follow—one by Austin Brereton and another by Mr. Joseph Hatton. The final life by the sons will not be published for several years, and for satisfactory reasons. It promises to be an important book, for both sons have demonstrated that they have literary ability.

One of the big productions of the coming Frawley season will be "A Lady of Quality."

The advance sale of seats for the production of "Leah Kleschna" at the Novelty Theatre, begins next Thursday morning.

No less than four great pianists will visit the Coast next season. Paderewski, Hoffmann, Carreno and Harold Bauer.

The Green Kitten

"But it will be the death of him," cried one.

"Paint the poor beast—what a thing to say!"

"What! paint a live animal, Zazubrina! You deserve a hiding!"

"I call it a devilish good joke," cried a little, broad-shouldered man with a fiery-red beard, enthusiastically.

Zazubrina already held the kitten in his hands, and went with it towards the pail of paint, and then Zazubrina began singing:

"Look, my brothers! look at that!

See me paint the ginger cat!

Paint him well, and paint him green,

And then we'll dance upon the scene."

There was a burst of laughter, and holding their sides, the prisoners made a way in their midst, and I saw quite plainly how Zazubrina, seizing the kitten by the tail, flung it into the pail, and then fell a singing and dancing:

"Stop that mewling! cease to squall!

Would you your godfather maul?

Peals of laughter!

"Oh, crooked-bellied Judas!" piped one squeaky voice.

"Alas, Batyushka!" groaned another.

They were stifled, suffocated with laughter. Laughter twisted the bodies of these people, bent them double, vibrated and gurgled in the air—a mighty, devil-may-care laughter, growing louder continually, and reaching the very confines of hysteria. Smiling faces, in white kerchiefs, looked down from the windows of the women's quarters into the yard. The Inspector, squeezing his back to the wall, poked out his brawny body, and, holding it with both hands, discharged his thick, bass, overpowering laugh in regular salvos.

The joke scattered the folks in all directions around the pail. Performing astounding antics with his legs, Zazubrina danced with all his might, singing by way of accompaniment:

"Ah, life is a merry thing,

As the grey cat knew, I ween;

And her son, the ginger kitten,

Now lives in a world all green."

"Yes, that it will, deuce take you," cried the man with the fiery-red beard.

But Zazubrina could not contain himself. Around him roared the senseless laughter of all these grey people, and Zazubrina knew that he, and he alone, was the occasion of all their laughter. In all his gestures, in every grimace of his mobile comic face, this consciousness manifestly proclaimed itself, and his whole body twitched with the enjoyment of his triumph. He had already seized the kitten by the head, and wiping from its fur the superfluous paint, with the ecstasy of the artist conscious of his victory over the mob, never ceased dancing and improvising:

"My dear little brothers,

In the calendar let us look,

Here's a kitten to be christened,

And no name for it in the book."

Everything laughed around the mob of prisoners, intoxicated by this senseless mirth. The sun laughed upon the panes of glass in the iron-grated windows.

The blue sky smiled down upon the courtyard of the prison, and even its dirty old walls seemed to be smiling with the smile of beings who feel obliged to stifle all mirth, however it may run riot within them. From behind the gratings of the windows of the women's department the faces of women looked down upon the yard, they also laughed, and their teeth glistened in the sun. Everything around was transformed, as it were, threw off its dull, grey tone, so full of anguish and weariness, and awoke to merriment, impregnated with that purifying laughter which, like the sun, made the very dirt look more decent.

Placing the green kitten on the grass, little islets of which, springing up between the stones, variegated the prison-yard, Zazubrina, excited, well-nigh blown, and covered with sweat, still continued his wild dance.

But the laughter had already died away. He was overdoing it, very much overdoing it. The people were getting tired of him. Someone, here and there, still shrieked hysterically; a few continued to laugh, but already there were pauses. At last there were moments when the silence was general, save for the singing, dancing Zazubrina, and the kitten which mewed softly and piteously as it lay on the grass. It was scarcely distinguishable from the grass in color, and, no doubt, because the paint had blinded it and hampered its movements, the poor slippery, big-headed creature senselessly tottered on his trembling paws, standing still as if glued to the grass, and all the while it kept on mewing, Zazubrina commented on the movements of the kitten as follows:

"Look ye, Christian people, look,
The green cat seeks a private nook,
The wholesome ginger-colored puss
To find a place in vain makes fuss."

"Very clever, no doubt, you hound," said a red-haired lad.

The public regarded its artist with satiated eyes.

"How it mews!" observed the hobbledehoy prisoner, twisting his head in the direction of the kitten, and he looked at his comrades. They regarded the kitten in silence.

"Do you think he'll be green all his life long?" asked the lad.

"All his life long, indeed!—how long do you think he will live, then?" began a tall, grey-bearded prisoner, squatting down beside poor puss; "don't you see he's dying in the sun, his fur is all sticking to him like glue; he'll turn up his toes soon."

The kitten mewed spasmodically, producing a reaction in the sentiments of the prisoners.

"Turn up his toes, eh?" said the hobbledehoy, "suppose we try to wash it off him?"

Nobody answered him. The little green lump writhed at the feet of the rough fellows, a pitiable object of utter helplessness.

"Pooh! I'm all of a muck sweat!" screamed Zazubrina, flinging himself on the ground. Nobody took the slightest notice of him.

The hobbledehoy bent over the kitten and took it up in his arms, but immediately put it on the ground again. "It's all burning hot," he explained.

Then he regarded his comrades, and sorrowfully said:

"Poor puss, look at him! We shall not have our puss much longer. What was the use of killing the poor beast, eh?"

"Wait! I think it's picking up a bit," said the red-haired man.

The shapeless green creature was still writhing on the grass; twenty pairs of eyes were following its movements, and there was not the shadow of a smile in any of them. All were serious, all were silent, all of them were as miserable to look upon as that kitten, just as if it had communicated its suffering to them and they were feeling its pangs.

"Pick up a bit, indeed!" laughed the hobbledehoy sardonically, raising his voice, "very much so! Poor puss has had his day. We all loved him. Why did we torture him so? Let someone put him out of his misery."

"And who was the cause of it all?" shrieked the red-haired prisoner savagely. "Why there he is, with his devilish joke!"

"Come," said Zazubrina soothingly, "didn't the whole lot of you agree to it?"

And he hugged himself as if he were cold.

"The whole lot of us, indeed!" sneered the hobbledehoy, "I like that. You alone are to blame!—yes, you are!"

"Don't you roar, pray, you bull-calf!" meekly suggested Zazubrina.

The grey-headed old man took up the kitten, and after carefully examining it, pronounced his opinion:

"If we were to dip it in kerosene we might wash the paint off."

"If you'll take my advice you'll seize it by the tail and smash it against the wall," said Zazubrina, adding, with a laugh, "that's the simplest way out of it."

"What?" roared the red-haired man, "and if I were to treat you the same way, how would you like it?"

"The devil," screamed the hobbledehoy, and, snatching the kitten out of the old man's hands, he set off running. The old man and a few of the others went after him.

Then Zazubrina remained alone in the midst of a group of people, who glowered upon him with evil and threatening eyes. They seemed to be waiting for something from him.

"Remember, I am not alone, my friends," whined Zazubrina.

"Shut up!" shrieked the red-haired man, looking at the door; "not alone! Who else is there, then?"

"Why the whole lot of you here," piped the jester nervously.

"You hound, you!"

The red-haired man shook his clenched fist in Zazubrina's very teeth. The artist dodged back only to get a violent blow in the nape of the neck.

"My friends . . ." he implored piteously. But his friends had taken note that the two warders were a good way off, and, thronging quickly round their favorite, knocked him off his legs with a few blows. Seen from a little distance the group might easily have been taken for a party engaged in lively conversation. Surrounded and concealed by them, Zazubrina lay there at their feet. Occasionally some dull thuds were audible—they were kicking away at Zazubrina's ribs, kicking deliberately, without the least hurry, each man waiting in turn for a particularly favorable kicking spot to be revealed as his neighbor, after planting his blow, wriggled his foot out of action.

Three minutes or so passed thus. Suddenly the voice of the warder resounded in their ears:

"Now, you devils! what are you about there?"

The prisoners did not leave off the tormenting process immediately. One by one they slowly tore themselves away from Zazubrina, and as each one of them went away, he gave him a parting kick.

When they had all gone, he still remained lying on the ground. He lay on his stomach, and his shoulders were all shivering—no doubt he was weeping—and he kept on coughing and hawking. Presently, very cautiously, as if fearing to fall to pieces, he slowly began to raise himself from the ground, leaning heavily on his left arm, then bending one leg beneath him, and whining like a sick dog, sat down on the ground.

"You're pretending!" screeched the red-haired man in a threatening voice. Then Zazubrina made an effort, and quickly stood on his feet.

Then he tottered to one of the walls of the prison. One arm was pressed close to his breast, with the other he groped his way along. There he now stood, holding on to the wall with his hand, his head hanging down towards the ground. He coughed repeatedly.

I saw how dark drops were falling on to the ground; they also glistened quite plainly on the grey ground of the prison wall.

And so as not to defile with his blood the official place of detention, Zazubrina kept on doing his best to make it drip on the ground, so that not a single drop should fall on the wall.

How they did laugh and jeer at him to be sure . . .

From henceforth the kitten vanished. And Zazubrina no longer had a rival to divide with him the attention of the prisoners.

McGaffey's Essays

"Outdoors" is the modest title chosen under which to group those really enjoyable, brief essays on outdoor topics which Ernest McGaffey has been contributing recently to the St. Louis Mirror, the Chicago Evening Post and the Chicago Times. Unlike most of the modern essayists, Mr. McGaffey has observations to make, something to say. He is no "nature student" in the modern sense, which presupposes a notebook, a satchel of reference volumes, a microscope, a camera, and a host of other impedimenta. "Observation and experience," he says, "will give the power to read the channels and winding aisles of light and air as a book's pages may be scanned, and in this sympathetic perceptiveness the veil of Isis lifts, be it ever so little, and nature's secrets are mistily revealed to the gazer. It is not to be thought of as study, for that presupposes the judging, dissecting, photographing, numbering and theorizing which kills the freshness out of such things," an observation which would receive the hearty endorsement of the great John Burroughs, who long since contending that no one ever learned to love outdoor things by deliberately setting out to "study nature." Mr. McGaffey is no sentimentalist, despite his reputation as a poet. He discourses on hunting and fishing, without harking back to the cruelty of depriving creatures of their existence, and frankly states the proposition that rabbits were made for man, not man for rabbits, while his familiarity with the preparation of panfish and small game bespeaks many a camp meal prepared by his own hands. There is a delicious humor running riot through the pages, intertwined and underlying the soberest facts of information, apparently as unpremeditated as the merry laugh of a child. After a serious dissertation on the proper sort of bait to tempt bass we are told that "Fishing for panfish is very good sport if properly managed. In the first place, a spick-span clean boat should be selected, one that is clinker-built, wide, and not easily upset. Get the prettiest girl possible to go with you. Let her do all the fishing. It will keep you busy attending to baiting the hook, taking off the fish, stringing them, cutting bait and keeping up a running comment of airy persiflage." At the end of a page or two concerning quail, the varieties and habits of the birds, of guns, ammunition and dogs, there is a gentle hint to praise the dog and all he does. "Tell any strangers you happen to meet that he is the greatest dog on earth. The dog will know better, but his owner won't." We have all too few such books as this, but too many pretentious imitations. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

A Wall Street Romance

If anything at all could convince the average man and woman that money is not to be made easily by stock gambling it would be a perusal of Edwin Lefevre's "Sampson Rock of Wall Street." Unlike other books which affect to deal with the manipulation of shares in the stock board, Mr. Lefevre has not given us a history of an enormous fortune made or lost by persistent bearing or bulling, and the mere money which hangs in the balance of the deals is the smallest part of the financiering that extends not over a few days of boosting or hammering but over months of carefully studied details in which there is as much give as take but in which, inch by inch, Sampson Rock gradually advances in the path he has laid out. Rock is not the richest man in the street, nor is he an unscrupulous grabster. He does not set out to ruin his opponents nor to wreck the railroad of which he desires to gain control, but he lays out a campaign as carefully considered as that of a military strategist, and if he does not stop to bury the dead nor to comfort the wounded, neither did Napoleon, Washington nor Grant. The wheels within wheels, the susceptibility to influence from the vaguest of rumors, the panic terrors which afflict the speculators were never better set forth. It becomes clear at once why financial magnates advise people to keep out of stock deals unless for investment, not only because of the annoyance they wish to save themselves from being importuned for advice and held accountable for losses, but because the outsiders, meddling with matters they do not understand, are like mischievous children thrusting sticks between the spokes of moving wheels, liable to come to grief themselves and to bring disaster on everyone else. Of course there is a girl and a love story. Indeed Sam Rock's impulse to "do things" is primarily for the purpose of showing Fanny Collyer that he is more than a rich man's son, but the sentimental interest takes the same place in the story that it does in active life. It is important and interesting to the parties most concerned, but even they have other things to do. Perhaps there is nowhere in the world another writer equipped to write "Wall Street Stories" with the same attention to facts and detail as Edwin Lefevre. For years he has been connected with the financial reports of New York newspaperdom, and he is personally acquainted with every man of importance in Wall street. He has studied his subject well, and made sure of his ground before he attempted to write fiction, at all. It was he who piloted Frank Norris through the intricacies of stock manipulation in "The Pit." So far from being attracted by the chances of "making easy money," himself however, his hobby is the acquisition of rare old furniture and china. "Sampson Rock of Wall Street" is a book rather for men than for women, or, perhaps it would be better to say, for most men and some women, which again is to state that it possesses qualities which should make it of more than ephemeral value, to be read once and cast aside or given away. Published by Harper and Brothers.

A Book for Boys

"Dave Porter's Return to School" takes up the history of that boyish hero after his return from the South Seas, where he has learned of the existence of an uncle, a father and a sister, as well as of the fact that instead of being a poor-house waif he is really the scion of a wealthy family. The father and sister have not yet appeared in the flesh, and in the interim of waiting for some communication from them, Dave has returned to school at Oak Hall. It is a fashionable institution where the young gentlemen sport gold watches and diamond scarf pins; where indulgent fathers furnish their heirs with motor cycles and pocket money in fifty-dollar lots, and there appears to be unlimited leave and liberty. Naturally, there are two factions, the good boys, of whom David Porter is the leader, and the bad ones represented by the sons of money lenders and stock brokers. The good ones turn bats loose in the apartments of a teacher they dislike and the bad ones fill the beds of the good ones with burdock burs. The good ones plan midnight feasts of goodies in their dormitory, and the bad ones find out and snitch and find the tables turned so that the evidence is against themselves. The good ones have a secret fraternity into which they initiate candidates in the time-honored way. Edward Stratemeyer has written many boys' books better deserving of commendation than this one. It is high time that lads of sixteen and upwards took a more serious view of their actions than to regard the robbing of orchards, the annoyance of their teachers, and the breaking of school rules as commendable pranks in which no question of morals is involved and no harm done as long as no one is caught. Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

Roosevelt's Railroad Speech

After raising expectation to the highest pitch by preliminary intimations President Roosevelt inspired a feeling of distinct disappointment by his speech on the railroad situation delivered in Indianapolis on Memorial Day. There was every reason why the country might look forward to a number of utterances in the most radical Rooseveltian vein; his well-known attitude towards the railroads, the revelations of the last few months in connection with the inquiry of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the operations of Harriman and the growing sentiment throughout the country against the overcapitalization of railroads and other big corporations, all combined to give assurance that when the President found utterance for his views, he would place a wider gulf than ever between himself and reactionaries of the Foraker type who have always been his bitterest and most powerful enemies. A reading of the speech causes a distinct surprise. Its conservatism is as little in keeping with the character of the President as hitherto exhibited as it is with the crying evils of railway manipulation in this country which prompted its preparation. It was announced a fortnight before the President delivered this speech that he had expressed dissatisfaction with the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission and had requested Commissioner Franklin K. Lane to inject "ginger" into its report on the railroads. The natural inference was that the President was prepared to go to extremes in his denunciation of the big mergers in his widely-heralded Indianapolis speech which was then being written and that he desired the authority of the Commission to warrant his criticism. Yet there is nothing in his address which deals adequately with the exposures of stock jobbing and company wrecking, of "watering" and directorate manipulation which startled the country when Harriman and others were under examination. His remarks could not be more optimistic if he spoke from the vantage point of a captain of finance; there is not a trace of that pessimism which even James J. Hill, a railway baron thoroughly acquainted with the past, present and future of his business, seems unable to suppress.

His Remarks on Overcapitalization

It is when dealing with "watered" stocks that the President in this surprising Indianapolis speech gives greatest pause to the student of railroad problems. With seeming reluctance he admits that many companies have been overcapitalized, but he deprecates severe criticism of railroads in general for this evil and insists that the actual amount of "water" in railway stocks has been grossly exaggerated. "There has been much wild talk," he says, "as to the extent of the overcapitalization of our railroads. The census reports on the commercial value of the railroads of the country, together with the reports made to the Interstate Commerce Commission by the railroads on their cost of construction, tend to show that as a whole the railroad property of the country is worth as much as the securities representing it, and that in the consensus of opinion of investors the total value of stocks and bonds is greater than their total face value, notwithstanding the 'water' that has been injected in particular places." President Roosevelt then goes on to say that "while there have been many instances of gross and flagrant stock inflation, and while, of course, there yet remain cases of overcapitalization," yet nevertheless the wholesome financial standing of the railroads is not impaired; and that "while those railway owners and managers who have enriched themselves by loading their properties with securities representing little or no real value, deserve our strongest condemnation," yet on the other hand, the large majority of railway men who "have worked faithfully, patiently and honestly in building up our great system of railroads," are to be accorded hearty commendation. If all this is true, it is difficult to realize the tremendous necessity for that radical measure of governmental supervision of railway capitalization and rates which Roosevelt's followers have always understood him to be battling for.

Another View of Watered Stocks

Just what President Roosevelt means by wild talk about overcapitalization it is difficult to fathom in view of the actual facts. There is a very general and rapidly growing conviction among the thinking men of this country that most of our industrial troubles can be traced to this evil of stock inflation which the President treats so cavalierly. San Francisco has had a taste of the unfortunate results which follow this manipulation of capital stock in its dealings with the United Railroads and the Spring Valley Water Company, not to mention other corporations. A view of this evil more consistent at once with common observation and with what was believed to be the presidential attitude before the Indianapolis speech was delivered, is given by Will Payne, himself something of an authority on railroads, in an article entitled "The Cheat of Overcapitalization" which appears in the same issue of Everybody's which contains the President's caustic comments on the "nature fakirs." "In the past eleven years," says Mr. Payne, "there have been listed on the New York Stock Exchange new securities—stocks and bonds—to the amount of twelve and a half million dollars, not including government and city bonds. Of this total twenty-five per cent, or three and a half billion dollars, in round figures, is just water. Railroad securities listed since the last big panic include more than fifteen hundred million dollars of pure water. When the railroads argue that they are entitled to earn a fair return upon the 'investment,' they include this bogus billion and a half.' Mr. Payne's article deals exhaustively with the specious argument underlying President Roosevelt's optimistic treatment of overcapitalization by first citing the current Wall street defense to the effect that a concern should be capitalized according to its earning power instead of in accordance with the actual investment, and then showing conclusively by a series of illuminating instances that overcapitalization only succeeds when the element of monopoly is present. For monopoly in industrial corporations read traffic arrangements and rebates in the case of common carriers and very little basis remains for the President's ultra-charitable treatment of the railroads. Of course it is unfair to impute, as many insist on imputing, unworthy political motives to whatever is disappointing, unintelligible or seemingly inconsistent in the President's attitude on great public questions, but certainly to anybody previously unfamiliar with the presidential opinion on railroads a close study of the Indianapolis speech would not yield an explanation of the intense hostility hitherto manifested toward him by the railway barons.

Possibly an Awakening

It is not altogether improbable that President Roosevelt has come to a realization of some of the unfortunate consequences of his impulsive and at times highly intemperate conduct. There is no doubt that the contagion of his example has not always been wholesome. Contrary to his design he has produced results from which a more cautious man, a statesman of greater breadth of vision and more deeply versed in the philosophy of history would have shrunk. Carried away by enthusiasm born of the consciousness of popular approval President Roosevelt has inadvertently played into the hands of the vicious demagogues who, in the past five years have been more active than at any time in the career of the Republic. Unmindful of the fact that the machinations of artful and unscrupulous demagogues constituted a far greater evil than even the corrupting influence of capitalistic combines he assumed the leadership of the crusade against the predatory rich and by the most spectacular methods stimulated popular prejudices and facilitated the propagation of class hatred. While his sincerity is not to be questioned, while there is no doubt that he did not exaggerate the magnitude of the evils which he sought to abate, nevertheless it is obvious that he has been entirely too impetuous, and that he might have accomplished greater good had he taken the precaution to circumvent the designs of the political humbugs who are quite apparently engaged in promoting civil disorder. While President Roosevelt was preoccupied with the regulation of railroads the demagogues were making use of his thunder to justify their own preachments. At the same time the charlatans of the press were goading him into a more bitter hostility by assuming a sceptical air, and intimating that he would have to go much further in order to convince the people that he was in earnest. President Roosevelt took the bait, and what is the result? The country is still prosperous, but class is arrayed against class. The relations between the employer and the employed are embittered, and the rich are held up to universal execration in the pillory built by Mr. Roosevelt. All over the land there is impatience with the law and distrust of the courts. In many states demagogues are inducing the people to adopt new schemes designed to promote the sovereignty of the mob and destroy the safeguards of liberty. Everywhere the situation is akin to the situation which has immediately preceded most of the upheavals of history. It would not be surprising to learn that President Roosevelt has had an awakening, and that he has come to think it advisable to anticipate what might reasonably be expected to ensue when industry slackens and there is no work, when wages can no longer be maintained and savings dwindle. If he has decided to abate his transports there may yet be time for him to use his mighty influence to guide people into safer and more peaceful ways. Let us hope that when he next gets into aggressive mood he will be inspired with a scorn of demagogues and deem it advisable to hold them up to public execration.

The Rising Generation

When a college president has the courageous honesty to file an indictment against himself it behooves all men to hearken to his words, for they are more than likely to be words of wisdom. College presidents are usually a self-sufficient generation and their most persistent claim is to an infallibility in pedagogic affairs which has come in many instances to impress the guileless public through the obstinate and tireless force with which it is urged. Unlike his fellows of the cap and gown President Faunce of Brown University is not too proud to acknowledge a fault when he discovers it. Speaking of the rising generation he has the following to say: "The young people of today, as compared with those of fifty years ago, are chiefly deficient in power of sustained attention and original thinking. They cannot, or at least they usually do not, think as clearly, as patiently, and as cogently, as did their fathers. They do not as quickly distinguish the irrelevant from the pertinent, the kernel from the husk, as the men of the last generation. They have an amazing fund of information; they are wide readers of bright ephemeral literature; they have tasted every fruit on the great tree of knowledge; they know a thousand interesting scraps; they are more versatile and ingenious and attractive than any other of the recent generations. But they are quickly led astray by sophistry, and easily led to surrender conviction when it conflicts with interest." It may just be possible that President Faunce did not intend this statement as a confession of the comparative failure of the American university system of which he is a conspicuous exponent. And yet, where so much rarely-acknowledged truth inheres in the words themselves, it is difficult to imagine that the college president does not realize thoroughly all that they imply without directly expressing it. The power of sustained and original thinking is not one for which its possessor may thank hereditary influences; the quick insight into sophistry is not innate; and the will to hold by conviction when interest beckons another way is not imbibed with mother's milk. These virtues of mind and soul are attained by careful cultivation, by the development which education at college and university is supposed to give. To admit that the rising generation lacks these qualities is to impeach the educational system under which the rising generation has been trained. It is interesting to see a college president do this, even by implication; for the tendency among college presidents has seemed to be to allow greater and greater scope for individuality among students, instead of molding them to the standards which are negatively mentioned in President Faunce's statement. The laxity in mental equipment and the hebetude of moral perception which distinguish certain classes of the so-called educated among us are due to the methods followed at Brown and other universities; but now that the head of one of these institutions has cast a doubt upon their absolute perfection, it is to be hoped that others will follow and that the best parts of the passing educational systems may be revived for the good of the next generation.

Berkeley's Latest Embroglio

Another college professor has been complaining of misconduct on the part of a college president. This time the charge is made against President Wheeler of Berkeley, and very properly he has not seen fit to set up a defense. We are told that the charge is so grave as to affect materially the discipline of the University, and that the public has a right to an explanation from President Wheeler. With this view we are not in accord. President Wheeler is responsible to the Regents of the University, and unless they demand an explanation he need not feel that it is his duty to challenge the assertions of the disgruntled gentleman who has seen fit to impart to his grievances a sensational tone. It is our opinion that it is the misfortune of some obscure college professors that they take themselves too seriously; also, that many of them misapprehend the character of the relations existing between themselves and the institution in which they are employed. They appear to be under the delusion that when they are put on the pay-roll they acquire certain valuable interests of which they cannot be dispossessed without due process of law. The rule at Berkeley is that a professor holds his job subject to the approval of President Wheeler. As President Wheeler is responsible to the Regents for the discipline of the institution it would manifestly be unfair to require him to retain in the faculty men who are not in sympathy with his administration. Though President Wheeler does not manage affairs at Berkeley as we should manage them, still we are not convinced that we could improve on his methods.

A Significant Inaccuracy

Some time ago when demands were being made for the removal of the corrupt Supervisors from office it was said, in explanation of the policy by which the government is now being operated, that Schmitz would immediately fill their places with men willing to do his bidding. This was not a highly satisfying explanation. When it was suggested that as the district attorney was in possession of evidence of Mayor Schmitz's guilt he should institute proceedings for the removal of that official too, the explanation was offered that the procedure was tortuous and that delays could easily be contrived by which the accused official could hold on to his office until the end of his term. But now it appears that the district attorney has modified his views. We see that he is now conducting proceedings for the removal of Chief Dinan. We beg leave to suggest that if the evidence is sufficient to warrant the removal of Dinan, and if the district attorney is disposed to test the accuracy of his statement respecting the imperfections of the system that render protracted delays possible, he will not have the slightest difficulty in demonstrating that he was in error. As a matter of fact the system is shrewdly designed to prevent faithless officials from holding office. Appeals cannot be had except on a writ of probable cause, and when the writ is issued there must be an immediate hearing.

Science And The Book Germ

The authorities of the public libraries of Berlin have been making some interesting tests to determine the hygienic condition of books which have been circulated amongst the people. With the dirt which was collected experiments were made on guinea pigs. No particular evil resulted from the volumes two years or less in circulation, but from refuse derived from particularly soiled books and from those drawn promiscuously for three years or more, decided results were obtained in the direction of propagating disease. Efforts to sterilize by fumigation proved unsatisfactory, for the bacilli survived while the books were, in many cases, reduced to a condition which rendered further concern about their carrying contamination superfluous. The result of the experimentation is that hereafter the police and health authorities will make periodical inspection of public libraries and books which they seize upon as a danger to public health will be destroyed. They will not be sold to paper manufacturers, but either burned or reduced by chemical processes. Of course our city libraries were sufficiently fumigated a year ago, so we need have no qualms at present as to the danger of contracting disease, but no serious harm would result if people in general were to become imbued with the idea that they were courting deadly dangers in depending on public libraries. Those fastidious folks who would not for a moment contemplate the idea of drinking from a cup at a public fountain, cutting food with a knife which they even suspected of having been used previously, or using a napkin, towel, or any other article not guaranteed to be fresh, have no hesitation about handling books which, passing through hundreds of careless palms, have been subjected to all sorts of inspection. Attacks of diphtheria, scarlet fever and other malignant disorders have been traced to library books and the danger to children is obvious.

Certainty

By Mabel Porter Pitts

Long has it been and tedious, the way
That marks the search, but hope shown ever bright
And kindly stars appeared, to make the night
Less dismal than had been the passing day,
And, too, a cheering word would oft times stray
On wings of folly down the barren waste,
And tempting lips would check my eager haste,
And pleading eyes my resolutions sway;
But deep desire for that still held denied
Came ever with the dawning of the sun
And sent me on my way unsatisfied.
One day I knew my pilgrimage was done;
I knelt within a sacred shrine, aside,
And heard my heart say, "Rest. This is the one."

An Emir

By R. B. Cunninghame-Graham

Only two years ago it was a waste of sand, which from the edge of a high cliff looked out across the straits at Spain, that submerged fraction of the Eastern world. On it dogs, yellow and as thin as jackals, played. When it was dark they howled, making night hideous or melodious, according as the listener's ears were tuned to the roar of cities or to the silence of the East. Ragweed and mignonette, and now and then a bur and now and then a gentian struggled from the sand, their stalks grown woody with the drought. Dead dogs and cats strewn it abundantly, with offal of all kinds, and on the scanty grass an ass or two fed without appetite, resigned to fate.

At times some Arabs from the interior camped upon it, their bell-shaped tents sewn with squat bottles of blue cloth springing like mushrooms from the sand, their mules and horses standing listless in the sun, stamping at flies or neighing shrilly when they were fed at night. Their owners wandered on the cliff looking across toward "El-Andalus" pondering, perchance, upon the black, the incomprehensible, the element on which Allah has given scant dominion to his faithful, and of which Musa, he who conquered Spain and died in far Damascus, poor and a prisoner, said, "It is a thing the mind of none can compass, vast and ungovernable, fools ride it to their ruin in their hollow ships . . . such is the sea, no man hath bridled it."

Perhaps the campers wondered why the people of the faith, those who alone can properly pronounce the letter "dod," did not again attempt the conquest of the land which once they ruled, or perhaps their thoughts but ran upon the price of eggs in Tangier, or in the sok of Jabaltar.

Jews and more Jews, the women handsome, but graceless as must be all condemned for centuries to persecution, and the men more Spanish than the Spaniards in their faces, but much more European in their minds, lived in long rows of pink or sky-blue houses, upon every side. The little plain called the Marshan, on which in Carolean times battles were fought against the Moors, under the chief the English called Lord Gayan, spread out between the cliffs above the sea and those which run down to the River of the Jews. Just at the end a Moorish cemetery, a field of stones, cut into little paths on every side, in which the feet of all the passers-by for centuries had left deep ruts, seemed to connect the living and the dead, in the familiar way of Africa, where no God's acre, railed and cut off from all the world, forms both a barrier against the quick, and yet a link with those who sleep beneath the grass.

The waste of sand, the cemetery, the howling dogs, and all the features of the life of Tangier, which have endured since first Ibn-Batuta left its walls to set forth on his travels, seemed likely to go on for ever, as changeless as the tide-rip which foams and billows in the middle of the Straits.

Then on a day a gang of builders suddenly appeared, Arabs with sacking tied about their loins, talking and shouting, and falling over one another in their zeal to do as little as was possible. A Spanish foreman, solemn and olive-colored (a Moor in trousers and a cap), speaking a jargon between Andaluz and Arabic, and half incomprehensible to all his workmen, walked about, looking intensely grave, and now and then cursing his men for dogs of infidels.

A Jew, thin, lithe and eager, acted the part of clerk of works, and in a month or two walls and more walls of courtyards, the scheme of every Moorish house, rose as by magic from the sand. The noise and the confusion of the men would have shamed Babel easily, and yet the work went on, went on by force of human strength and sweat, men raising stone by pulleys, in which palmetto ropes creaked noisily, whilst donkeys waited patiently with lime.

So did they build the pyramids, the temples at Palenque, and thus did the Alhambra rise out of the rocks which crown the gorge above the courses of the Darro and Genil. Grave, bearded, white-clad men, holding each other's hands, as children do in lands where custom sets a gulf unbridgeable betwixt the actions of the old and young, came and sat down on heaps of stones and criticised. They gave their reasons solemnly, and with much calling upon God, raising their hands with a slow motion from the wrist, and turning up their palms towards their auditors, who listened to them silently with now and then a pious phrase, which whistled through the larynx as the wind whistles through the trees. Some held the employment of the Christian would bring bad luck, whilst others gave as their opinion that the infidel was given might by God over the steam and electricity, and it was right to profit by his lore, as Allah, for wise reasons of his own, allowed him greatly to enjoy the earth, reserving to himself the power, the world's play done, to cast him into Tophet where he should wither for a thousand years.

Men swarmed like ants about the walls, chattering like parrots in a field of maize, and mules and donkeys carrying bricks and lime went to and fro, men urging them with blows and shouting curses on their mothers, all which they took unmoved and uncomplaining, their round black eyes looking amazed and philosophically upon their fellow-slaves who ran beside them yelling in their ears.

Word came from Suez or Port Said that soon the owner of the place might be expected, and that all must be finished by a certain day, on which he with his women and his suite would be in Tangier, and would take possession of the house. Painters and decorators, working with a will, soon gave the interior a habitable air, glazing the windows with parti-colored glass, and painting dados of great stripes of blue picked out with orange, and finishing pink window-frames with green, a scheme of color which to a Western eye seems crude, but which in Africa the light tones down and softens, as in a garden flowers are blended by the sun into a harmony.

Then, all desisted from their work, and the great house stood silent in the sun, as some huge palace in the realms of the "Arabian Nights" called up by genii, springs in a night, and perhaps vanishes away as speedily, into the sand from which it rose. Though built so hastily, it yet looked solid, the long white walls without a window, giving it an air as of a fortress, which the great gate did not belie though plated with sheet tin.

The master landed at the port, his baggage packed

Mr. Heney and His Ways

By Theodore Bonnet

The garrulous Mr. Heney, giving rein to his fatal passion for publicity, once more thunders headlong into print. But respecting Mr. Heney's latest plunge presswards, without the slightest disrespect it may be assumed that it was inspired by tactical considerations rather than the personal equation or the impulse to fill a literary vacuum. While I am willing to accept Mr. Heney as an embodiment of disinterested benevolence to mankind, I realize that above all things he is a tactician. It is not by the exercise of purely legal talent that he hopes to achieve success at the bar. If he should fail to bag all the big boodlers of this city his failure would not be attributed to a silly and superstitious reverence for the traditions of his profession. He is out for a glorious triumph over the entrenched forces of iniquity, and he is not to be handicapped by petty considerations of ethical propriety. Conscious of the fact that he is operating in the dual capacity of lawyer and Providence to a grateful community he does not hesitate to summon the people to his aid. His plan of campaign comprehends something more than the machinery of justice. That most powerful of all weapons—public clamor—he appreciates as almost indispensable in the furtherance of his most beneficent enterprise. Therefore he has been most fortunate in having the newspapers in their present temper. The newspaper, eager for the purification of the city, made it easy for Mr. Heney from the beginning. They did more: they made it possible for him to do all that he has done. It was the voice of the press that persuaded the humble and deferential courts of the city and state to facilitate the consummation of all Mr. Heney's salutary designs even in the face of Alpine precedents through which his pathway led. That Mr. Heney's labors might have been in vain had it not been for the grateful co-operation of the press is now to be presumed in view of the fact that even with the tremendous and unparalleled combination of agencies behind him there is danger of humiliating defeat. The imminence of this calamity was disclosed by Mr. Heney himself when he rushed into print the other day and horrendously protested against the hindering of the prosecution. So seriously was the prosecution being hindered in his opinion that he deemed it necessary to take the public into his confidence, and this he did to the extent of four or five columns of earnest and verbose disquisition. From this confidential communication to myself and the rest of the general I learn that Mr. Heney has incurred the opposition of the mighty and set loose the dogs of conspiracy. A shocking state of affairs!

What the nature of this conspiracy is I am unable to ascertain, but I have great confidence in the ingenuity of Mr. Heney, and I have no misgivings respecting his ability to hold his ground so long as he is able to retain the sympathy of the press. When Mr. Heney thumps his brisket and fans this city with a breeze of eloquent reproach we should not permit ourselves to be thrown into panic. We should remember that Mr. Heney is fertile in stratagems. When he parts his chin to release a bawl of blasting vehemence the probability is that it merely presages a motion before Judge Dunne, or augurs the indictment of Chief Dinan for daring to follow in the footsteps of Detective Burns. At any rate it is important that the voice of the court should be an echo from the haunts of the multitude. I interpreted that bawl as the forerunner of a new Elisor. It never occurred to me that the prosecution was getting desperate or that Success which has been awaiting Mr. Heney with engaging attitude, rosy arms outstretched and palpitating midriff was threatening him with an icy shoulder.

In Mr. Heney's latest exhortation he ranged through a wide gamut of emotion. He was pathetic, scornful, petulant, denunciatory, and monitory. But he was not so persuasive as he might have been if tranquil and sedate, which is the proper state of mind for accurate perception and cool deliberation. The opinion even of the wisest man has not much weight when behind it is discovered prejudice and passion. Mr. Heney was so ferocious, dogmatic and dictatorial in his utterances, that I would adjure him to assuage himself lest he excite the exasperating guffaw of the irreverent groundlings. For they are notoriously fickle. Even great heroes must be discreet in their rages. Xerxes was not taken seriously when in a transport of passion induced by the destruction of his bridge of boats over the Hellespont he commanded the sea to be punished with three hundred stripes. There is nothing that the public so quickly resents as being preached at. Mr. Heney should not lose patience with the dear pee-pul, or they may lose patience with him. Nor should he be too reckless in his beguilements. The pee-pul have acquiesced in most of the things he has done thus far, but should they ever take to looking backwards, and become conscious of all they have acquiesced in they might become resentful. And it would be unfortunate if that should happen before Mr. Heney finished his job. Therefore he should be mindful of the versatility of public favor, which, by the way, is aptly illustrated by the story of a Conqueror, who, on entering a little town he had just subdued saw the citizens taking his effigy down from a gibbet and removing the statue of his enemy from a pedestal. Presently his effigy was placed upon the pedestal and his enemy's was raised upon the gibbet. "You see," he said, turning to a companion, "the small difference between a gibbet and a statue." It is that small difference which I would have Mr. Heney perceive before again taking the public into his confidence and classing as ignorant and insincere all that do not applaud his views and his methods.

Mr. Heney is very indignant that there should be the slightest change in the public sentiment respecting the prosecution of the corruptionists. And he ascribes this change entirely to mean motives, at the same time inveighing against all who stubbornly decline to accept his motives at his own valuation. Obviously Mr. Heney is unreasonable. And if Mr. Heney cannot perceive any solid basis for an honest difference of opinion respecting the conduct of the prosecution then he is unquestionably obtuse. This is the fatal defect of some lawyers that they are never able to see both sides of a case. It is the defect that distinguishes the man of mediocre ability from the genius. Mr. Heney should be able to see more than one moral question in the situation evolved from the prosecution of the grafters.

It is just such a situation that men animated with a strong passion for the great virtues, as they are mistakingly called, are utterly forgetful of the ordinary ones. One of the ordinary virtues is justice. That is the virtue which impels us to give every man his due. Mr. Heney will probably admit that it were better to let all the boodlers escape than to pervert justice in the trial of one of them. There are many laymen who would not admit as much. But Mr. Heney is a lawyer, an honorable member of his profession, and his training has impressed him with the truth of the maxim; "Cursed is he that removeth the landmark." There is probably no surer way to pervert justice than to seek to promote it with the aid of public clamor. And yet we find Mr. Heney appealing to the misgivings of the public mind and to its dislikings. We find him thus appealing despite the fact that the machinery of the law is in his hands. So far he has had no untoward experience. He has received no rebuke from any tribunal. The Grand Jury has done everything that he has requested. Judge Dunne has denied him nothing. Indeed Judge Dunne has been so sympathetic at times that only on second thought or, perhaps, a hint from Heney, has he done less than he purposed doing; as for instance when he refused to excuse E. P. E. Troy from jury service. Judge Dunne appointed an Elisor and refused to accept bail from defendant Abe Ruef, and the Supreme Court of the State was so long making up its mind to exact for the infamous prisoner his Constitutional right that Ruef broke down as Mr. Heney expected him to do, and confessed his crimes.

By these ways that seem oblique are we having justice vindicated. And yet Mr. Heney thinks there is only one moral question involved in the prosecution of the grafters. Nor is he content with all that public clamor has done toward persuading justice to connive at expediency. He is a glutton for public clamor. And therefore he laments the incivism of that element of the community which ceased to applaud after he began to indict the rich boodlers. "The briber and debaucher of our public service," he says, "doesn't arouse the manly resentment of the average banker, merchant or professional man." He doesn't know why, though in another breath he affirms having heard wealthy citizens insist that it would be better to have the streets of the city run with blood than have the carmen's strike compromised on any terms that would recognize the right of any man to belong to a union. Mr. Heney mentioned no names. It would surprise me very much if he remembered any. Very impulsive is Mr. Heney and given to going off half-cocked. What he probably heard was, Better the streets should run with blood than that anarchistic principles inculcated by riot should triumph over the right of an American citizen to employ an American citizen without the permission of a Cornish socialist. If Mr. Heney would reflect a little on his lately acquired tendency to misunderstand the issue between capital and labor, a tendency most emphatically evidenced in his latest hortatory address to the public, perhaps it would not be so difficult for him to appreciate the disinclination of a large element of this community to give impetus to his designs. Perhaps if he were to review his own utterances with the assistance of an unprejudiced exegete he would be able to appreciate the fact that there is a multiplicity of moral questions involved in the current controversy. But aside from these moral questions there are other considerations that might induce an honest citizen to refrain from clamoring for the conviction of the bribe-givers. An honest, indignant citizen, having been clamoring for the punishment of the infamous grafters, believing them to be the worst rascals that ever infested a community, and having witnessed their confession and the amiable treatment that has been accorded them, it should not be deemed singular that subsequent proceedings interested him no more. Rather ought it to be deemed singular that such a citizen, free from bias and the venom of class hatred, should enter into the spirit that animates Mr. Heney. For it would require a combination of abnormal heart and eccentric mind to produce even in a zealot for civic virtue tolerance of a Ruef and hatred of one of the victims of his extortion.

All honest men would sympathize with Mr. Heney in his vigorous campaign against corruption, were all honest men of the conviction that his methods are the best that might be conceived for the purifying of our moral atmosphere. There are men sincere and not ignorant who do not agree with Mr. Heney that bribe-giving is in all circumstances worse than bribe-taking. They are convinced that his logic despite its impressive veracities is not unimpeachable. When he says if there were no bribe-givers there would be no bribe-takers, they reflect that it is also true that if nobody would accept a bribe there would be no bribe-givers and that if nobody would extort a bribe nobody would be compelled to give one. But it is not my purpose to fall out with Mr. Heney over the subtleties of difference between bribe-giving and bribe-taking. I am willing to concede that he is sincere in his views and that those views do not betray ignorance. I would merely persuade him not to be too dogmatic and querulous. Even when as a lawyer he tells the laymen of this community what the essence of a crime is, and when as laymen they decline to accept his explication he should not assume that they are either insincere or ignorant or even prejudiced in favor of boodlers.

A star-gazer with his little telescope was once viewing the moon and describing her seas and her topography. Said a clown to his companion: "Let him spy what he pleases, we are as near to the moon as he is and all his brethren." Truly has it been said, practice creeps where theory can soar. The philosopher proves as feeble as those whom he most contemns. So it is with our moral speculations. The lawyer deducting wisdom from general principles tells us that the essence of bribery is the giving of the bribe, but when we see a band of unconscionable scoundrels, practicing deception on the people by seeking office in the guise of honest men imbued with a righteous desire to serve the public; when we see such men after taking the solemn oath of office, organizing themselves into an association for the looting of a city and for extorting money from its citizens; when we see such men enter into a compact with one of the most wicked rascals of which there is any record, whereby he is empowered to capitalize their vile greed; and when, finally, we see such men—the corrupt officials and their unspeakable pimp vouchsafed absolution not upon the strength of a profession of repentance, but upon their promise to make all their past iniquities seem commonplace in comparison with the final achievement, in perfidy, we should not be censured if from this spectacle we turn in scorn and abhorrence and in no mood to demand for an outraged commonwealth, on the word of such carrion, its pound of flesh, Mr. Heney, however, influenced by what he believes to be the essence of the crime is concentrating his energies on

Burns and His Methods

Many years will probably elapse before an authentic history of the graft prosecution is written, and it is very doubtful that we shall ever be supplied with a complete, impartial narrative revealing all the secret springs, various winding and perplexed mazes that are comprised in the sensational drama. This drama abounds in episodes of great human interest, with many of which the public are familiar, but over many an impenetrable curtain has been discreetly drawn. Desperate cases call for desperate remedies and when Detective Burns is dealing with rascals he doesn't adhere too strictly to the scented conventions of polite society. To catch a rascal he scruples not at a sly advantage, and from his long and varied experience he has become thoroughly versed in the psychology of rascality. He seldom errs in his conjectures respecting the course that will be pursued by a criminal in difficulties. After designing and launching the difficulties Burns is usually certain as to the outcome. Within a week after Ruef fell into the hands of the Elisor, Burns predicted his confession. How he persuaded Ruef to confess is one of the interesting, perhaps the most interesting, of the series of climactic occurrences in graft drama. The story has not yet been told for publication. Indeed very little of the truth respecting the career of Ruef since his return from the Trocadero has been diffused for public consumption.

Some Historical Data

Gradually the story of that confession, in fragments, is escaping from the inner chamber of the Inquisition. Ruef himself has divulged some of it. He has disclosed to friends his reasons for taking Burns into his confidence. He says that he was deserted by all his partners in crime and that even Schmitz had assumed an unsympathetic attitude. The Schmitz family had discontinued all social relations with his family, and he felt that he was to be left to fight the battle for freedom alone and at his own expense. He told a friend that he did not regret the action he had taken, and that he considered Detective Burns his best friend. From another source I hear that Ruef confessed to Burns two weeks prior to the day on which he arose in court to enter his paradoxical plea of guilty for the purposes of the prosecution and not guilty as to the moral responsibility. If this is true then the trick that Ruef played on his attorneys was about as contemptible a piece of deception as he ever executed. His attorneys had not the slightest inkling to his surrender until he asked for a private conference with them. That was after he had listened to Samuel M. Shortridge's argument in support of a motion for a change of venue. When the attorneys sat down with him he produced the slip of yellow paper on which he had written his confession. It is certain that the attorneys for the prosecution knew what was occurring at that conference. Moreover there has been speculation as to whether the court was not cognizant of what was coming. It would of course be very interesting to learn whether the court, while gravely listening to the argument on the motion for a change of venue, was aware that Ruef had his confession in his pocket and that the attorneys were the dupes of a treacherous client. Whether the coming graft historian will be able to gratify a vulgar curiosity respecting the scope of the court's knowledge on that notable occasion it is impossible to predict. Perhaps Judge Dunne will never tell. Perhaps if anybody else knows he will be equally non-communicative. All histories are more or less incomplete. Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in Ascalon! has been the motto of many an historian, for there are always occurrences to be hushed up rather than blazoned. Unto this day we don't know whether Dioclesian hanged himself in his garters or died in his bed. Even the veracious Eusebius with his golden reasons for favoring Constantine never alluded to the gossip relative to the death of Crispus. So let us prepare ourselves for disappointment.

When Abe Blushed

The exact date of Ruef's confession is of course a matter of some importance to his accomplices as well as of interest to the public. As to the reasons that actuated him there is a variety of opinion. That he does not give the correct ones we may feel pretty certain. I have been told that Burns deftly worked on his misgivings, telling him that if he was wise he would beat Schmitz to the immunity bath. It was repeatedly hinted to him that Schmitz was wavering, and even that the Mayor was negotiating for terms. Never did Siren warble so dulcet a song to ears already prepossessed by a congenial prospect. Abe relished nothing more than pretexts for evacuating the danger zone. His bosom agitated by emotions by no means tranquil and serene, induced mainly by solicitude for his exchequer upon which there was a most aggravating drain, he was eager to play the puppet moved by secret wires behind the screen. And there were other instigations of self-interest. Detective Burns, I am told, made the curious discovery that Ruef is not without a sense of shame. If while shame keeps its watch, as we have been told, virtue is not wholly extinguished from the heart, then the badgered and distressed boss is not inaccessible to regenerative influences. For Ruef's brazen cheeks burned as he contemplated the prospect of being proved guilty of collecting toll from fallen women. And it is said that it was largely in consideration of Burns's promise to abandon the charge of extorting money from women of the town, that Ruef told the story of his lesser iniquities.

Why the Prosecution is in Politics

Despite the protests of the men behind the prosecution of the boodlers, and their reiterated asseverations of exalted and disinterested motives, they are unable to thaw out a certain element of the community, the withholding of whose sympathy is entirely due to political considerations. It is suspected that the men behind the prosecution are now engaged on the side in perfecting a political machine for the coming campaign. But that circumstance is not sufficient to justify the challenging of their motives. Manifestly an ambition to complete the cycle of their benefactions is not deserving of reprobation. It is natural that Mr. Langdon should desire to wind up satisfactorily the work that was begun with the appointment of Mr. Francis Heney. The moving impulse of the graft prosecution is the political regeneration of the city, and to succeed the little coterie of reformers must bring order out of chaos, they must assist in giving us a clean set of municipal officials. The mistake they are making is one of evasion. The public, always on the qui vive for miserable charlatanerie, is ever distrustful of a secret purpose lurking behind a mask. Mr. Langdon and his associates should not expect us to blind ourselves to the natural course of human contingencies. They should not protest too much. It is well to remember that the signs of political energy are not to be easily mistaken. The Hon. Joseph J. Dwyer of the Independence League and the graft prosecution is a symbol of political energy. He isn't able to find a bushel at every corner large enough to hide the light of his political genius.

Nursing the Saloon Vote

A story was related to me the other day by way of illustration of Mr. Dwyer's superior political sagacity. I will repeat it because it comes in pat to elucidate my meaning in reference to the laudable designs of the graft prosecution. Some time ago the Examiner was clamoring for an increase of the liquor license. It was argued that it would be the part of wisdom to compel the saloons to contribute more bountifully to the public revenues, especially now that we are so much in need of money to repair the damage suffered in the catastrophe. The proposition met with popular approval, but suddenly the agitation ceased. The circumstance filled curiosity. When the Examiner fathers a measure for the benefit of the public it usually stays with it until it is adopted. The Examiner is noted for its tenacity of purpose and its winning ways. So well is its reputation for persistency established that there was much surprise that it should cease its high license fight. According to my informant, the monarch of the dailies is not prejudiced against expediency. And the inexpediency of keeping up the fight for high license just as we are approaching a municipal election was pointed out by Mr. Dwyer of the Independence League. The saloon vote must not be alienated. Of course it is unfortunate that the question of expediency should have arisen, for there is no time like the present to get a license tax raised; the supervisors are such good dogs that they will eat out of Detective Burns's hands.

By Way of Warning

But "Politics is politics," said the Hon. Seonchin Maloney, "and when you're doin' politics you must do nuthin' but politics or take the count." And as I have suggested there is nothing essentially wrong in the ambition of the graft prosecutors to complete the cycle of their benefactions. Their efforts will find adequate results and consummation only in the complete routing of the grafters. And if they show us a strong change setting in on the current of our civil interests we should see a corresponding change in our duties. But—and here's the rub—it will always be difficult to convince some men that it is their duty to acquiesce in a scheme of government founded on a recognition of class distinction. If labor is to be a favored class politically because it is more solidified than any other, then the persons by whom that principle is espoused need not look for the sympathy of upright citizens. It is highly moral to send boodlers to jail, but it is highly immoral to conspire for the subjection of a city to the rule of any class of its citizens.

Their Political Prospects

But granting that the men behind the prosecution are inspired with the best of intentions respecting the municipal government they are bound to experience great difficulty in carrying them out. Aside from the great diversity of political interests which our little band of purifiers presents, there is reason to doubt their ability to capture a primary election. Not even the machinery of the Labor Party is at their disposal. Gavin McNab is not likely to yield the management of the Democracy though it is understood that the Hon. James D. Phelan fondly expects to exercise his wonderful powers of fascination and weave the spells that were so successful in the days agone. Mr. Phelan's interest in the senatorship is as keen as ever. Mr. Dwyer is of course true to the Independence Leg, as it is called, and he relies on District Attorney Langdon to capture the imagination of the pee-pul merely by exhibiting himself as the symbol of the appointing power through which Mr. Heney was set in motion. While only a lay figure so far as the prosecution is concerned Mr. Langdon is a potential force politically of some magnitude. It will be remembered that in its inception the graft prosecution served to energize Mr. Langdon's gubernatorial campaign. If Langdon had been elected governor then would the graft prosecution have ended, for Mayor Schmitz would have appointed somebody to fill the vacancy in the district attorney's office, and Heney would have been left high and dry on the shores of innocuous desuetude. But fortunately Langdon wasn't elected, a circumstance that has enabled him to cause the pee-pul to forget that he ever had any intention of abandoning their interests.

Coming Events

In justice to Mr. Langdon it should be said he has abated his fickleness and is for the present true to the old town. For two reasons he has no intention of running for Governor this fall. One reason is that we don't elect a governor this fall, and the other is that we do elect a district attorney. So far as Mr. Langdon's ambition is concerned the men behind the prosecution are heartily in accord, but should the Independence Leg be thrust into prominence the viperous worm of dissension would wriggle into view. Thus far the gentlemen are agreed that all their interests are best subserved by battering the Republican machine, and hence their oft repeated intimations of certain prospective indictments despite the fact that they are not in possession of one word of testimony to justify their reckless utterances. This machine smashing diversion will not preoccupy the gentlemen much longer. They must soon align themselves with their several interests and then we shall probably hear some jangling notes of discord.

Speculations of The Cynical

Meanwhile the irreverent cynics, the men of feeble civic spirit, are talking with an unreflecting levity of Mr. Spreckels' ambition to enter the President's cabinet. These perverse scoffers and congenital pessimists have been at their old practice of putting two and two together with all the enthusiasm of metaphysicians who had discovered a new and infallible process of ratiocination. They argue that Heney's interest in the prosecution is largely inspired by President Roosevelt, not that the President is feverishly concerned over graft in San Francisco, but that in his intense hatred of one Harriman, he nurses the hope that as there has been so much intriguing in a city where that magnate has so many large interests something might be unearthed highly prejudicial to his enemy. And though this conjecturing may be somewhat far-fetched it is upon nothing more substantial than the rumor has been put in circulation respecting Mr. Spreckels' political ambition. This of course is a matter so dissonant from common sense that hardly can it be conceived by human understanding. While it is true that Mr. Heney has more than once announced his intention "to get" Mr. Herrin, the representative of Mr. Harriman, it is more reasonable to assume that his hostility to the Southern Pacific attorney is due to a desire to smash the Republican machine rather than to the hope of embarrassing the Wall street financier. But these are idle speculations. Mr. Heney's main purpose is to regenerate the city, and thus far it does not appear to be essential to this achievement to indict Mr. Herrin, for notwithstanding the infinite ramifications of the Southern Pacific Company not one iota of evidence has, up to this writing, come to light to implicate the attorney in questionable transactions. And surely when Mr. Heney, equipped as he is for the beneficent business in hand, fails to verify his suspicions respecting the doings of a citizen of this city, then may we be justified in felicitating that citizen on his exemplary behaviour.

Confusion of Sentiment

As Mr. Heney has told us, the sentiment of this community has undergone a change since he began demonstrating, to use his own forceful language, that the laws do not discriminate between the poor and the rich. When Mr. Spreckels began his gallant fight for decency not a note of croaking dissent could be heard except in labor union circles where it was supposed that he purposed humiliating organized labor by showing up the iniquity of the Schmitz administration. The labor leaders from Gompers to McCarthy dissented with the same vehemence that has characterized the protests of anarchic socialists against applying the law of the land to Moyer and Haywood. But the unionists have been persuaded that Mr. Spreckels is not prejudiced against them. The ox that has been gored is pastured on the hill, and the ox has a large family and many friends. Mr. Heney's round-up is of such dimensions, and directly affects so wide an area of this city, that the sentiment which it influences must naturally be reflected afar. It has penetrated even to the sanctum of the Inquisition. The men who have been indicted are men of affairs and it is not surprising that they have many sympathizers. It is not hard to persuade these sympathizers that the prosecution is not motivated entirely in civic patriotism, and being as they are in a receptive mood toward purveyors of gossip respecting the ulterior designs of the prosecutors, they abound these days in opinions that are far from sound. It does not occur to some of them that it is somewhat illogical to be prejudiced in favor of defendants simply because the defendants have been brought to justice by men inspired by malice. On the other hand there are men deeply in sympathy with the prosecution who assume that criticism of the methods of the prosecution must imply a prejudice against the indictment of rich boodlers. Obviously this assumption is illogical.

Spreckels Was Afraid of Fire

Shortly after the change of sentiment of which Mr. Heney complains, one of the raw recruits in the ranks of the scoffers told me a story that belongs in Professor Henry Morse Stephens's history of the earthquake period. It is the story of the row in the Committee of Fifty over a proposition to permit the United Railroads to give us street car service. The story was told to me to give point to the suggestion that Mr. Spreckels was, as Mr. Calhoun has asserted, unfriendly to the United Railroads long before there was any talk of boodle, and I repeat it only to indicate the trend of men's minds since the pursuit of bribe-givers grew hot. Some days after the big fire, as my informant reminded me, the United Railroads' officials filled the people with joy by announcing that they were ready to operate their cars. Nothing could have more effectually roused the hopes of the sad and depressed community than this announcement indicating as it did the confidence of a big corporation controlled by Eastern capital and conveying the promise of an early revival of business. Mr. Rudolph Spreckels was the only member of the Committee of Fifty whose heart was not gladdened by the announcement. Mr. Spreckels frowned. He talked of the danger of fire. The cars were operated one day, everybody being permitted to ride free, and then they were stopped. The only explanation given was that the electric wires might cause a fire. The cars were stopped by order of Mr. Spreckels. The only member of the Committee of Fifty who was not influenced by Mr. Spreckels's misgivings was Gavin McNab. He is said to have made some investigation and to have learned that all the wires were insulated, and that there was no more danger from fire than there would be six months later. He brought the matter up in the committee, saying that the people wanted car service and asking why the cars were not operated. Mr. Spreckels arose and explained the danger. He based his statement on the scientific report of an engineer, which, he thought, should settle the matter. But apparently McNab was not deeply impressed. He suggested that Mr. Spreckels file a scientific brief on the subject and promised that if the cars were run he would read the brief six months from that date. Mr. Spreckels evidently detected a tone of sarcasm in Mr. McNab's remarks, for he immediately resigned from the committee. Then there was a commotion. Mr. McEnerney tried to save Mr. Spreckels's wounded feeling in a neat speech on the importance of all pulling together, but in conclusion he confessed that the people were crying for cars. Other speakers followed in the same strain, each patting Mr. Spreckels gently on the back, but conscientiously affirming that there was an insistent demand for car service. The cars were put in motion and Mr. Spreckels had nothing more to say.

To the Tall Pines for Jim

Those prying into graft matters obtain evidence daily that there will be a grand scattering of City Fathers when the big stick lifts. Immunity certificates are but short lived at best and the coming inquisition may be directed against the minor thieves. Thus it is but the part of thrift to prepare against the next Grand Jury. More than one supervisor, I learn, has assigned his interests to his wife and placed dummies in the corporations in which he is concerned. But Jim Gallagher is a noble exception to the rule. When released, the once acting-Mayor announces, he intends to retire to his ranch in the high Sierras. There as a man of simple tastes he may live comfortably upon his income. Nor, since the mountains about are well covered with chaparral, need he worry as to what the next Grand Jury may do. His fellow members are closer mouthed. Of course imprisonment would be annoying, but imagine being compelled to disgorge!

Senator Nixon Replies

Mining stocks have been hit hard by the present crisis. Most of the values are cut in half, some are chopped two-thirds of their prices of six months ago, while the "wilcats" are cut completely out of the field. It is the old, old story of squeezing the lemon. But some of the brokers and promoters who have faith in the proven mines as a field for investment are vehemently protesting against the tactics on the part of certain owners whom they believe contributed largely to the present depressing conditions. Brokers Doubleday, Mims, Kirley, Lambaud and Stonebarn and a corps of "resolutes" are out in interviews, articles and "letters" denouncing the methods of the so-called manipulators. "Grossly exaggerated reports of strikes," "splitting up a good mine among leasers and letting the leasers get the bullion at the expense of the stockholders," "no dividends when good ore is being milled," and "overcapitalization," are only a few of several gross charges being made. Even the back bone of the Goldfield group, Goldfield Consolidated is declared to be overcapitalized. This last shot evidently stirred the choler of Senator Nixon for he is just out with a vigorous reply in which he endeavors to clear up the whole situation. He emphatically insists that the Goldfield mines are in the best possible condition and will yet astonish the world; that Goldfield Consolidated is in a position to take out high grade ore at the rate of one million dollars every twenty days and that he is managing the merger mines purely from a mining standpoint and not with a view to manipulation. Stung by the continual charge of being a manipulator and thereby partly responsible for present conditions he says he has never solicited a man to buy or sell a share of Goldfield Consolidated and has not traded in that stock during the last sixty days. It is safe to say the plucked public will be regaled with these

Bromides and Sulphites

Down in Southern California, whither people are generally supposed to flock to rid themselves of chronic disorders, the Sulphitic theory, as expounded by Gellett Burgess in his book on Sulphites and Bromides, has taken hold with a grip that promises nothing short of an epidemic. The germ was introduced by Outlanders from New York and vicinity. Inasmuch as the Sunny South cannot do without these Outlanders, the plague cannot be fought by an embargo after the manner of the Tahitian orange scale. Yet all hope is not lost, for, as the good ladies of the Friday Morning Club know, Los Angeles once lived through a personally introduced epidemic of Henry James, and this fact is advanced by those who hold that the Sulphitic theory will die a natural death. "Amatory Poems" by Thomas De Las Torres has a prefatory note which loosely translated means that, provided the morals of an author are pure, it signifies nothing what the morals of his books are. A still freer translation would mean that an author's work is no key to the personality of the man. This will not hold good when applied to the author of the Sulphitic theory. There are certain situations which allow of no deviation as to conversation. One may say "If you please," "Thank you," "Excuse me," "I want to thank you for a very enjoyable evening," or, if one happens to be a lady, "I've had a perfectly charming time." One must say the inevitable Bromidiom and be classed as a Bromide, or one must say nothing. Even the most Sulphitic of Sulphites, the very expounder of the theory itself, could invent no way out of such a difficulty, and so said nothing. Here in San Francisco before the quake—even before the existence of the Sequoia Club—lion-taming was considered a fair diversion; and it so happened that Burgess, then known as the creator of the Purple Cow, was petted, combed and fed by kindly, well intentioned people who would vary the monotony of those tranquil times. And it is recalled that he left the scene of functions given in his honor without other preliminary than the covering of his head some considerable time before he was out of doors. Of course these poor Bromides saw nothing Sulphitic in this; the sulphitic theory had not been expounded at that time. They only saw a pompous little person who evidently was lacking in knowledge of the first principles of social usage. But then, these kindly people were only Bromides.

Still Freaking it to Fame

That Gellett Burgess has not exhausted that pristine originality which stood him in such good stead when he was slowly soaring with The Lark to a quasi-fame is apparent from his latest outbreak, news of which reaches me by way of the staid and cultured Aldine

Club of Boston. Burgess has added a new word to the language which may or may not endure as long as that other creation of his, the goop. This word which he sprang first at the Aldine Club aforesaid is "blurb." A blurb, according to the manufacturer of the word, may be defined as "a sound like a publisher—a cheek drawn on Fame which is seldom honored." As a matter of fact the blurb resembles the paper jacket of a novel and bears the superscription, "Yes, this is a blurb! All the other publishers commit them. Why shouldn't we?" Beneath the superscription is shown a portrait of "Miss Belinda Blurb in the act of Blurbing." Then comes the book's title and the author's name; and finally the "noise like a publisher"—after this fashion: "Say! Ain't this book a 90 horse-power six-cylinder Seller? If We do say it as shouldn't We consider that this man Burgess has got Henry James locked into the coal-bin, telephoning for 'Information.' We expect to sell three hundred and fifty copies of this great, grand book. It has gush and go to it, it has that Certain Something which makes you want to crawl through thirty miles of dense tropical jungle, and bite somebody in the neck. No hero, no heroine, nothing like that for Ours, but when you've Read this masterpiece, you'll know what a Book is, and you'll sic it onto your mother-in-law, your dentist, and the pale youth who dips hot air into Little Marjorie until 4 Q. He's seen Blurbs before, and he's dead wise. He'll say, 'This book is the proud purple penultimate.'" Burgess may consider this good adver-

Just the same Burgess may blurb his way into something not unremotely resembling fame before he gets through.

Grinding the Faces of the Publishers

There was an incipient strike here last week which was settled out of court—that is, without newspaper publicity. The stereotypers and pressmen on the Call, Chronicle and Bulletin threatened a tie-up which would deprive the public of San Francisco of that not unmixed blessing—its daily paper. The Examiner was not threatened, as it is independent of the other papers in the matter of wages. When the papers got started after the fire the proprietors of the Chronicle, Call and Bulletin came together for a talk over the labor situation, and agreed on account of the increased cost of living to raise the wages of the stereotypers and pressmen a dollar a day. This new schedule was kept up for a year, then it was agreed that the wages should be put back to the scale in force before the fire. That is, the publishers agreed to this. But they reckoned without the workers, who, having become accustomed to the higher wage, were reluctant to submit to a cut. They went about their resistance methodically. A meeting was held at which a new scale was adopted—a scale that covered the dollar a day bonus that they had been enjoying for a year or more. The new scale was submitted to the publishers, who kicked mightily. They had naturally looked upon the bonus as in the nature of a gift, and when the employees proposed to force a continuance of the bonus the publishers regarded the demand as tantamount not only to looking a gift horse in the mouth, but pulling his teeth as well. But stereotypers and pressmen are scarce, and the publishers had to give in.

Pardee's Senatorial Boom

There is a strange fascination about public office. Once a tax-eater always a tax-eater, said a curb-stone philosopher one day, after listening to an ex-supervisor discussing water rates, and often have I been reminded of the sentiment. For the latest reminder Dr. George C. Pardee, who was once Governor of this State, is responsible. Dr. Pardee is an eminent specialist in matters pertaining to the eye, ear and nose. So large is his practice that he could live at ease careless of the welfare of his countrymen. But he scorns ease. He likes to circulate freely and widely handing out free sets of his views. He has an inextinguishable ambition to mingle with the statesmen of his country at Washington, though he must know that there are few places on earth where a man of his peculiar ineptitude would be sure to find greater obscurity. When the eminent doctor retired from office I was persuaded that I should never again feel it my duty to make him the object of unfavorable criticism. And in that delusion I was mightily pleased, for I appreciate the doctor's scientific ability and I know that in private life he is a man of irreproachable character. It is not agreeable to call attention to the shortcomings of such a man, shortcomings that are exhibited only when he enters the sphere of politics, for which he is unfitted temperamentally and intellectually. But here he is again thrusting himself forward in apparent unconsciousness of the fact that his political career is at an end. Though his political machine went to smash in the campaign of 1906 he gathered up the remnants of it, and with a makeshift he has since been trying to give impetus to a senatorial boom. Several small newspapers in the interior are nursing it for him. One of them is the Los Angeles Express owned by Edwin T. Earl, brother of Guy Earl. The promotion and publicity bureau is in Oakland, and it is there that Guy Earl prepares the boom stuff for the Express. It is queer stuff, the keynote of which is the inferiority of the quality of statesmanship exhibited by Governor Gillett and Senator Perkins when compared with the brilliant record made by George C. Pardee, as Governor of California. It requires a good deal of courage on the part of an editor to publish that sort of twaddle at this time when so many people, by reason of the fearless stand taken by Gillett in every emergency that has arisen since his election, are so forcefully reminded of the invertebrate policy of his predecessor. I earnestly hope that Dr. Pardee is not having his leg pulled. If it is worth pulling it, is surely accessible, for he must be guileless indeed if it has not yet dawned on him that all the political strength he possessed prior to the last election was derived partly from gubernatorial patronage and partly from hostility to the party machine. Now that he has lost the prestige of his office he must have a wondrous amount of confidence in his personal magnetism to suppose that he can still command the support of the inconsequential dissatisfied element in a contest over the senatorship.

The Ban is Off Okolehao

"Hawaii's own peculiar alcoholic drink is at last to come into legitimacy," writes my Honolulu correspondent. "Okolehao," the very name of which declares its primitive origin, after more than sixty years of legislative outlawry, during which it has never lost its hold on Hawaiian sentiment, is at last to be distilled with the full approval and even guardianship of the government, and to be put within the reach of every individual having the price. A distillery for the manufacture of Okolehao is now being operated under the inspection of Internal Revenue officers in the District of Kooa on the Island of Hawaii. Okolehao is a liquor distilled from the root of the ti plant, a sort of pandanus-like tree of low stature, whose leaves have been used from time immemorial, and still are, to wrap up fish and similar commodities to be carried from the market. This use of the leaf was known to the ancient Hawaiians. But it took the perverted ingenuity of Botany Bay convicts or other beach combers who almost trod on the heels of Captain Cook, the discoverer of these Islands, to discover the alcoholic virtues of the root of the ti. Their first stills were constructed of an iron pot and a twisted gun barrel, from which combination the Hawaiian, ever ready with descriptive epithets, quickly evolved the name. It quickly found favor with the Hawaiians, and in the early days held its own in competition with the New Bedford rum which whalers and others brought as one of their chief commodities of trade to these Islands. But with the discernment of its evil effects on his people Kamehameha III interdicted its manufacture and use early in the last century. He would have interdicted British rum, American whiskey and French brandy at the same time, if he could have done so, but men-of-war threatened the defenseless kingdom and forced these articles of commerce on his people.

Proud of Their Tipple

Despite the royal inhibition Okolahao has always been distilled in primitive fashion in inaccessible valleys and mountain fastnesses, there has grown up a sort of national pride in its virtues from which event the missionary has not been free. So at the time of the last Paris Exposition the Puritanic provisional government winked at the manufacture of quantities sufficient for exhibition purposes, and when it came back with a gold medal and a diploma of merit from the government of the French Republic it found a place among the show objects at the capitol. It is said of Okolehao, and that was the verdict of the jury of award at the Paris Exposition, that it contains fewer deleterious ingredients than any other spirituous liquor. As it comes from the still it is of very high proof, and except to the confirmed toper not specially appealing as a straight drink. But as the basis for mixed drinks it is said to be superb, and housekeepers say that for punches and sherbets and as a flavoring and fortification for ices and in cookery it is unequaled. During these later days of its illicit character, the Japanese, who have been its principal distillers, have sophisticated it with honey, and substituted Albaroba beans for the ti root itself, and its reputation has suffered in consequence. But Uncle Sam has accorded it recognition as a legally distillable liquor, a distillery to manufacture it as a special product has been established and will soon be putting its product on the market.

The Kitchen Check

The other day in the foyer of the Fairmont I listened to the story of a man who made a fortune out of an idea that saved another man a fortune. Later I listened to a man who told me how other men were making small fortunes by demonstrating to themselves that the first man's idea "leaked dollars." Some years ago man No. 1 kept a big restaurant in New York. He knew his business, as it was known in that day, enjoyed a big trade, but try as he might he could not make money. He realized there was a leak but he could not locate it. It was only when his business was tottering on its last legs that he found the exact spot: in the passing of the food from the kitchen to the dining-room. In that shift the waiters made their checks to suit the customers and the proprietor was obliged to pay the difference. The discovery came too late to do him any good and he turned over everything to his creditors. He was broke. But he decided that other big restaurants were in the same predicament and he resolved to work out his idea. The result was what is now known as the "kitchen check," the method where the waiter pays at the kitchen door for the food he serves the restaurant or hotel patron. The man took the idea to a big hotel keeper in New York and the latter grabbed it. A swell restaurant was fitted out. Man No. 1 was put in charge at a fat salary together with a percentage on the receipts. In the first year he paid all his debts and had a handsome balance at the bank.

Beating the Check

Man No. 2 is wise in the ways of cooks, waiters, barkeepers and those who wax fat on tips. I told him the tale of No. 1. The wise one smiled after the fashion of one who knows it all and forthwith he began to illuminate the subject as follows: The time may come when they'll have no strikes but I don't believe it'll ever come when waiters won't graft on either the proprietor or the customer. Before the so-called "kitchen check" was instituted the waiter grafted chiefly on the proprietor; now he grafts chiefly on the customer. The latter now pays the graft plus the tip. How is it done? By erased checks, by bogus checks, by bluffs, by juggled figures, by the thousand and one tricks known to the grafting waiter. No Macbeth ever had more tricks at his command. The proprietor of one of the swellest restaurants on Van Ness avenue knew that his customers were being fleeced by one of his men. He detailed a subordinate to watch the table and catch the waiter but the latter did the trick right under his nose—with a bogus check. When the check was turned in it was quickly seized and the figures compared. But the fellow knew his business and had adroitly made the substitution. Private room diners are held up by bold, bluffing tricks, for apparent reasons. As for beating the "kitchen check" it is done right along but of course not as clumsily as formerly. Say a couple of diners order a "porterhouse for two," the waiter turns in an order for a single porterhouse and the customer pays the difference. Again when a waiter is passing the cashier the hand supporting the tray sometimes has sandwiched in between a plate containing some dish that escapes charge. If the cashier at times becomes too vigilant the waiters organize a "rush" on him; that is, four or five will hold back till all their trays are heaped then start a stampede for the cashier. If he gets rattled, he's lost as far as checking goes, for the wily ones know every trick in the game and either the customer or the proprietor must pay. Of course there are waiters and waiters: I'm speaking now of only the organized grafters. Despite all the systems gotten up to check them they're making money faster than ever. Why, it has got so now that in some places they will even pay for the privilege of being allowed to wait on tables. But that style of grafting is another story.

Owl Wagons for Night Birds

Nothing can quench or subdue the joyous spirit of San Francisco. The desire for a good time cannot be put down by so little a thing as a car strike. There are no owl cars for early morning trips home—but there are owl wagons. The rough, uncomfortable, jolty vehicles in which all who do not walk have been riding after dark run until four o'clock in the morning. After midnight revelers ride back and forth on them, and during the early morning hours they do a big business not only in the Tenderloin but all the way up from the lower end of town. A few of them run out into the residence districts, too, as late as the coming of dawn. It was written of San Francisco shortly after the fire that "all the blossoms of her mirth" were "crushed, like her youth, beneath the stones." Maybe they were—but they're blooming again as gaily as ever.

The Taylor Baby

A friend of the family tells me that E. W. Hopkins has developed a Rooseveltian antipathy to race suicide and as Mrs. Will Taylor has just added to the baby crop she is crowding her sisters for the height of papa's regard. The latest addition to the Taylor family is a boy and I hear that Mr. Hopkins's gift is the sort that pays dividends. The Taylors have one little girl, named Edna after Mrs. Taylor. They are at present living at the Hopkins's home on California street but are planning to go down to Menlo Park in a week or two.

Borel Buys a Narjot

I hear that Antone Borel feels the bite of the ambition to become an art connoisseur and intends to have a picture gallery that will favorably compare to the one the late Irving M. Scott collected and which his heirs sold to New York dealers. Mr. Borel recently bought a very fine example of Narjot's earlier work which makes his collection of the work of California artists very complete. Aylett Cotton, who is a prospective son-in-law of the French bankers, returned from Manila the other week, and with the repression that has characterized this courtship will await here the return of his fiancée in November instead of hurrying over to Switzerland where the Borels are enjoying a protracted visit.

Feminine Club Gossip

The Francisco Club keenly feels the absence of Mrs. Henry Scott who more or less controls the destinies of the fashionable club. The building on the site of the old Carolan house on California street, near Franklin, is rapidly nearing completion and the question of sub-leasing part of the building animates present discussion. It takes a neat sense of discrimination to comb over prospective tenants and select the sort fitted to breathe the rarified atmosphere of the Francisco Club and the other members feel that Mrs. Scott possesses almost divine intuition as to Who is near Who. It is said that a careful observer can judge from the angle of Mrs. Scott's bow just what position the recipient occupies in society. Her daughter, Mrs. Walter Martin, has a democratic little nod and a smile that is a whole chapter in Socialism. Apropos of the smile and bow which are the currency of common greeting, one must cultivate something distinctly original to be good form these days. The funny little bob of Ethel Barrymore and the rakish nod of little Alice Nielson have their understudies in local society. Some very bizarre poses have been adopted by the most ardent sidesteppers of the commonplace and to see a lot of women exchange greetings at a fashionable crush is well worth the price of admission.

The Deans at the Fairmont

I hear that the Walter Deans Sr. intend to make their home at the Fairmont Hotel this winter. For many years the Deans occupied an extensive apartment, that had all the earmarks of a private home, at the old Palace Hotel. They even had a spacious private dining-room where they entertained with all the privacy of a personally conducted establishment. Their summer home in San Rafael likewise had a hotel setting. For years the same apartments at Hotel Rafael have been reserved for them and even during their prolonged residence in New York these rooms have been held in readiness for them. Mrs. Dean is devoted to her grandchildren, who pay her a daily visit, as the Walter Deans Jr. are also located in San Rafael. Mrs. Dean Sr. intensely amuses her family and friends by plaintively saying "I do hope the children like me—do you think they find me congenial?" As the oldest youngster is somewhere on the sunny side of ten it is doubtful whether his emotions include congeniality but he evinces a fondness for his grandmother that should satisfy her capacity for juvenile affection.

The gossips are taking a sporting interest in the cardiac affairs of Helen Dean, who is the most excessively alive young thing in that somnolent suburb. They have gone so far as to lay a wager on the ultimate success of the three young men who evidently put their feelings in the warming oven when Miss Dean went East, for their attentions have begun right where they left off at her departure.

Another Tour For Mrs. Preston

Mrs. Preston is contemplating another tour of the world and was very anxious to have her daughter, Mrs. Willard Drown, accompany her. But business affairs prevent Mr. Drown's leaving San Francisco just now, and he doesn't like the role of stay-at-home husband, so his wife will forego the delights of a whirl around the world. The Worthington Ames intend to travel on the continent this summer, and Mrs. Drown will have her sister's two children under her care.

stay out here instead of going over to Europe with her aunt, Mrs. Alexander. When she went on to New York a month or two ago her friends did not expect to see her until next winter but she surprised every one by fitting back just as soon as she had officiated as bridesmaid at the wedding of Mrs. Alexander's niece. Miss Crocker brought back a trunk full of hats and fancy slippers and all sorts of the latest New York novelties for her friends out here. Mrs. Walter Martin and Virginia Joliffe were the recipients of the lion's share of these dainty tokens of Miss Crocker's generosity.

A Belle Singed

I have just heard the reason why a popular young society woman in the Burlingame set has kept in such close retirement of late. Her vanity and her hair were severely singed in a recent amateur attempt to Marcel a head of hair that was none too thick before the hot irons started a fire in the underbrush which padded out her pompadour. Even skillfully applied the Marcel wave has a tendency to violate scriptural precedent—in the end it makes one blade of hair flourish where two had grown before. But fashion insists that women be Marcelled and so we cheerfully cultivate the bald headed bacillus. The young lady who almost lost her hirsute adornment in the cause tried to get a hairdresser to Marcel her at a moment's notice and failing in that entrusted the irons to a friend who was staying with her. Fortunately the conflagration which ensued was largely confined to "store" hair, nature suffering a singeing that will take liberal applications of ointments, unguents and tonics to remove.

Footo-Swift Wedding

A wedding of more than provincial interest was so quietly celebrated at Grass Valley the other day that only the faintest echo of the wedding bells sounded in the press. Elizabeth Footo, who is now Mrs. Rodman Swift, is a young woman of noteworthy promise. She is the daughter of Arthur Footo, one of the leading mining engineers of the West, and Mary Hallock Footo, the author. Mrs. Swift has full measure of her mother's talent. Some months ago her first story appeared in the Century Magazine—an unusual medium for a maiden effort. The Footos have a beautiful home at the North Star mine where they live ideal lives. The Bourns have their summer home in Grass Valley and in spite of the difference in their purpose Maude Bourn and Elizabeth Footo have always enjoyed a peculiarly satisfying friendship. Miss Bourn was the only outsider at the wedding. Mr. Swift is a young mining engineer and comes from a distinguished Boston family.

May Sutton Will Be Disappointed

May Sutton is not likely, I hear, to gratify the wish dearest to her heart on her present visit to England for the reason that the lady whom she desires to defeat, Mrs. R. L. Chambers, has not been playing tennis this year. This is the California girl's third trip to England. She first went abroad in 1895, winning the championship of all-England in singles and also winning in the Northern tournament and Welsh championship. In the English championships she defeated Mrs. R. L. Chambers, then Miss D. K. Douglass, the holder, in the final round. Miss Douglass then was suffering from a sprained wrist and it was explained that that very likely was the reason that Miss Sutton defeated her. The following year Miss Sutton returned to England and there met defeat at the hands of Miss Douglass in the Northern and all-England championships. Miss Sutton won the Welsh championship again, Miss Douglass not playing there. Miss Sutton and Mrs. A. Sterry won the English championship in the women's doubles. The chances are that this year Mrs. Chambers will not be playing tennis when Miss Sutton is over there. Mrs. Chambers has not played in any matches recently, and it is not considered likely that she will take part at all. Her retirement is not expected to be final, as she is too good at the game to want to stay out.

When the Longworths Come

Clamoring on the heels of the announcement that the Nicholas Longworths intend to pass through San Francisco on their way to Alaska are half a dozen invitations urging them to accept the hospitality of this or that society leader. Mrs. Longworth's father distinctly opposed pulling any of the latch keys that were hung out during the trip to the Orient with the Taft party, but that jaunt was semi-official whereas this is a purely pleasurable enterprise so it may be that the Longworths will hang their hats up in Burlingame or on a Pacific Heights's hatrack. In any event Mrs. Eleanor Martin will surely entertain in their honor as she was the hostess whose invitation was singled out for acceptance during the Taft visit. It will lend a bouquet to the stale seasoning which usually dresses July to have the Longworths again served up to society.

meda. It was a reproduction of the characteristic functions of a generation ago, even to the stage settings, which had as a centerpiece wax flowers under glass, and reproduced other things in the way of ornament which we have grown to look upon as inartistic. The what-not loaded with shells and bizarre curios was there, and the crayon portraits on the wall each had a "throw" draped over the corner of the frame. The songs, recitations and music were of thirty years ago. "Curfew Shall Not Ring Tonight" was recited with proper elocutionary thrills, trills and gestures, "Jebediah" was sung, and the old parlor classic, "The Maiden's Prayer," was played as in the crossed-hands manner affected by the young ladies of our parents' time. The time when the parlor organ was absolutely necessary, although the dear one for whom it was fondly bought could not get beyond a two-piece repertoire. The illusion was carried out even in the matter of the bouquets presented to the performers, the flowers being of every variety, and jammed together in a hard and symmetrical mass after the manner once thought proper and artistic. The costuming of the participants and some of the auditors accorded with the spirit of the affair. They dressed as maidens did thirty or forty years ago. From the standpoint of beauty I cannot say that the hoopskirts and bustles were a success. But there were creations in the way of hats which show that women are cruel to themselves in following the styles instead of striving for individuality. It was thoroughly demonstrated on Saturday that plain features may be made to look beautiful by huge hat ribbons tied in fluffy bows underneath the chin, and by a wealth of flowers supplementing a poke-bonnet and clustering softly against the hair. If any of the old boys had been there they would have pointed to the quaint headgear worn on Saturday, with the remark, "That, my son, explains why girls work for a living now instead of marrying as they did thirty years ago. Let the average stenographer start to look with such fixings as that on her head and with that fluffy bow under her chin, and she'd be captured before she got half way to the office."

Professor Allardice and Professor Loeser of Stanford University with Mrs. Loeser and Miss Cotter are still at Del Monte deriving much pleasure from a daily round of the links.

The pupils of Mrs. Arthur Bridge gave an interesting studio recital on Saturday afternoon.

Professor Joseph Beringer has been presented with a number of new instructive compositions for pianoforte by his friend and former teacher Adolf Ruthardt of the Royal Conservatory of Music in Leipzig. The new publications are novel Pedal-Studies, which may fairly claim the title of concert pieces. The treatment of the pedal is so closely allied both to the contents of the work of art to be rendered and to the individuality of the performer, as also to the musical ideas of the composer, that even the most fertile brain and cleverest artist could not exhaust the variety of its effects. Professor Beringer, who is much delighted with the ingenuity of Ruthardt's latest works, will impart the novel idea in a course of lessons to his scholars.

On Saturday Mr. and Mrs. George Almer Newhall of Burlingame reached Del Monte from Paso Robles in their Packard car.

Viola Allen in "Twelfth Night"

By Edward F. O'Day

Twelfth Night! 'Tis the luxuriant flowering of Shakespeare's prime. Through its midsummer atmosphere the music of the lilting lines steals upon the ear like the sweet sound that breathes upon a bank of violets. Here is matter for a golden morning in May when the fancy of youth dallies with the innocence of love; when virtue bears an unforbidding demeanor, when there are cakes and ale and mellow wassail and ginger is hot i' the mouth. Can you imagine the pen of the playwright blotting paper with these exuberant scenes, packing them with the poetry of happy love, twisting each vital word ten giddy different ways in an excess of imagination? Can you reconstruct that world of Illyria with its lovesick duke, its roistering blades, its prankful servants and its fair young women who deepen the charm of their modest maidenhood with the fluttering boldness of budding passion? Can you forget the light airs and recollected terms of these most brisk and giddy-paced times for the more brooding music, the more spontaneous phrases of that spacious age when it was possible to write such a play as this and toss it to the groundlings without a name, bidding them carelessly, "Call it Twelfth Night or what you will; I care not?" If you cannot make the journey out of this world into that without a guide, Viola Allen will aid you. She is, in fact, the aptest person for your purpose that has come this way in many moons. She knows the highway that you must travel and will take care that you miss no open or hidden beauty of the journey. She is very fair, this guide, but willing withal when the adventures of the way require to don trunk and hose; adapt her legs to a manly strut, her hand to a manly pressure and would fain harden her gentle features to the severe lines of a mock-masculinity if that were possible. Besides she will speak you fair, beguiling your ear with beautiful sentences the while she wins your heart with a half-pouting, half-winking and altogether captivating trick of the face that makes you wish the road were longer and the company by the way more numerous. The way would be longer if clumsy carpenter hands had not hacked at the text, transposing scenes or omitting them altogether, dropping passages of pregnant import and softening words of guileless crudity to suit an imagined supersensitiveness. Too bad the complete text may be enjoyed only in the closet and that the wealth of the stage manager's resources must be showered on a mangled play. As for the company you will meet under the guidance of Miss Allen, they are surely a congenial party. Sir Andrew Aguecheek (Henry Hadfield) and Sir Toby Belch (Fuller Mellish) do not depend alone, the one on his shrunk shank and the other on his drink-ruddied face for their mirth-moving propensities. Nor is Malvolio (Sidney Herbert) beholden merely to his stiff stride and his yellow cross-gartered hose for his success. These are all fit for the companionship of Miss Allen; their humor, conscious and unconscious, contracts well with her nimble wit, their broad grins with her tender smile, their heavy joking with her delicate masking. For Olivia (Miss Zeffie Tilbury) much in praise cannot be said; and for the clown, only in dispraise that he is too conscious of his brains. There is much music on this excursion into Illyria, of which that provided for by Shakespeare cannot be too much commended and that of more modern arrangement, too much deprecated. Here are not barren lines that must be made to sing from the orchestra; the very play is music, and Miss Allen's voice falls so pleasantly on the ear that the occasional accompaniment becomes a churlish trick of disparagement.

Maude Adams in "Peter Pan"

"Peter Pan," the play in which Maude Adams will make her appearance at the Van Ness next week, is pronounced by critics the greatest dramatic fantasy that has yet come from the pen of J. M. Barrie. It was easily the greatest of the New York successes of last season. And not only is it the finest of Mr. Barrie's achievements; it is also the greatest of the triumphs of Charles Frohman's managerial career, besides being so perfectly adapted for the exploitation of the delightful personality of Maude Adams that she has surpassed in it all her previous conquests of theatre-goers. There will be matinees on Wednesday and Saturday.

Frawley Will Give Us Shaw

The Frawley company at the Novelty Theatre is playing "Leah Kleschna" before delighted audiences. This strong play in the hands of the clever people of the new Frawley organization proves a rarely fine treat for those who like the intensely dramatic class of stage offering. "Leah Kleschna" will be seen up to Sunday the 16th inst., when manager Frawley will give San Franciscans their first opportunity to enjoy Bernard Shaw's greatest comedy, "You Never Can Tell." This comedy according to the London critics is one of the cleverest of the many clever Shaw conceits. There will be Saturday and Sunday matinees during the Frawley season at the Novelty Theatre. Special prices prevail for all performances, ranging from 50c to $1.00.

From Graft to Heidelberg

That favorite drama of German student life, "Old Heidelberg," will be the attraction at the New Alcazar Theatre in the week following the conclusion of the run of "The Undertow." Eugene Walter's great political play, "The Undertow," has caught this city. This week Francis J. Heney and Detective Burns attended a performance and affirmed that the play teaches a great moral lesson. But lovers of the sweetly romantic drama will welcome the change from graft exploitation to the soothing and inspiring German play that deals with the career of an heir to the German throne, who was housed in a castle until his twentieth year and then given a delicious taste of the atmosphere of Old Heidelberg, where he fell in love. There are few plays that more poignantly stir pleasing emotions.

A Big Hit at Idora

"The Wedding Day," a charming light opera by Julian Edwards, the composer of "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," is proving a strong attraction at Idora Park and deservedly for it is one of the best comic opera performances ever given on the Coast. The splendid company is being continually strengthened and improved and is unquestionably the best comic opera organization in America today. The complete orchestra under the direction of Paul Steindorff is alone worth going miles to hear. Frank Daniels' great success, "The Ameer," will follow.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The programme announced for the week beginning this Sunday matinee is a lure which no lover of vaudeville will resist. The headliners are "The Little Comedian," Arthur Dunn and Marie Glazier, who will appear in their new skit "The Messenger Boy," which is said to be one of their most felicitous vehicles. Katherine Hayes and Sabel Johnson will appear here for the first time and introduce their novel idea, "A Dream of Baby Days." Both actresses personate society ladies who dream of childhood and apparel themselves in short frocks and Buster Brown blouses. They sing, dance and indulge in pranks that appeal to the front rows. Frederick Hawley and his company who are also new here will if all reports are true create a sensation in their melodrama, "The Bandit," next week. The Bootblack Quartette, consisting of Brouillette, Adams, Weber and Hayes, singers, dancers and comedians, of whom so much has been heard, but who have never been seen here, will be candidates for public approval. An Eastern critic says of them, "One and all hold up their side of the fun and the result is that this organization gets to the house on both floors early and often." The holdovers will be The Finneys, Les Kinners Moulin, Emerson and Baldwin and the inimitable James J. Morton. There will be new Motion Pictures, without which no Orpheum entertainment is complete.

In the Limelight

During the Frawley season at the Novelty Theatre all the new productions will receive their initial presentation on Sundays.

The final performance of "Twelfth Night" will be given by Viola Allen at the Van Ness Theatre on Saturday night.

The special Shakespearean matinee on Saturday afternoon at the Van Ness Theatre will show Viola Allen in acts from "The School for Scandal," "As You Like It," "The Merchant of Venice" and "Romeo and Juliet."

Maude Adams and her company will arrive here Sunday from the East.

Jan Kubelik, the marvelous violin virtuoso, made his reappearance in London last week after an absence of two years. The big "Queen's Hall" was crowded to its utmost capacity and the audience went wild with enthusiasm. Daniel Frohman is to bring his artist to America for a season of fifty concerts, every one of which is already booked. Through the energetic efforts of Will Greenbaum Kubelik will play here in January next.

It has been definitely arranged to open the concert season of 1907-08 in San Francisco with a series of recitals by Galski, one of the most popular artists we have ever had visit us.

Miss Maude Adams recently saw a post card which told of an automobile accident that happened to Mr. Clyde Fitch. Mr. Fitch was badly upset in a great touring car which he called Pauline Panhard. After reading the news Miss Adams exclaimed: "There, that was because he didn't take my advice. I told him he ought to name his French car Peter Pan-Hard. Peter wouldn't have upset, and if he did it would have been all right, for Peter could fly."

Senora Celia Hernandez Vda de Sarra of Havana, Cuba, has placed an order for the first Winton landaulet produced for use on this continent. Earlier Winton landaulets were manufactured for the British market only.

The latest bit of automobile art work is an immense photogravure view of the Winton factory, which stretches along the Lake Shore railroad in West Cleveland for a distance of five hundred yards.

the task of punishing the bribe-givers, and to consummate his purpose it is agreeable to him to compromise with the organized grafters. It is not for me to question his sincerity, but I cannot forbear from suggesting that acuteness of moral perception is not so much an intellectual as a moral gift. It is easy to overdo the intellectual part of the process. Fully as important as mental keenness is moral emotion. Mr. Heney should remember that while our laws against crime are dictated by reason our sympathies and emotions spring from the heart. It may be a delusion under which our sympathies are excited, but there is no delusion which has a better claim to be indulgently viewed than that under the influence of which a man abates resentment for the transgressions of the weak. Moreover it is less mischievous than a venomous judgment which ascribes to the guilty the most vicious sentiments and abominable motives and abhors the suggestion of palliative circumstances.

I am inclined to the opinion that if Mr. Heney did less toward exciting public clamor and more to keep justice from devious paths, he would command a greater volume of intelligent sympathy. It is in the fullest sense of our obligations to Mr. Heney, and of his tremendous zeal for the public weal, and in no spirit of carping censure that I remind him that public justice is endangered whenever what is thought to be expediency is put in the place of what is known to be the law. At the same time I am sensible of the many obstacles that Mr. Heney encountered in the beginning, obstacles that impelled him to extreme measures; as well am I sensible of the inevitable disposition of the lawyer habituated to the task of sending men to jail, to yield to inordinate enthusiasm. But now that he has his cases so well in hand Mr. Heney should hardly find it necessary to appeal to the public to stand for everything that a zealous prosecution might want to do. The most upright judge may find it difficult to ignore public clamor. It is very hard to be a good judge. Even good Matthew Hale who was so resentful of wickedness that he believed it part of his mission to hang poor witches, in the nervous apprehension of being suspected of selling justice, sometimes hindered and delayed it. Mr. Heney knows the weaknesses of judges and he should avoid aggravating those weaknesses. It should not be necessary to prostitute justice in order to vindicate it. Persuading the public to inject its passions into a criminal trial is not vastly different from the offense which Lord Macaulay stigmatized as infamous in discussing Mr. Montagu's biography of Lord Bacon. That offense consisted in persuading judges to confer with a law officer of the crown about criminal cases which they were afterwards to try. Today, in this country, the crown is worn by the people and the people should not be expected to interfere with the courts of justice. Our laws though designed to protect the good from the bad must also afford a shelter to the bad whenever they are too vigorously pursued. It is a crime to undervalue the rights of the wicked and when the crime is committed by a judge it is despicable. But weak judges are often inclined to it by public clamor, and it is only when public clamor subsides that they apprehend through public resentment, how contemptible was their behaviour.

in carpets and in great wooden cases, filling a lighter to the water's edge, and he himself dressed all in fleecy white, was welcomed by his friends. He got upon his mule, settled his clothes, and followed by a friend from Mecca, rode slowly through the town. Women and eunuchs followed, and the whole train emerging from the walls, clattered and slithered up the slippery street paved with rough cobble stones, and stood before the house. Cushions were brought and, sitting down, the owner's part was done, for he sat drinking tea and opening letters, handing them to his secretary to read and comment on, as if he had already lived a lifetime in the house new risen from the sand. His household silently fell into its accustomed round. A throng of wild retainers lounged about the door, which opened on a narrow street, giving no inkling of the splendor of the place. Horses and mules were hobbled in the grounds, and tents were pitched in corners, in which mysterious men dozed on their saddles, or sat drinking tea, and to which messengers arrived bearing exaggerated news about the doings of the French upon the frontier, the fights between the tribes, and of the struggles of the various European Powers for the predominance at Fez.

The owner having been a minister of State, one of those men who in the East are sure to sow the seeds of jealousy in sovereigns' minds by standing out too high above the crowd, and who had fallen into disgrace, losing most of his property, and running danger of his life, looked on his palace as a sort of exile, not that he as an Arab, probably was more attached to one place than another, but as a banishment from power, which so appeals to all men of his race, that Diocletian, the one philosopher in practice, who has sat upon a throne, to them would be a madman, and his retirement, the wisest action history has set down of any ruler in the world, incomprehensible. Their subtle, quick and yet material minds rise to few flights of fancy. That which exists, for them is absolute, and Allah sent his sun, his rain, his power or poverty for men to bear, enjoy or profit by, but not to criticise.

So in his garden, which had been made as quickly as the house, and which his taste had set with beds of Indian corn and vegetables, after the fashion of his race, that holds all gardens should be used for profit, and flowers as incidental, and not necessities as in the West, he passed some of the portion of an Oriental's life that Westerns see. Dressed all in spotless white, eager and lithe, and never still an instant when upon his feet, he roamed about much as a tiger roams about its cage. At times he sat, quiet and impassible, as is a joss upon its shrine, in one of those small narrow rooms the Moors construct in which to see their friends who cannot pass into the house. Beside him sat his secretary, a young black-bearded Arab doctor of the law, who had passed years in Mecca and at Cairo, and yet had learned no word of any tongue but Arabic. Quick and intelligent, almost vivacious in his speech, his manner courteous, and his smile as ready to break out as sun in April, and to illumine all his face with seeming kindness, some thought he was a fanatic at heart, others that in the holy city of the Haj, seeing the mystery too near, he had become indifferent, even a sceptic, as happens now and then to ardent Christians who have lived long in Rome, and become too familiar with their faith. But, if his thoughts were difficult to fathom, as no doubt the thoughts of Europeans, ever a mystery to Easterns, were to him, they were as clear as crystal beside those of the accomplished ex-minister, now fallen from his high estate, to whom the house belonged.

Jews, Moors and Europeans and an occasional out-at-elbows Turk, all thronged his doors, most of them anxious for assistance of some kind. To some he gave hard cash, to others promises, but always courteously, so that none said of him as says the adage, "The man has neither charity nor a kind word to give."

But, on the other hand, the richer Europeans, in want of lions, which had long ago retired into the Atlas Mountains beyond Fez, had hailed with acclamation his advent in their midst.

No party was complete without him, and as the dancers whirled about, with arms and shoulders bare, he sat and possibly discreetly wondered at the show.

Silent and bored, but smiling, he sat at parties, timid but haughty, for no one better than an Arab knows all the gradations of society, or is so quick to take offense at courtesies omitted, or any social sin committed by his host. Women, young, beautiful and half-undressed stood by his side, their petticoats just mingling with his flowing robes, and he who from his youth had never looked a woman in the face, except she was his sister, or his wife, stood unconcerned, although his blood, no doubt, ran boiling through his veins. Still he smiled on, a smile so enigmatical that even diplomats who put him down as a hot-headed Arab chief, must surely now and then have wondered what he thought.

The hospitalities that he received from German, English, and from French alike, he paid back amply in his new palace, in which the plaster and the paint were hardly dry, and where the flowers in the garden seemed to have been planted all in bloom, and yet which, by the virtue of the climate and the custom of the land which makes it natural to let a house decay for want of necessary care, then build another by the side of it, neither seemed old nor yet conspicuously new.

Playing at tennis with young ladies in his court, which, painted green to mitigate the glare, looked out upon the sea, he still looked dignified. Walking about the open yards, which serve in Arab houses as reception-rooms, after a dinner party, and no doubt conscious that a dozen curious eyes of carefully veiled women watched from upper windows, envying or perhaps despising the greater opportunities their European sisters had, he looked as must have looked the Emirs of Granada, when they entertained a batch of Christian knights and ladies, in the last bulwark of Islam, in Spain.

So, in the house which he had built, as it were by chance, and in the garden looking on the sea, he passed his days, for the most part, after the fashion of his fathers, half of his life shut from the world behind a curtain, from which at times came voices in dispute and sometimes songs, harsh and high pitched, but haunting as is a cricket's paeon to the sun, heard in a noonday halt beneath the trees. Sometimes he rode abroad, erect and swaying on his horse, his long white draperies afloat, with his eyes fixed upon the distance, after the manner of his ancestors who, as they rode across the sands, looked out for enemies. His, though concealed, are just as imminent, and he awaits them still, uncomprehended and incomprehensible, courteous and cruel, rash and yet diplomatic, lounging the hours away upon the cliff, from which he sees the land where his race flourished, and from which, constrained by circumstance or fate, it sunk again into the sands.

"Prophet's Landing"

Edwin Asa Dix's theme in "Prophet's Landing" is singularly like that of Basil King's "The Giant's Strength." Mr. King has chosen the richest man in the world and his "business methods" to exploit, and Mr. Dix has contented himself with a small Connecticut village and its most prosperous citizen. He has worked on a smaller scale and his colors are less brilliant, but in effect the picture is the same. The "smartness" by which one man takes advantage of his colleagues in business, the little shifts, perfectly legal, very simple, and very remunerative, by which he is able to undersell others, the resort to binding contracts in a community where heretofore the rule has been live and let live, and where moral uprightness has always been a business asset, are set forth, and the gradual weakening of neighborly respect, and family ties. Joel Harney, the central figure of this story, was the modern business man of this little community. His father had kept the general store, and Joel, after the manner of the earlier generations, came, in time, to be the assistant, and eventually the proprietor of the place. When he came into possession he discovered in himself unexpected resources. Little by little he improved his business and then began branching out, adding new departments, crowding out old neighbors and friends who dealt in a single line of goods and acting on the principle that there can be no friendships in business. Like greater men in larger fields Joel Harney kept strictly within the letter of the law, and like them also, he was a kind and indulgent father and husband, while every external success made him more keen for profits and less considerate of those with whom he dealt. While gradually losing the respect of his neighbors, it was not unnatural that his success should gain their admiration, and only to be expected that they would strive, in feeble way to emulate his example, without, however, having the largeness of vision which is given to those who know their dice are loaded. But it is not to be assumed that "Prophet's Landing" is a sordid drama of the muck-raking variety nor that all is gloom and sorrow on one side and exultation on the other. There are many quaint touches of characteristic humor, and amusing individuals, and there is a Thanksgiving entertainment at the Presbyterian church with a programme of exercises given in full which will transport readers "back home," if they have ever lived or visited in a country town. It is a question whether the Joel Harneys of real life would not rather have rejoiced in the precocious cleverness of their sons so early capable of following in their own footsteps than have been brought to a realization of their misdeeds by the tactics of the young generation, but the happy, that is to say, the moral ending is devoutly to be wished for. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

"The Turn of the Balance"

This is a mighty arraignment of the administration of the laws, both civil and criminal, an exposition of the advantages enjoyed by the rich and influential and a refutation of the theory that all men are equal before the bar of justice. Brand Whitlock has had a varied experience himself and knows whereof he speaks, and because he is cool, calm and dispassionate, avoiding the methods of the muckraker, his words carry weight. Inasmuch as he has chosen the cumulative misfortunes of one humble family to illustrate his points, his book recalls Upton Sinclair's "The Jungle," but there is this great difference: The "Pelion on Ossa Piled" in the case of the Lithuanian stockyard victims left us unmoved as to them, but mightily perturbed for our own salvation of our own stomachs from embalmed filth, while Mr. Whitlock enlists all our sympathy for the Koerners. The poor old man, who had worked for nearly forty years in the railroad yards at starvation wages, yet who had raised his family, saved some money, and had at last ventured to invest it in a little home on a mortgage, slipped and fell on a stormy night, catching his foot in an unblocked switch, and before he could extricate himself was run down by an engine, crippled for life and left without means of support. His suit for damages was delayed on one pretext or another, fought inch by inch and appealed until final judgment was given in favor of the corporation because his work finished, the employe was a trespasser at his own risk on the railroad property, and it was the ice, an act of God, which caused him to lose his footing, primarily. Archie Koerner, just returned after three years of campaigning in the Philippines, brought back with him a record for marksmanship, a distaste for soldiering, and no inclination for anything else. His stories of the service made him a welcome addition to saloon company and his good shooting attracted him to the galleries where he "made business" by the emulation of others to equal his records. He drifted into a "gang," but might have been withdrawn from it, if indeed, his inherited inclinations from steady, hard-working parents had not manifested itself in time. Unfortunately there was a trifling theft committed and though Archie had no connection with it, as a member of the gang he was caught in the police net, convicted and sentenced to a term in the workhouse. From that on, Archie was a marked man. He was a "suspicious" character, liable to arrest at any time. His experience in the corrective institution, where he met the usual fate of the weak and easily led, made acquaintances who led him still further astray was not improving. It is needless to say more, as any diligent reader of the daily news knows how much easier it is for a detective or a patrolman to pounce upon some unfortunate who has already felt the clutches of the law, when someone is wanted and fit the crime to the criminal than it is to make a bonafide search for the real culprit. A particularly brutal murder was committed. Archie, not twenty-four hours released from the penitentiary, did not even know of the occurrence, but there was a reward and a chance to make a record. The detective who had made him a convenient scapegoat before determined to fasten this crime upon him. The task was not difficult, but thought Archie had nothing to do with the Flannigan matter he was goaded to sufficient desperation to make an end of Kouka, and again we have an exemplification of the methods of prosecutors bent on a "record" and of the certainty with which punishment is meted out when a police official has been injured. Archie, though on trial for the shooting of the officer, was actually convicted by public sentiment, for the other case. The selection of the jury, the ill-concealed bias of the judge, the one-sided rulings, the witnesses, incompetent in their own natures, to give any testimony anywhere on any subject, the farcical oath to "tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," while every effort is being made to have such truth as is admitted distorted and every fact not favorable to one side or the other barred out, are patent to every observer of court proceedings. There is a grim and horrible realism in the descriptions of the third degree, the dark cells, the death chamber and the final electrocution. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

By Way of Enlightenment

Editor Town Talk: Am I correct in assuming that you do not approve the course of Mr. Francis Heney in causing the indictment of bribe-givers? I ask this question because there is some doubt in the minds of several of your constant readers as to your exact position. We know that you are against graft, and also that you condemn Mr. Heney and Mr. Spreckels for playing to the union labor gallery and for compromising with Ruef and his despicable gang. In all that we heartily concur and also in your strictures on the men whose hostility to Calhoun has been in proportion to their servility to the vulgar and indecent Cornelius. We appreciate your prejudices against charlatanerie as you call it, but we would like to know whether you have espoused the cause of bribe-givers and wish to be understood as holding that they are merely victims of extortion? —A Constant Reader.

There is nothing that affords us greater pleasure than making Town Talk understood. This is a task that is especially gratifying when it is undertaken for the benefit of constant readers who concur in our criticisms and strictures. If we have been obscure in our sentiments respecting bribe-givers it is probably because we assumed that our readers were not in need of enlightenment. Bribe-giving is a crime and no decent citizen has any quarrel with the statute which makes it a felony. As for the men who have been indicted by Mr. Heney's amazingly but most beneficently tractable grand jury we are not convinced that all are bribe-givers. Moreover we are not convinced that Mr. Heney is convinced they are bribe-givers. We shall not believe that Mr. Heney is convinced until he affirms his conviction in open court. We have great respect for Mr. Heney's judgment in some things, and it is our belief that it is his judgment that his jury has been a little too fructiferous in the matter of indictments. He should not be expected to admit as much at this time. He may never make such admission, and yet he cannot be unconscious of the improbability of his ever being able to procure the conviction of some of the men who have been brought to the bar of justice. This is where we find our pang: in the thought that Mr. Heney is doomed to an inglorious fiasco. It is this thought, buttressed by a knowledge of many details with which the public are not familiar, that has impelled us to adverse criticism of the course of the stern and impetuous little attorney. We have reflected that more harm than good will ensue from his activities if it should finally appear that boodling is by no means a hazardous occupation. Not only will harm result from his failure to send Ruef and his gang to the penitentiary and his inability to convict the men from whom they received their boodle, but also from the great shock that may yet be given to the slumbering senses of men when they come to a comprehensive appreciation of all that has been done to consummate the great triumph over corruption.

Heney's Glorious Achievements

Like the stone of Sisyphus, the more laboriously and with unnatural effort a resisting object has been rolled up to a high summit, with so much the more thundering violence does it return. When reaction sets in, as it probably will before long, it will be attended with something in the nature of a storm. We are gravely apprehensive of the outcome. Sanguine as we were for awhile of the ability of Mr. Heney to give this city a splendid lesson in morals, it is in mournful mood that we view the symptoms of vitality as they disappear one by one. With pardonable egoism the cocksure attorney, we fear, has miscalculated the limits of his genius for jailbirding. Lulled by the breeze of popular acclaim he has permitted himself to be wafted into the breakers. Impetuosity is Heney's besetting vice. It was that vice that exposed him to ridicule when he made his absurd boast one memorable night in the Mechanics' Pavilion. He made it, as we know, on the strength of a mere rumor, and when his bluff was called he fled to Washington. Fortuitous circumstances for which he is indebted to Mr. Spreckels have enabled him to redeem himself in a most felicitous manner. And as nothing succeeds like success the ovations to Mr. Heney have been like a continuous performance. His recent career has been that of a man of destiny. Lampooned two years ago for the vanity of his utterances, today he is a hero wearing his unblushing honors after the manner of a Napoleon whose course of Empire was designed with true genius and executed with unerring accuracy. Far be it from Town Talk to bedim the lustre of his achievements. We merely purpose analyzing them. His record speaks for itself. It matters not that we now know that his passionate pronouncements promulgated at brief intervals after his appointment by District Attorney Langdon were all wind, and that the trapping of Lonergan by Burns happened in time to prevent the decay of public hope. Success is the sole standard of measurement, and it would be idle for anybody to attempt to detract from the merit of Mr. Heney's achievements up to date. He has been successful and that is sufficient for us to know. But luck is not eternal. It is possible that Mr. Heney may yet shrink from facing expectations that have been so highly raised by sundry indictments against numerous rich citizens. The published testimony taken before the grand jury reveals an amazing sterility of material upon which to base a demand for conviction. It is inconceivable that Mr. Heney can expect such a rope of sand as the case presents to remain intact under the rough handling of able lawyers.

Ruef's Testimony

According to the daily press which has been so serviceable to Mr. Heney the testimony taken before the Grand Jury was conclusive of the guilt of the indicted. But as a matter of fact that testimony is so weak that the prosecution would not have given it out for publication had it not been deemed important to communicate to the public in advance of the Schmitz trial the fact that Ruef had confessed to sharing certain boodle with the Mayor. This was a triumph of Heney's strategy. It was a masterly coup; one of the strokes of Mr. Heney's genius that commands admiration and gives some buoyancy to the lingering, drooping hope that he will yet be able to smile through the bars of a prison cell at the wicked victims of his ingenuity. It was only after reading Ruef's confession that we adequately appreciated this consummate ingenuity of Mr. Spreckels's lawyer. For it was then that we understood why the prosecution announced for publication two weeks ago that Ruef's testimony had not been reduced to writing, and that it was insufficient—in the nature of a lemon, said the reporter—and that he would forfeit all claims to leniency unless he "came through" with more substantial matter. Indubitably it was not Mr. Heney, but what gentleman connected with the prosecution, if any, did inspire the publication of sentiments that savor of a willingness to put a premium on perjury and suggest the glad consent of a Superior Judge to serve as a red-rubber stamp in the pocket of an attorney. Those sentiments were printed, and as it is notorious that the prosecution has ably conducted most of its case through the newspapers it is reasonable to infer that this was not an extraordinary instance of a reporter's dream slipping into type. But let us examine the testimony of Abe Ruef in the Gas Company's case, and then let us ponder the action of Mr. Heney's grand jury. Speaking of the money received from the Gas Company, Ruef said:

"I received a fee for attorney's services of $1,000 per month for two or three months prior to that, and then finding it, as I explained, necessary to request or suggest an additional fee, which I thought would be covered by the payment of $20,000, I suggested that to Mr. Drum. I wish to say also, in justice to him, I never told him it was to be paid to these men.

"Q.—That isn't the way of doing that kind of business, is it? A.—I don't know what the way of doing that kind of business is, except as far as it has concerned myself. I never told any living being that I was receiving or accepting money on any proposition to be given supervisors, except Mr. Gallagher."

Of course if we assume that nobody ever gave Ruef any money except for bribery purposes we shall not consider it important that he never told any man from whom he received money that it was to be used as a bribe. But is that a fair assumption? According to the Prosecution's system of reasoning it is a fair assumption. But Mr. Heney's system of reasoning has not yet been grafted upon our system of jurisprudence. If during Ruef's career as boss of the Schmitz dispensation he received "fees" which he did not find it necessary to divide or which he made no pretense of dividing; if people had reason to suppose that Ruef would not divide anything that he could keep intact; if they had reason to suppose that in some matters he could exact favors from certain miserable officials who were indebted to him for their jobs—if all these things are plausible, may not a jury be found that will be reluctant to resolve all doubt in all cases against the citizens with whom Ruef did business? It is because we fear that a jury of this temper is not impossible of impanelment in this city, that we have grave misgivings of Mr. Heney's ability to triumph over the forces of iniquity. These misgivings crowd upon us when we consider Ruef's testimony in the Gas Case. For Ruef said among other things:

"At the time of the fixing of the gas rates some of the supervisors, as I was informed by Supervisor Gallagher, insisted upon fixing an extremely low rate, such a rate as would have been ruinous to the business of the company, a rate which neither I nor any one who had looked up the question would have considered under any circumstances to be reasonable, proper or maintainable, and said they were determined absolutely to reduce those rates."

In the circumstances it may be argued that the average public service corporation would have been quite willing to pay more than a hundred thousand dollars to the Supervisors, and that when Ruef asked for only twenty thousand, it was most unlikely that Drum supposed that he intended to distribute it among eighteen men. Indeed we fear that a jury composed of men that have not been trained in the atmosphere which Foreman Oliver of the Heney jury breathes will be inclined to doubt that Mr. Drum gave the money as a bribe or for any purpose save that of engaging Ruef's influence. And we fear also that when the pee-pul rebel against having their thinking done for them in these matters by the daily press, and come to realize that when Ruef exacted his fee his gang of grafters were preparing to ruin the business of a public service corporation it will occur to them that when the subtleties of difference between extortion and bribery are too delicately spun there may result condemnations more criminal than the crimes they condemn.

The Qualities of a Prosecutor

We hope that we have made clear our reasons for doubting that Mr. Heney is convinced that all the men who have been indicted at his instigation are bribe-givers. We also hope that it will not be assumed that we suspect Mr. Heney of maliciously procuring the indictment of anybody. Mr. Heney is merely performing the functions of a special prosecutor for which he will no doubt be handsomely rewarded. He is not to be influenced by his prejudices or his affections or his sentimental obligations. He is a stern patriot animated by love of country and hatred of graft. Cold and austere is Mr. Heney, divinely endowed with the peculiar qualities that make for success in the honorable office which he is superbly filling. It is an office in which lawyers mindful of the importance of discouraging criminals are sometimes unconsciously persuaded to acts of oppression. It requires unusual strength of character and a judicial temperament to avoid, in the performance of the functions of this office, being carried too far by zeal for the vindication of justice. We believe that Mr. Heney was carried too far in the case of the Parkside victims of Ruef's extortion. Despite our aversion to bribery we confess a weak and unbecoming sympathy for those gentlemen, who, by the way, are not millionaires and in whose behalf we may protest without exciting the suspicion of Mr. Heney. Indeed we believe that Mr. Heney on reflection is likely to reconsider the indictment of Mr. Brobeck, the attorney, who had no financial interest in the Parkside enterprise; who, unlike Mr. Heney's friend, Mr. Cope, had no interview with Mr. Ruef; who did nothing but draw an ordinance for his clients; whose only offense so far as we have been able to ascertain is his relationship through marriage with Gavin McNab, a gentleman who must be properly subdued before the Democratic machine can be taken out of his hands. It is unlikely that Mr. Brobeck, a young lawyer, whose standing at the bar, even now that he is under indictment is not inferior to that of Mr. Heney; whose reputation for integrity in this community today is not inferior to that of a single juror who voted to put a blot on his character,—it is unlikely we say, that he or the men by whom he was employed and from whom money was extorted will be seriously prosecuted for bribery.

Tests of Municipal Ownership

The people of this city are still being advised that there is nothing so nearly approximating a catholicon as government ownership of public utilities. It insures better service, shorter hours, higher wages and less wickedness. Of the many fascinating innovations now being recommended to a guileless millenium-loving public there is none so rich in inducements, so susceptible of adaptation to the filling of long felt wants as government ownership. Where any public utility corporation is rendering an inferior quality of service, there may government ownership be urged with absolute confidence of a sympathetic hearing. Where workingmen are dissatisfied because they have to work almost as long as their employers for less money despite their muscular capital and sense of the dignity of labor, there may government ownership be advocated with no uneasiness as regards the temper of the audience. For workingmen know they are ruled by demagogues, and it is easy for them to reason that government ownership spells demagogic ownership. Wherever graft is commanding special attention there may the praises of government ownership be chanted, and there may it be asserted without much fear of contradiction that graft is purely a by-product of private ownership, and that the abolition of private ownership would be necessarily fatal to corruption. But notwithstanding all the engaging theories respecting the beneficent potentialities of private ownership, practically it has not gratified expectations. We are constantly being informed of sporadic instances of successful tests, but by statistical data it has been most convincingly demonstrated not only that government ownership fails to yield all the glorious benefits which are claimed for it but that it is conducive to far greater ills and annoyances than are incident to private ownership. Even in this country where its advocates assert that it has not been given a fair trial there are over fifty cases in which the experience of our own little Berkeley across the bay has been exactly duplicated. In other words there have been abandoned over fifty plants for the construction of which communities incurred a bonded indebtedness on which they are still paying interest. And when we look to Europe for evidence of the advantages to be derived from government ownership we find very little to persuade us of its virtues. The two countries that have been most partial to it are France and Germany. It is the opinion of many statesmen that France is again drifting to a grave crisis and that the untoward impetus which it has received is entirely due to the widespread system of government ownership, which is responsible for one of the most infamous political machines of which there is any record in history. In Germany government ownership has produced great disgust. In no other country except France can one examine the relative efficiency and economy of State managed and privately managed public services to greater advantage. The bureaucracy there is more numerous and its attitude toward the general public is more autocratic than elsewhere among civilized people except in Russia. In Berlin the chief branches of public service, the Metropolitan railroad and the telephone system, are operated by the Government. The railroad is the object of derision to all travellers, at least to the travellers from America. When it was built a quarter of a century ago it was regarded as a masterpiece of technical achievement, but it has steadily deteriorated ever since. Influential incompetence is at its head, it is overloaded with personnel, and it is pervaded by the bureaucratic spirit of contempt for the rights of the public. As for the Berlin telephone system, it is notoriously the worst in the world. Perhaps here in San Francisco where we do things in deference to a fine civic spirit we shall show the world some of the superior advantages of public ownership, not with our City Hall which we have not yet begun to repair, but with our Geary street railroad.

One Lesson of the Boise Trial

Since Harry Orchard, the confessed murderer of former Governor Steunenberg of Idaho and of at least a score of other men, took the stand at Boise to give evidence in the trial of William D. Haywood, the secretary of the Western Federation of Miners, the over-enthusiastic union-laborites all over the country who have been active in the organization of Moyer and Haywood clubs must have come to a sobering realization of their ill-advised hastiness of action. These unthinking protagonists, having already gone to the extreme in their championship of the indicted officers of the federation, now find themselves committed to a cause upon which defeat and complete discredit are lowering and are naturally embarrassed and hesitant as to the best means of withdrawing gracefully from an untenable position. At meetings held in New York and other large cities during the time that a jury to try Haywood was being slowly impanelled, the most blatant advocacy of the cause of Moyer, Haywood and Pettibone was announced and the most unmitigated criticism of President Roosevelt was indulged in because he had dared to characterize these three as undesirable citizens. At that time—and it was only a few days ago—a large section of organized labor in this country stood pledged to support Moyer, Haywood and Pettibone guilty or innocent. But since Harry Orchard began the unfolding of his narrative of fiendish crimes, committed, he insists, at the instigation of the inner circle of the Western Federation of Miners and paid for by the three leaders of that organization, a most significant silence has taken the place of the erstwhile noisy protestations of confidence. True, there are still to be heard at intervals feeble declarations that the story told by Orchard is a fabrication and that he will be entirely discredited before the trial proceeds much further, but there is none of the aggressiveness of unalterable faith in these spasmodic statements. It is quite evident that the demagogic element in the labor organizations is learning a bitter but salutary lesson in the advisability of tempering passion with common sense and in distinguishing between the loyalty due honest, law-abiding leaders and the oblique approval of criminals. Equally obvious is it that many who never understood before the anarchic trend of the principles hotly espoused and untiringly inculcated by many labor leaders are coming to a tardy appreciation of their dangerous direction. Greater good could hardly come out of the Boise trials than this. It may be that Harry Orchard's confession will be discredited; possibly there is truth in the assertion that he has been used as the unscrupulous and lying tool of the Mine Owners in their warfare on the Western Federation. There is just a possibility of this, as there is just a possibility that anything which does not contradict reason may be true; but whatever the outcome of these trials—whether or not it is proved that Moyer, Haywood and Pettibone were the instigators of the assassination of Steunenberg and hired Orchard to do the dastardly deed—good will have resulted if union labor learns from them the necessity of temperance in its advocacy of suspected persons and the advantage of less whole-souled trust in some of its leaders.

Democracy and the Presidential Election

While the Republican party, by an interesting process of elimination, is gradually reducing its available number of presidential candidates to a unit which is not Taft or Foraker, Fairbanks or Cannon or Knox, the opposing organization which lives on the memory of Jefferson, Jackson and Cleveland is slowly preparing for the not-too-hopeful fight. Candidates for the Democratic nomination are not numerous, for reasons not difficult to surmise. Three consecutive defeats have discouraged most of the ambitious men of the party and leave only Bryan as an announced candidate with Joseph Folk not unwilling that his name should be discussed and Colonel Henry Watterson of Kentucky nursing the cryptic boom of a "dark horse" whose name he refuses steadfastly to reveal. It is not a situation to inspire enthusiasm, but neither for the matter of that, is the line-up in the Republican ranks, so perhaps it is too early to make pessimistic prophecies audent the foredoom of the Democratic party. Nevertheless there is a widespread opinion that another defeat is likely to be the portion of the Democracy and an equally positive conviction that such defeat, if it comes, will be fatal to the Democratic party as at present organized. In other words the notion is prevalent that in the next Presidential election the Democratic party will be fighting for its life. With death implied in defeat it should certainly make a tremendous struggle; yet is there, so far, no indication of preparedness for the fray and no sign of a serious disposition to make ready. Bryan, without whom none may reckon in casting up the resources of the party, has forsaken his will-o-the-wisp of governmental ownership of railroads to chase the butterfly of the initiative and referendum in national affairs, just as he relinquished bimetallism to run after government ownership. His enduring capacity for fresh enthusiasms is no doubt admirable but it is also the despair of the party leaders who are looking for a stout plank whereon they may float a candidate to victory and who will find the Republicans, so at least they claim, stealing all their old issues, not excluding that of tariff revision. Watterson, while not engaged in the dissemination of dark hints about his mysterious candidate, is trying his voice on the shout of "back to the constitution" and finds it a high-sounding and (to him) a satisfactory war-cry, but so far nobody of any consequence is rooting with him. Meanwhile there looms in the background the figure of Hearst, who seems destined to vie with Bryan as the most undaunted of defeated candidates. Having read himself out of the Democratic party and having convinced himself that the mantle of Jefferson and Jackson has fallen on his shoulders and that the true ark of the covenant of Democracy rests in the sanctuary of the Independence League, he is doing all in his power to disrupt the party, no doubt with very shrewd notions as to the valuable salvage that may come to its shipwreck. Hearst, on the outside, is perhaps as dangerous an obstacle to Democratic success as when he was forcing his way to the innermost mysteries. Those who see an end of the Democratic party in one more national defeat are convinced that in "the socialized agglomeration," to use a Wattersonian phrase, which will succeed the present organization, Hearst will hold the whip-hand. No greater spur to Democratic efforts should be needed than this forecast; but unfortunately it is a strictly intraparty consideration and will not suffice to assure success.

“Monsieur Alphonse”

By L. R.

All Paris, the dispatches tell us, is in a ferment over the revival at the Theatre Francais of “Monsieur Alphonse.” What memories of the past are awakened by the title of that play!

Thirty odd years ago Alexandre Dumas the younger wrote “Monsieur Alphonse,” a play which stirred the conscience of France to its depths, which helped the country, indeed, to shape itself a new conscience. The author handled in it the subject of conjugal infidelity and the rights of illegitimate children, and he did so with a boldness to which the public were unaccustomed. Zola had not yet made his mark, and the literary models of the time had formed their ideals among the snobs and upstarts of the Tuileries and of Compiègne. Alexandre Dumas’ sincerity came at a moment when the country, just recovering from the shock of the war, thirsted for something different from the frivolity of the Second Empire. He was himself an illegitimate child in the eyes of the law, and yet privileged because, however born, Dumas the younger could feel proud in being the child of Dumas the elder. The attachment between father and son was tender and life-long.

Yet Alexandre Dumas fils felt that he was by reason of his birth the champion of children unfortunate enough not to know their parents. His views on a wife’s infidelity he set forth in a pamphlet which appeared about the same time as the play, and was soon out of print. His advice to the husband, “Kill her!” must be taken as a paradox. It meant simply that as long as French law refused to recognize divorce there must be hopeless situations in French families. His logic was pitiless in its form only. His real feeling he shows in “Monsieur Alphonse.”

This play, which enriched the French language by a new word—an “Alphonse” is the lowest state of infamy to which a man may sink—and which, indirectly, enriched the French Statute-book by a new law, the Naquet Divorce Act, came out originally at the Porte Saint Martin Theatre in 1873, with Mlle. Blanche Pierson in the leading feminine role of Raymonde de Montaiglin. She was then in the early bloom of her creole—creole of Bourbon Island—loveliness, which was, above all things, remarkable for harmoniousness. Alphonsine, the comic actress of the Palais Royal, in the part of “Madame Guichard,” relieved the long-winded dialogues of the leading personages with her side-splitting drollery and fun, which closely approached low comedy. Her humor was rather masculine than feminine, and full of good humor with no nervous effect.

She it was who suggested the title of the play. Alexandre Dumas was perplexed about the name he should give his hero, a very low sort of Don Juan—not even a Don Juan. He was afraid of actions at law from namesakes in real life. Alphonsine came to his help. “Since the hero is my lover,” she argued, “you may call him Alphonse. As long as I do not object, I do not see who has a right to.” And thus it came to be that the pale-faced, professionless individuals who prowl about the night haunts of Paris qui s’amuse are to this day called “Alphonse.” “Monsieur Alphonse” was more than a play: it was a political pamphlet, a plea for divorce—a thing prohibited by the Catholic Church, and consequently forbidden in all Catholic countries—and also a vindication of the rights of illegitimate children.

This pamphlet has wrought its purpose: divorce now exists in France, children born outside the pale of marriage are no longer—or much less than formerly—social outcasts. Legislation is now quite different, public taste has altered. Dumas was ahead of his times. Thirty years ago his play created a profound sensation because the author’s viewpoint was novel. Now it is the point of view of the man in the street, but the play, say the dispatches, has awakened keen interest.

The story is as follows: Octave, a young ruined bourgeois, is a sort of Don Juan. He is what one would call nowadays a degenerate—a word that was not used thirty years ago. He is about to marry a former housemaid, the widow of a wealthy hotel-keeper who went through the form of marriage with her during his last illness, and left her his fortune. Mme. Guichard’s ambition, with a fortune of several thousand a year, has been to marry a “gentleman,” and in Octave, who is five or six years her junior, she has found her life’s dream. The scene opens at the house of Captain de Montaiglin, of the French Navy. The Captain is getting on in years. He is leaving on the next day for a long cruise, which will be his last one, and then he will retire. He says to Mme. de Montaiglin, a former village schoolmistress, who is his junior by fifteen years: “Do not thank me for having raised you out of poverty. You have made my life worth living. For five years you have been my companion, and now, in my old age, you will be my friend.”

In the first scene the author brings us into the heart of his subject. Mme. de Montaiglin is talking with Octave. Her swollen eyes show that she has been crying. Octave is shrugging his shoulders. They are talking about a terrible secret. It was a long, long time ago. Octave was not twenty years of age. He met the young lady who was to become Mme. de Montaiglin and fate took its course. There was a daughter, whose birth was kept a profound secret. She was sent to the country to be brought up by peasants. Mme. de Montaiglin sees the child as often as she can. Octave goes down to see her, too, from time to time, but under an assumed name as “Monsieur Alphonse.” Now Alphonse has just become engaged to the wealthy Mme. Guichard. But she has no idea of the existence of this daughter. Octave is bent on getting the fortune as well as the hand of Mme. Guichard, and he now feels that his daughter, a girl of thirteen, is indeed an encumbrance. So he asks Mme. de Montaiglin to take his daughter off his hands. Octave tells the Captain a plausible story. The daughter’s mother, he says, is dead. The Captain agrees to receive the girl as if she were his own child.

This arrangement is upset by the arrival of Mme. Guichard, whose part in the play is that of the “comic Irishwoman.” This excellent lady was struck by certain mysterious absences of her fiancé. With the help of a private detective she traced him down to a country farm, whence he was seen to return to Paris with a little girl, and the pair were followed to the house of Captain and Mme. de Montaiglin.

The incidents of the plot now follow upon one another with a rapidity that leaves you no time to breathe. The Captain discovers that the little girl is his wife's daughter, and that Octave is the father. Mme. de Montaiglin drops on her knees awaiting her husband's sentence. He generously forgives her; as he says: "You have sinned, you have suffered, you have atoned, you have repented; what right have I to punish you?" Every sentence in this scene shows the hand of a master. The good Mme. Guichard now discovers the existence of the little girl. "I will adopt your child," she tells her fiance; "I make this a sine qua non condition of our marriage." Octave, or "Monsieur Alphonse," who was so anxious to get rid of his daughter, is now equally anxious to get her back. Too late, however. The Captain has adopted her, and "Monsieur Alphonse" loses, not only his daughter, but the large fortune he was to have secured by his marriage, because Mme. Guichard, dazzled at first by his fine manners, now sees the sort of scamp he really is and sends him about his business.

One Autumn Night

Translated from the Russian of Maxim Gorky by R. Nisbet Bain.

Once in the autumn I happened to be in a very unpleasant and inconvenient position. In the town where I had just arrived and where I knew not a soul, I found myself without a farthing in my pocket and without a night's lodging.

Having sold during the first few days every part of my costume, without which it was still possible to go about, I passed from the town into the quarter called "Yste," where were the steamship wharves—a quarter which during the navigation season fermented with boisterous laborious life, but now was silent and deserted, and indeed we were in the last days of October.

Dragging my feet along the moist sand, and obstinately scrutinizing it with the desire to discover in it any sort of fragment of food, I wandered alone among the deserted buildings and warehouses, and thought how good it would be to get a fair bellyful.

In our present state of culture hunger of the mind is more quickly satisfied than hunger of the body. You wander about the streets, you are surrounded by buildings not bad-looking from the outside and—you may safely say it—not so badly furnished inside, and the sight of them may excite within you stimulating ideas about architecture, hygiene, and many other wise and high-flying subjects. You may meet warmly and neatly dressed folks—all very polite, and turning away from you tactfully, not wishing offensively to notice the lamentable fact of your existence. Well, well, the mind of a hungry man is always better nourished and healthier than the mind of the well-fed man—and there you have a situation from which you may draw a very ingenious conclusion in favor of the ill fed!

The evening was approaching, the rain was falling, and the wind blew violently from the north. It whistled in the empty booths and shops, blew into the plastered window-panes of the taverns, and whipped into a foam the wavelets of the river which splashed noisily on the sandy shore, casting high their white crests, racing one after another into the dim distance, and leaping impetuously over one another's shoulders.

It seemed as if the river felt the proximity of winter, and was running at random away from the fetters of ice which the north wind might well have flung upon her that very night. The sky was heavy and dark, down from it swept incessantly scarcely visible drops of rain, and the melancholy elegy in nature all around me was emphasized by a couple of battered and misshapen willow-trees, and a boat, bottom upwards, that was fastened to their roots.

The overturned canoe with its battered keel, and the old and miserable trees rified by the cold wind . . . everything around me bankrupt, barren, and dead, and the sky flowing with undryable tears . . . everything around waste and gloomy . . . it seemed as if everything were dead, leaving me alone among the living, and me also a cold death awaited.

And I was then eighteen years old—a good time!

I walked and walked along the cold wet sand, making my chattering teeth warble in honor of cold and hunger, and suddenly, as I was carefully searching for something to eat behind one of the empty crates, I perceived behind it, crouching on the ground, a figure in woman's clothes dank with the rain and clinging fast to her stooping shoulders. Standing over her, I watched to see what she was doing. It appeared that she was digging a trench in the sand with her hands, digging away under one of the crates.

"Why are you doing that?" I asked, crouching down on my heels quite close to her.

She gave a little scream and was quickly on her legs again. Now that she stood there staring at me, with her wide-open grey eyes full of terror, I perceived that it was a girl of my own age, with a very pleasant face embellished unfortunately by three large blue marks. This spoiled her, although these blue marks had been distributed with a remarkable sense of proportion, one at a time, and all of equal size: two under the eyes, and one a little bigger on the forehead just over the bridge of the nose. This symmetry was evidently the work of an artist well inured to the business of spoiling the human physiognomy.

The girl looked at me, and the terror in her eyes gradually died out . . . She shook the sand from her hands, adjusted her cotton head-gear, cowered down, and said:

"I suppose you too want something to eat? Dig away then!—my hands are tired. Over there"—she nodded her head in the direction of a booth—"there is bread for certain . . . and sausages too . . . That booth is still carrying on business."

I began to dig. She, after waiting a little and looking at me, sat down beside me and began to help me.

We worked in silence. I cannot say now whether I thought at that moment of the criminal code, of morality, of proprietorship, and all the other things about which, in the opinion of many experienced persons, one ought to think every moment of one's life. Wishing to keep as close to the truth as possible, I must confess that apparently I was so deeply engaged in digging under the crate that I completely forgot about everything else except this one thing: what could be inside that crate.

The evening drew on. The grey, mouldy, cold fog grew thicker and thicker around us. The waves roared with a hollower sound than before, and the rain pattered down on the boards of the crate more loudly and more frequently. Somewhere or other the night-watchman began springing his rattle.

"Has it got a bottom or not?" softly inquired my assistant. I did not understand what she was talking about, and I kept silence.

"I say, has the crate got a bottom, for if it has we shall vainly try to break into it. Here we are digging a trench, and we may, after all, come upon nothing but solid boards. How shall we take them off? Better smash the lock—it is a wretched lock."

Good ideas rarely visit the heads of women, but, as you see, they do visit them sometimes. I have always valued good ideas, and have always tried to utilize them as far as possible.

Having found the lock, I tugged at it and wrenched off the whole thing. My accomplice immediately stooped down and wriggled like a serpent into the gaping-open, four-cornered cover of the crate whence she called to me approvingly, sotto voce:

"You're a brick!"

Nowadays a little crumb of praise from a woman is dearer to me than a whole dithyramb from a man, even though he be more eloquent than all the ancient and modern orators put together. Then, however, I was less amiably disposed than I am now, and, paying no attention to the compliment of my comrade, I asked her curtly and anxiously:

"Is there anything?"

In a monotonous tone she set about calculating our discoveries.

"A basketful of bottles—thick furs—a sunshade—an iron pail."

All this was uneatable. I felt that my hopes had vanished. . . . But suddenly she exclaimed vivaciously:

"Aha! here it is!"

"What?"

"Bread . . . a loaf . . . it's only wet . . . take it!"

A loaf flew to my feet, and after it herself, my valiant comrade. I had already bitten off a morsel, stuffed it in my mouth, and was chewing it . . .

"Come, give me some too! . . . And we mustn't stay here . . . Where shall we go?" she looked inquiringly about on all sides. . . . It was dark, wet, and boisterous.

"Look! there's an upset canoe yonder . . . let us go there."

"Let us go then!" And off we set, demolishing our booty as we went, and filling our mouths with large portions of it . . . The rain grew more violent, the river roared; from somewhere or other resounded a prolonged mocking whistle—just as if Someone great who feared nobody was whistling down all earthly institutions and along with them this horrid autumnal wind and us its heroes. This whistling made my heart throb painfully, in spite of which I greedily went on eating, in which respect the girl, walking on my left hand, kept even pace with me.

"What do they call you?" I asked her, why I know not.

"Natasha," she answered shortly, munching loudly.

I stared at her—my heart ached within me, and then I stared into the mist before me, and it seemed to me as if the inimical countenance of my Destiny was smiling at me enigmatically and coldly.

The rain scourged the timbers of the skiff incessantly, and its soft patter induced melancholy thoughts, and the wind whistled as it flew down into the boat's battered bottom—through a rift, where some loose splinters of wood were rattling together—a disquieting and depressing sound. The waves of the river were splashing on the shore, and sounded so monotonous and hopeless, just as if they were telling something unbearably dull and heavy, which was boring them into utter disgust, something from which they wanted to run away and yet were obliged to talk about all the same. The sound of the rain blended with their splashing, and a long-drawn sigh seemed to be floating above the overturned skiff—the endless, laboring sigh of the earth, injured and exhausted by the eternal changes from the bright and warm summer to the cold misty and damp autumn. And the wind blew continually over the desolate shore and the foaming river—blew and sang its melancholy songs. . . .

Our position beneath the shelter of the skiff was utterly devoid of comfort; it was narrow and damp, tiny cold drops of rain dribbled through the damaged bottom . . . gusts of wind penetrated it. We sat in silence and shivered with cold. I remember that I wanted to go to sleep. Natasha leaned her back against the hull of the boat and curled herself up into a tiny ball. Embracing her knees with her hands, and resting her chin upon them, she stared doggedly at the river with wide-open eyes; on the pale patch of her face they seemed immense, because of the blue marks below them. She never moved, and this immobility and silence—I felt it—gradually produced within me a terror of my neighbor. I wanted to talk to her, but I knew not how to begin.

It was she herself who spoke.

"What a cursed thing life is!" she exclaimed plainly, abstractedly, and in a tone of deep conviction.

But this was no complaint. In these words there was too much of indifference for a complaint. This simple soul thought according to her understanding, thought and proceeded to form a certain conclusion which she expressed aloud, and which I could not confuse for fear of contradicting myself. Therefore I was silent. And she, as if she had not noticed me, continued to sit there immovable.

"Even if we croaked . . . what then . . ."

Natasha began again, this time quietly and reflectively. And still there was not one note of complaint in her words. It was plain that this person, in the course of her reflections on life, was regarding her own case, and had arrived at the conviction that in order to preserve herself from the mockeries of life, she was not in a

Poetry

I am the reality of things that seem;
 The great transmuter, melting loss to gain,
 Languor to love, and fining joy from pain.
 I am the waking, who am called the dream;
 I am the sun, all light reflects my gleam;
 I am the altar-fire within the fane;
 I am the force of the refreshing rain;
 I am the sea to which flows every stream.
 I am the utmost height there is to climb;
 I am the truth, mirrored in fancy's glass;
 I am stability, all else will pass;
 I am eternity, encircling time;
 Kill me, none may; conquer me, nothing can—
 I am God's soul, fused in the soul of man.

Perspective Impressions

How about the Milk graft, Mr. Heney? Have you forgotten it? Nothing quite so bad, you know, as poisoning babies.

When the Graft prosecution began with its flourish of trumpets we were told by Mr. Spreckels that there would be no favorites. Why was the Milk graft investigation dropped so soon? We are merely curious.

In our present spasm of zeal for the vindication of justice, how singular that we should view so calmly the shipping of dynamite to this city and to the homes of strikers. Is it because we have so much confidence in the law-abiding character of union labor? Do we really believe that Patrick Calhoun imported the dynamite to scare the people off his ears?

Why has the Home Telephone inquiry been put on the hook? We hope that it has not become advisable to refrain from going too high up.

The Hon. James D. Phelan is like unto the shrinking violet. From faraway New York he points to his protegee the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels as the head and front of the graft prosecution. Jimmy is a wonder at standing from under.

It is suggested that the men indicted for bribe-giving should scorn their constitutional rights and go to trial to establish their innocence. But they have been watching justice take its wild and woolly course in Judge Dunne's court, and the spectacle gives them pause.

A Poet for Senator

Joaquin Miller says he "has found it in his heart" to be a candidate for Senator from Oregon. Is it a strange place to look for a political ambition?—in a poet's heart? I know that the ribald will jeer and that the sordid will sneer; but let me tell these that Oregon could not honor herself more than by honoring her poet—Joaquin Miller is Oregon's poet first, as he is the poet of the Sierra by adoption and the world's poet finally. Why should not this poet "brush the dust from the seat once occupied by old Jim Lane" and remove the stain from the curule chair disgraced by John H. Mitchell? And a poet in the Senate of the United States! Think of it!

From Tadmor to Babylon

Forty years ago Joaquin Miller's name first appeared in print. He delivered the valedictory class poem at Columbia College, Eugene, Oregon, in 1859. His next poem to appear in print was called "Is It Worth While," and it appeared in 1866. Then came "Specimens," a thin book of thin verses at which some people laughed and others grieved as those grieve who also deride. "Joaquin et al." was published in 1868 in Portland, Oregon, and although it won brave words from Bret Harte in the Overland Monthly, it merely served to advertise the young poet as a vain imitator of Byron and a pretentious upstart from the wilderness where rolls the Oregon and hears no sound save its own dashings—surely no good could come out of that Nazareth. So it may be said that the poet suffered on behalf of the land that gave him his nascent inspiration. Why should not Oregon repay her poet for that early suffering on her behalf? One day the poet who had taught the youth of the backwoods of Oregon, and who had soiled his white soul with the defilement of things called Laws but were in fact no better than subterfuges for the undoing of his fellow men—one day this poet came up out of the wilderness and stood in marts of Babylon. But his pilgrimage thither led past the grave of Burns where he knelt in reverence to the muse that sang of things human and humane; past the tomb of Byron, lover of liberty and the rights of the oppressed; past the mausoleum of Goethe and the marbles that mark the last resting place of Schiller—even through battlefields coagulated with the blood of heroes and slaves, to Babylon; for as he has himself said it, the poet must be loyal, loyal not only to his God and his country, but loyal, loving to the great masters who have nourished him. In London he lived near Whitechapel where Bayard Taylor had lived, and bared his head in the Abbey where the great poets sleep; then he lived at Camberwell, because Browning was born there; then at Hemmingford Road, because Tom Hood died there. Finally he pawned his watch because his stomach rebelled against the long delay in the publication of "Pacific Poems." Even the publishers turned him away from their doors; thinking him but a mendicant on the paths of Parnassus. But finally the poems were published and with the "press notices" that were grudgingly bestowed on the little book (a miserable hundred copies of which only were printed) the exile boldly approached the king of all the publishers and told him that a great poet had come to Babylon. The king was surprised but he listened and eventually he believed. Thereafter the name of Joaquin Miller, the long-haired poet of the backwoods of Oregon, was a world poet; for genius must come to its own even in Babylon.

Reaching for Their Souls

Now the poet that made Oregon famous is once more a candidate for the suffrages of her people. Once more, I say, for it is part of the history of Oregon that Cincinnati Heinne Miller was, in 1870, a candidate for the Supreme Bench of that sovereign state. But they laughed the poet to scorn, because he was a poet, and told him he would "better stick to his poetry." How many of those who denied the right of a poet to sit in the seat of the law-givers will deny him the right to sit in the seat of the law-makers? Yet it is the theory of this poet to whom Oregon and the Pacific States owe so much, that there never was, and never will be a great general, judge, lawyer, statesman, who was not at heart at least, a great poet. That will be the poet's plea when he stands before the people of Oregon asking them to let him represent them in the Senate of the Republic. And he has great faith in the good sense of the people of Oregon—notwithstanding that they have faltered at times, and allowed the high priests of political graft to throw dust in their eyes to blind them to their own interests. They vote by the primary law method up in Oregon, and therein is the dependence of Joaquin Miller in this campaign. He feels that he will be able to reach down into the great heart of the sturdy Oregonian and touch the chord that vibrates in unison with his own heartstrings. Senator Joaquin Miller! Hail!—and shall we say Farewell!

Where Beauty Sleep is Not to Be Had

A disgusted correspondent writes me: "All during my life I have noticed that the world is full of people blundering along at occupations for which they are not fitted. But the country hotel business has attracted more misfits than any other. I had a painful demonstration of this Saturday night at the leading hotel of one of our larger interior cities. It is a pretentious place, charging what one pays at first-class metropolitan hotels. The designer of the building in question was the original offender. He planned the hotel with such diabolical ingenuity that every room is directly over the kitchen. The disadvantage of this arrangement seems to act as an inspiration for the manager to devise ways of annoying his guests. The kitchen uproar begins at five o'clock. It was inaugurated last Sunday morning by one scullion roaring to another at the top of his voice, 'Get up, there. Do you think that you are going to sleep all day?' It may be that he was shouting at the guests. At any rate, I know of one guest whom he thoroughly awakened. There was no sleep after that. The kitchen help took turns at holding the stove-lids high in the air and dropping them with resounding clangor. When they ceased this—presumably because the lids were growing hot—they commenced chopping wood. It would occur to any one but the manager of a country hotel to have the wood chopped during the day. These and similar—some worse—noises continued until six o'clock. Then began the shouting of orders. The first sign of slumber would be driven away by some one yelping, "Tenderloin. Have it rare. Ham and—turn 'em." This was an indication that guests, driven frantic by the previous noises, had arisen and were eating. I determined to make one more effort to get a nap. I had nearly succeeded when some one in the kitchen began hammering on a plate. Why such a thing was done I cannot explain. I would have gone down to inquire, but I knew that if I went into that kitchen and beheld the authors of my sleepless morning hour, there would be murder done. I was trying to ignore the banging of the plate, when a negro in the passage adjoining the kitchen began to sing, "I was born in ole Virginny." I arose and dressed and went to the dining-room, joining a sleepy looking horde. The waiter who took my order fairly roared it into the kitchen, and I grimly thought, 'That will bring some more of them down.' I was glad to leave that interior town and get back to the so-called noises of San Francisco. And now I am in favor of moving the capital from Sacramento to Berkeley."

Spreckels of San Diego

While Mr. Rudolph Spreckels is making noble efforts to purify the murky atmosphere of San Francisco, Mr. John D. Spreckels and Mr. Adolph Spreckels are engaged in the more peaceful occupation of vivifying the somnolent atmosphere of San Diego. The Spreckels brothers have already put much life and money into the old Spanish town which, however, has suffered a smaller measure of transformation than any of the other mission settlements of the State. The atmosphere is still ante-Gringo. But it is rapidly being impregnated with the germs of a bustling commercialism. The Spreckels brothers are stringing trolley wires through the town and far into the suburbs, and real estate agents are propagating rapidly and thriving immensely. John D. Spreckels is the H. E. Huntington of San Diego. He has given the town a genuine full blown Yankee boom, and the people are happy. It is said that John D. and his brother Adolph have invested $6,000,000 in their several enterprises in San Diego. These enterprises are not all brand new. The Spreckels's have had interests in San Diego for many years. The Coronado Hotel has long been their property, and they have long owned the principal newspaper, the Sun. But not until recently did the great financial potentialities appeal to them. John D. Spreckels became conscious of them during his very severe illness of some months ago. It will be remembered that he was reported at one stage of his illness to be dying. He is now once more in sound health, and he attributes the metamorphosis to the invigorating qualities of the San Diego atmosphere. Nowadays he spends nearly all his time at Coronado and he is building a handsome residence on the beach.

They Are Not Californians

One of Patrick Calhoun's imported conductors was enlightened the other day as to the reason for the independence and daring of San Francisco women. One of them boarded his car, her arms full of flowers. The conductor looked at the flowers in admiration and, addressing the woman, said: "There are two things that I will tell them about when I get back East; the beauty of the California flowers and the bravery of its women. I've helped break strikes in lots of towns, but never have I seen such a plucky lot of women as live in San Francisco. As a rule, when we start to run out cars during a strike, days pass before the women dare to ride. Here they were on board the cars the first hour they started to run, and they have been riding ever since. I tried to persuade them not to ride at first, but it was no use. There's no stopping them. They don't seem to be afraid of anything that walks. I have seen them get off and on during the time I have been here at lonely, unguarded places as fearlessly as though there were a dozen policemen in sight. It's the topic of conversation among the boys up at the car barn. Not a night passes but some of them have stories to tell of women who ride in spite of stones and curses. It's a puzzle to all of us." "It's merely heredity," the woman told him. "We who are daughters of pioneer women came naturally by our independence. Besides that, in the early days here a lone woman was as safe in a mining camp among rough men as she was in a drawing-room. On this account we all grew up unafraid. It's tradition with us. The fact that we are women makes us safe from Californians. For, mind you, these fellows who are insulting women are not Californians."

in on Sunday. Eames has decided not to be a navigator bold, sailing trackless seas. The charm of life on land appealed to him so strongly, he says, that he forsook the raging main. Besides, before arriving at Honolulu Mr. Eames realized that a continuance of his voyage meant a seven years' absence from his family—for, unlike London, he had not taken his family with him. The returned voyager did not say anything about having quarreled with London, but my Honolulu correspondent tells me that the two could not get along together. He says that he could not ascertain the specific grounds for the rupture that arose. When the Snark left here, Eames was her commander and navigator. It is supposed that London, being the owner of the boat, thought he was entitled to do a little of the commanding and navigating. Perhaps he found that his captain was not much of a deep sea sailor. I told several weeks ago how Captain Eames, while sailing across the bay, became involved with a ferry-boat and had a narrow escape from being swamped. So I imagine that on the voyage to Honolulu he became tangled up with the whales and endangered the Snark. Hereafter he will confine his sailing to such peaceful voyages as fall to the lot of the commuter. My correspondent tells me that London and his wife have been having a royally good time in Honolulu, and that the author, booted and spurred, has been climbing volcanoes and exploring the picturesque parts of the island.

General Lauck, Please Take Notice

A correspondent writes:

"Let us hope that the state law now going into effect to prevent the profanation by fraternities and civilian bodies of the uniform of the country's service may be extended to individual offenders. Numerous 'uniformed ranks' will no doubt be forced to return to the car conductor model, and the Sunday pedestrian of faulty taste may have to wear other khaki than that made for the soldier. To be concrete, during the Memorial Day exercises a most unmilitary figure strutted to the laughter or suspicion of all that saw. His chest, its flatness offset by the roundness of his shoulders, was decorated with three medals struck off by a certain quasi-military but ununiformed patriotic society. His excuse for purchasing an army officer's dress—exchanging regimentals for the society's insignia—I do not know. That he had never seen so much as militia service I took pains to ascertain. However some one may have called him a son-of-a-gun. Even the well forgotten 'heroes of '98' appeared out of place in their treasured khaki on Memorial Day, so what may be said in extenuation of the offense of one wearing an officer's uniform, whose only claim is that his father once enlisted. I respectfully call Adjutant General Lauck's attention to the case."

Heney Apologized

That Francis J. Heney is not overly popular with newspapermen may seem strange to those who have never realized how great a difference there may be between the personal and the "for-publication" opinions which reporters hold of the great personages of the hour. Newspapermen are notoriously hard to please and it must be admitted that a great many of them in this city are not pleased with the public prosecutor. Mr. Heney learned this rather unexpectedly a few days ago when a reporter on one of the morning papers rang him up to settle a point in connection with an account he was writing of the proceedings in the Schmitz trial that day. Mr. Heney happened to be very busy, as he usually is, and lapsed a good deal from courtesy in answering the question put to him over the telephone. Whereupon the reporter said very calmly, "Please understand, Mr. Heney, that I do not ring you up because I want to, but because I have to," and hung up the receiver. Next day, be it said to the credit of Mr. Heney, he was not too busy in the courtroom to seek out the offended newspaperman and tender an apology. It is more important for Heney to hold the friendship of newspapers than of the courts.

Steffens Collaborated with Heney

When, recently, Francis J. Heney hurled about five columns of rhetoric at the public in the shape of a review of what he had done and a promise of what he will do many were the innocents who looked upon the special prosecutor as a literary man as well as a lawyer. The discerning who were not on the inside merely classed him among writers, being unable to discover anything to justify the term "literary." But they were all wrong, for Heney was not the sole author of the impassioned appeal. He was the original author of it, but after he had concluded his labors Lincoln Steffens, special exposé of graft, took a peep at it. Steffens was kind in his comments, but gently hinted that there were certain passages in it that he might strengthen. He went at it, and before he got through there was more Steffens than Heney in the article. Steffens is a high-priced writer. Whether he got paid for this work out of the special prosecution fund I do not know.

Modest Mr. Langdon

District Attorney Langdon was thrust hopeless into the background as soon as the real work of the Schmitz trial was begun. He has not been given the slightest opportunity to distinguish himself. This is unfortunate since Mr. Langdon is to be a candidate for office again this fall, and it is therefore to his interest to show the pee-pul that he is able to earn his salary by doing something more than looking wise. I fear that Mr. Langdon is not taken with sufficient seriousness by his associates. It is reported that recently, on a visit to San Jose, young Mr. Cobb was interrogated relative to Mr. Langdon's legal ability and that he made this reply: "Why he couldn't draw a promissory note." Now it is my opinion that Mr. Cobb is mistaken. Mr. Langdon was once a teacher in a commercial school and in commercial schools promissory notes are drawn with wonderful precision.

Now for the Verdict

There is only one regret that I have in connection with this remarkable trial of Eugene Schmitz: that it was necessary to employ the word of Abe Ruef to establish the defendant's guilt. I must confess that I have been sorely and poignantly disappointed. After all that I had heard about the mass of evidence in the hands of the prosecution I was sure that the strategic Mr. Heney would make the guilt of Eugene Schmitz so clear that there would not be left the slightest margin for doubt. But now it appears that if Ruef had not confessed it would have been impossible for Mr. Heney to prove the crime. Nevertheless Mr. Heney is deserving of congratulation. The verdict of guilty, which I assume will be given, is his triumph and also Judge Dunne's. Judge Dunne has shown that he is to be depended on in an emergency to safeguard the interests of the pee-pul, if not of the individual. The only unfortunate thing about the case is that Judge Dunne found it necessary to brush aside so many technicalities. He took a street-sweeper to them. And consequently every lawyer in town from the highest to the lowest is laughing at the way Eugene was cinched. They are also laughing at Mr. Heney because they know that the Supreme Court cannot afford to approve everything that has been done by Judge Dunne. The bar agree that a verdict of guilty will be set aside owing to Judge Dunne's haughty indifference to fundamental principles. But the laugh is not on Mr. Heney. That strategic gentleman knows what he is about. He wanted a verdict of guilty and he wasn't particular about the method of obtaining it. He knows that a verdict of guilty will hold Mr. Schmitz for awhile. He also knows that it will hold the public for awhile, and holding the public is the main desideratum just now. With Schmitz convicted we shall all feel that Mr. Heney has "made good" in the most important matter for which his talents were employed. With Ruef's guilt confessed and Schmitz's proved to the satisfaction of a jury, perhaps it doesn't matter much what else happens.

Handing It to Eugene

I take it for granted that by the time this week's Town Talk makes its appearance the Schmitz trial will be over and the verdict of guilty entered. Of one thing I should be absolutely certain: that the jury will agree on a verdict of guilty. A failure to agree on a verdict of guilty would be a most stupendous miscarriage of well laid plans and curious specifications. Nothing so extraordinary is within my capacity for conceiving curious and inexplicable phenomena. This case is being tried with every loop-hole for escape covered with impenetrable armor plate. When the jury was being impaneled Judge Dunne saw to it that the special prosecutor should not have to waste any peremptory challenges. So when a talesman bobbed up who did not look good to the critical Mr. Heney, if it could be shown that he was a fourth cousin of the grand-uncle of Mrs. Schmitz's third cousin's wife's nephew, or within any closer degree of consanguinity, he was given "23" in a jiffy. And during the trial of the case, Judge Dunne, with that same scrupulous devotion to the interests of the State which he exhibited when the jury was being impaneled, has most generously facilitated the labors of the special prosecutor. Judge Dunne has not, however, indulged Mr. Heney in all his curious caprices. As sympathetic as Judge Dunne has been with the prosecution, Mr. Heney has been able to challenge successfully the courage of the court's prepossession. And thus has he enabled the court to give a touch of verisimilitude to the correct judicial pose. Yet notwithstanding Judge Dunne's denial of some of Mr. Heney's remarkable requests, a wag remarked the other day that it was obvious that Judge Dunne is less familiar with the decisions of our Supreme Court than with those of Pontius Pilate. A coarse jest and obviously unjust.

Judge Dunne is performing a great public function, and he cannot so regulate the affairs of his court as to exclude therefrom all men against whom he has no legitimate prejudice. We all know that Mayor Schmitz is guilty; if not of the crime of blackmailing French restaurants, of others equally bad. And that is probably how Judge Dunne feels about it.

Failing to "Make Good"

There is in the minds of the people of this city an almost ineradicable impression of the guilt of Eugene Schmitz. There is an overwhelming sentiment in favor of giving him the punishment he deserves. Yet I am told that the tactics pursued by Mr. Heney with the kind and noble indulgence of Judge Dunne have caused something of a shock to public feeling. It was not, I am convinced, a very violent shock; not half so vertiginous as it might have been had not the daily newspapers contrived to make it appear that the court proceedings were in strict accordance with the forms of law and that Mr. Heney was making good at every turn of the road. How easy it is to deceive the dear pee-pul! How easy it is to make multitudinous stupidity think in the way most suitable to your purpose! Few there were that recalled the repeated assertions in the press of Mr. Heney's intention to prove that Mayor Schmitz, at a Sunday meeting at his home, told Commissioner Reagan that Ruef had received a fee from the French restaurants and that it was to be devoted to the expenses of the Administration's political machine. Not one word of such testimony was given, and yet the newspapers in screeching headlines last week told how the commissioners had borne out all that the prosecution promised to establish. When court adjourned at the end of last week the dailies told us that the proof of Schmitz's guilt was conclusive. Yet on Monday morning of this week, Mr. Heney in his argument in support of his motion to be permitted to rake and scrape the town in search of fragments of circumstantial evidence of Schmitz's veniality in a thousand and one transactions having no bearing upon the French restaurant deal, he virtually admitted that if not vouchsafed this extraordinary latitude he would be unable to establish in the case at bar the guilt of the defendant.

Curious Tactics

Though Judge Dunne is not noted for the acuteness of his perceptive faculties he saw the importance of not letting Mr. Heney go as far as he liked. It is hardly possible that Mr. Heney expected Judge Dunne to give him the latitude he demanded. Possibly it was merely his purpose to introduce evidence by the newspaper route, which he did by an elaborate recitation of the evidence he purposed putting in. If I was not quite convinced that a notable exception is to be made in the case of this jury by absolutely depriving it of the newspaper accounts of the trial, I should be inclined to suspect that Mr. Heney had the jury in mind when he told the court all that he wished to prove. It is easier for a lawyer to tell what he expects to prove than to get in the proof. So it may have been to Mr. Heney's advantage to have his motion denied. Nevertheless I regret that Mr. Heney should have maneuvered himself into so miserable a position as to find it necessary to try to persuade the court to indulge him to such posterous lengths. Mr. Heney is a learned lawyer and it is hard for me to believe that he was laboring under the delusion that it was permissible for him to demonstrate the guilt of Schmitz in the French restaurant cases, by showing that there were entirely different transactions from which the defendant's guilt might be inferred.

An Awful Prospect

It would gratify me very much to be able, after the manner of my contemporaries, to felicitate Mr. Heney on his achievements, but it is apparent to me that he has tangled himself inextricably. It appears to me that he has reached a pass where in sheer desperation he is willing to procure the conviction of Schmitz even though for that consummation it should be necessary to break every law from the Decalogue to Phelan's charter, and as I contemplate his predicament I am almost moved to tears. What a sorry triumph will be his, if after having, with the aid of the press, smashed the graft machine, he should fail to land a single crook in the penitentiary.

A Modest Prediction

At this time the probability is that Mr. Heney is doomed to miserable defeat. The conviction of Schmitz will be of no significance. The route pursued for its achievement has been entirely too tortuous and a verdict of guilty will unquestionably be swept aside. A tribunal as fearful of press censure as would be one composed of judges as timid as the meekest representative of our Supreme Court would find it too prodigious a struggle with conscience to squint at all that has been done in the Schmitz case. This state of affairs is indeed to be deplored. Even though Mr. Heney should continue to hold the Home Telephone case in abeyance for the purpose that is ascribed to him, he will not be able, in my opinion, to prevent the State's highest tribunal from disposing of all these graft cases in short order. If I am any judge of the higher qualities of human nature that bench must be by this time in a state of revolt against all that has taken place in the past few months. I predict now that it will be shown that Mr. Heney has overplayed his hand, and that for breathing a moral mildew over our system of jurisprudence he will suffer rebuke.

Ruef's Lemon

Meanwhile I am curious for developments in the matter of the snarl for which one Abe Ruef is responsible. This is a matter that appeals to one's sense of humor. When Abe pleaded guilty and confessed the Prosecution yielded to a spasm of hysterical glee. When Abe gave his testimony in the Gas case before the Grand Jury, the full import of it was somewhat delayed in infusing itself into the consciousness of Mr. Heney. Abe asserted on that occasion that to no man that ever gave him money did he tell that he was to spend any part of it for the bribery of an official. Now it was not bribery to give Abe Ruef money for the purchase of his influence. The whole town knew that his influence was worth something. Mayor Schmitz served notice on the whole town in an open letter published immediately after his first election that he was under profound obligations to Abe and that he would be forever prepared as an official to vindicate his gratitude. Many citizens took a tip from that letter and paid Ruef fees that were not used for bribery. However if Ruef had not confessed the Prosecution would have been able with circumstantial evidence to make out pretty strong cases of bribery against men who paid him large sums of money. But with Ruef as the witness for the Prosecution, asserting that he did not receive money with the understanding with those from whom he received it that it was to be divided with public officials, the case assumes quite a different aspect. In the circumstances it is easy to infer, if one be of a reasonably suspicious mind, why on his second appearance before the Grand Jury Abe's testimony was not taken down by a stenographer. It is the theory of some attorneys that it was not taken down because

Automobile

You hear many people say that an automobile is a nice thing to have and all that, but costs too much to keep it up.

Maybe that's true—in many cases. But cost of upkeep depends largely on the kind of car.

We have had an opportunity to obtain definite data as to the Cost of Maintaining a Single-Cylinder Cadillac.

147 owners residing in almost every State who have kept accounts of their expenses covering gasoline, oil and repairs have made affidavits which we have on file, showing that their repairs (not including tires) have averaged

Less than $2.50 Per Month.

Their cars have been driven from one to four seasons, and as high as 30,000 miles.

The affidavits also show that the averages obtained have been about

19 Miles Per Gallon of Gasoline,

an average of less than one and one-third cents per mile per car or, on the basis of four passengers each, less than

One-third of a Cent Per Mile Per Passenger.

Remember these are not a few special cases, but averages of 147 owners. Furthermore, these records are not of automobiles in general, but single-cylinder CADILLACS only.

Most any make of automobile can show a good performance sometimes, but what interests you is what a car will do "as a rule."

When a dealer makes claims as to low cost of operating the cars he sells, ask him to prove them. We can prove ours.

There are over 15,000 single-cylinder Cadillacs "making good" all over the world.

Single-cylinder Cadillacs truly afford all there is in motoring—except the troubles.

Dealers are always glad to demonstrate.

Fully described and illustrated in Catalogue "M—AL," mailed on receipt of request.

then it would be impossible to alter it in the event of Ruef's deciding at the request of the Prosecution and for a sufficient consideration to convert his lemon into a substantial roast. This theory is borne out by an inspired newspaper article in which it was asserted that unless Ruef "came through" he would forfeit leniety. But to come through he will have to contradict his sworn testimony so far as the alleged bribe-givers are concerned. There are some people who suspect that Ruef has played a very shrewd game for the purpose of forcing the corporation officials into the fight to take the burdens off his shoulders.

The Horror of It

Few people who do not come in immediate contact with the lower elements of humanity realize how strong a hold unionism has upon the ignorant. Its principles are a religion with them, and they look upon a scab as a being thoroughly beyond the pale of decency—something to be talked of as a thing apart from the human race. I witnessed an illustration of this sentiment on Market street on Saturday. A car was going by, manned by a good-looking young motorman. A woman who observed him remarked to her companion. "My God, how can he do such a thing? And he's a nice looking young fellow too." There was horror in her voice, such as would be caused by witnessing a trespass on an altar. His exercise of a man's right to work for whomever he pleased had to her all the elements of sacrilege.

Unionism in Eureka

My Eureka correspondent writes me that "this has been a hard week for unionism in Humboldt county. Jack Hayes, one of the longshoremen who was implicated in the shooting of non-union men during the water-front strike in Eureka a year ago, was found guilty of murder in the second degree. The woodsmen's strike has been declared off without any concessions on the part of the mill-owners. The community has lost about half a million dollars on account of the strike, and the position of the workingmen has been weakened more than they wish to admit. The lumber workers who have gone back to work are loud in their denunciations of unionism. The strike was agitated and forced by a lot of foot-loose single men, most of whom left the county after doing the mischief, going North to work in other lumber camps. They left the men with families to suffer the consequences."

Things Doing in the "Upper World"

Have you any Wells Fargo stock? If so you're likely to get a handsome profit on it for just now there is a stiff fight going on for the controlling interest, the storm center being in the East where the rival factions are raiding each other's camps. The present clash is another outburst of the bad feeling which broke out nearly a year ago when a vigorous attack was made against the management. At that time the dominant party, led by E. H. Harriman, acquired all the stock that was obtainable either at public or private sale. Harriman had to have it in order to retain control. Several months after the fracas, and while his enemies were sleeping on their arms, Harriman again sent out emissaries to gather in all holdings of stock that could be picked up. Several big blocks were gathered in and tucked away for future service. What the present search for stock presages the curious street is unable

Lambasting Senator Nixon

The bitter feud going on between Senator Nixon of Nevada and the Larry Sullivan "combination" promises to be something historical in Coast mining records. The Sullivan snipers have been artfully pinking Nixon lately with charges that he is responsible for the present slump in mining share values through his neglect to have a dividend declared in the case of Goldfield Con., a holding which Nixon acknowledges has not only a million dollars in the treasury but picture ore in sight that can be taken out at the rate of one million dollars every twenty days. So keenly has Nixon felt the smart of these attacks that he is coming out in column interviews in the Nevada papers denying the charges made against him and defining his "position as a mining man with a mine to be developed intelligently and not through stock speculation." He has a press bureau of his own that has been actively firing charges into the Sullivan camp. Sullivan has been figuratively tarred and feathered as a shanghaiier, a charlatan, swindler, Dick Turpin of promotion schemes: to cap the climax he has just been arrested in New York charged with circumventing a customer out of a big sum of money on a "wild cat" promotion.

No Quarter Asked

Graham Rice, his righthand, rushed to his defense with the explanation that the complainant had not got his stock through Sullivan but through a man who is now being tried here in San Francisco for his connection with business of that character. No sooner did Rice appear in the open than he was charged with being an ex-convict, a man masquerading under an assumed name, and a fellow too far gone in iniquity to be improved by an immunity bath or even a confession in extremis. Both sides have flung away their scabbards and if their ink wells and lung power hold out the investors who have been fleeced in the recent slump in Goldfield issues may learn something of the manner in which the trick was done. Meanwhile the attacks on Nixon have evidently prodded his captains into supporting the market, for during the last few days values have shown growing signs of something like life. That the end of the feud is not in sight is only too apparent to those who know the relentless spirit dominating both Sullivan and Rice. Nixon was instrumental in dragging them from their lofty position as the most successful promoters in Goldfield and the claim is made by their friends that the two will make him feel the day he did it.

The Illimitable Gabfest

A city divided against itself may not fall immediately but it will exhibit a toppling condition morally, physically, financially and many other ways, as is illustrated in the acts of the leaders here in San Francisco. To add to the already long list of men and factions who madly, stubbornly refuse "to pull together" comes the Committee of the Builders' Exchange, the same committee appointed to confer with bankers, builders, investors and the labor interests with a view to harmonizing differences and obtaining an understanding whereby wages and the prices of material should be kept within certain bounds for a period of two years. Much was expected of this committee. As with all the others they found conditions most deplorable but when it came to suggestions for remedying them they split upon the same old rock. The labor element held steadfastly to the high wages it had captured and the material men clung to all that the traffic showed an inclination to bear. Sarcastic and taunting charges were shot back and forth and the final meeting ended in even personal criminations. Such actions among leaders in their respective lines are a biting commentary on our ability to handle the present situation. No wonder the ordinary citizen, sick at heart, is hugging his few remaining savings in the retirement of his home and muttering, "What will happen next?"

Who's Who On a Job

Some 2,500 men are out of work in Chicago because of freak strikes, nobody being able to determine what class of mechanics shall do certain kinds of work. Who should cut the hole for a door—a carpenter or a woodworker? Several big buildings are delayed pending the determination of this very important question. Not only were the carpenters on the Illinois Athletic Club building called out, but for some reason which nobody seems able to explain, union carpenters have been forbidden to touch material made by the firm furnishing doors for the building in question. There is another strike which, while it involves only two men and a boy, is still more freaky. In this case it is impossible to install elevator machinery until some Solomon shall settle whether the setting of screws in the elevator shaft is the work of a machinist or an elevator constructor. In the same building several hundred marble slabs are lying untouched because nobody knows which of two unions shall spread on the cement which is to hold them in place. The cement workers' union says that no one save members of that organization can handle cement. Marble cutters assert that they should be the only ones allowed to handle marble after it reaches a building of which it is to be a part. Another puzzling strike has been in progress for some time in the yards of the National Brick Co. There are a dozen or more small engines in the yards, and to run one of these requires the services of only one man. He shovels coal, and at the same time manipulates the levers and gauges. Nobody, not even his employers, can tell whether this man is a fireman or an engineer. Several hundred workmen and teamsters employed about an amusement park struck, although perfectly satisfied with hours and wages, because non-union waiters carried beer to the patrons of the place. After staying out for one day a glimmer of intelligence worked its way into their heads, and they went back to work. But meanwhile, the question of what branch a mechanic belongs to is up in the air, to the serious detriment of several important enterprises.

An ordinance regulating automobile horns would be much appreciated by the victims of those blighted beings of perverted instincts who take satanic and imbecilic delight in making nuisances of themselves with the aid of raucous sounds. There are many parlor cut-ups in possession of automobiles nowadays. You can tell them by a certain device which they employ to make a noise like an ass in agony.

San Franciscans in Paris

My Paris correspondent writes me some interesting gossip concerning San Franciscans in the gay French capital. Mrs. Hart McKee, formerly Mrs. Tevis of San Francisco, continues her sway and is the most feted as well as the most lured woman in the American colony. Mrs. McKee though in the American colony is certainly not of it. At the start she had the sagacity to keep as much out of the American colony as possible, and allied herself with the brilliant foreign set that numbers Spanish grandees and Russian grand dukes among its most conspicuous members. The McKees have made many a faux pas but their fortune is sufficient to make their new-found friends regard them as quaintly eccentric. One of the blunders that the gossips of Paris have not yet forgotten happened a few weeks ago when Hart flushed by the success of his own dinner party impulsively took one of his guests, an attache of the Turkish Embassy and a persona non grata in many homes, to call on a countess who did not know nor wished to know this particular attache. The Turk was allowed to pass into the salon but the McKees noticed that the air in the vicinity of the countess and her family was somewhat congealed. They soon inferred that although their company was desired they could not bring whomsoever they chose in that impromptu and informal manner. The Infanta Eulalia has been the staunchest of friends to the McKees in spite of the fact that the jealous dames of the American predicted an early termination to their intimacy. The Infanta is not noted for her constancy and many are the American women she has taken under her sheltering wing only to turn them out into the cold a few months later when she tired of them. The fair Cornelia has managed to hold the interest somehow of the fickle Eulalia and through her royal friend has met half of the reigning families of Europe. It must be said that the Infanta is not considered to be a top notcher in court aides,—she has lost caste by her democratic ways—but to the rich Americans she is a star of the first magnitude. The American women in Paris throw out all kinds of bait to Eulalia but she refuses to be tempted except by the McKee lure. One sharp tongued California woman declares it is Cornie's cook that fascinates Eulalia, for the Infanta is fond of the pleasures of the table and the McKees' cook is famous."

Addie Murphy Breckenridge

"Mrs. McKee's chief rival for social honors in Paris is none other than Addie Murphy Breckenridge. She has almost cast into the shade this sprightly little dame who only a few seasons ago promised to be a leader. Cornie and Addie were once fast friends but since the Denver lady got fairly started on her meteoric career it was noticed that there was not as much gush between these two dames. Since Mrs. Breckenridge became reconciled to her father her revenue increased materially and now she has all the financial backing necessary when heretofore she could not cope with the Tevis-McKee millions in spite of her clever management and wit. Now that her fortunes have been recouped the wise ones are predicting that she will give Mrs. McKee a close race for social supremacy. Her gowns this spring season are so gorgeous as to startle even the Parisians. She has invested in the latest of automobiles and there is no more dashing figure on the Bois than our Addie. She is still the brilliant raconteuse whose stories used to delight San Franciscans a few years ago; in fact, her stories are quoted in St. Petersburg as well as in London. The mercurial Addie does not confine her attention wholly to the smart set but her salon is the rendezvous for many of the brilliant literary men and musicians of Paris. Mrs. McKee does not favor the highbrows but revels in people with handles to their names."

Aitken a Pet

Bobby Aitken is now and then seen in the drawing-rooms on the right bank of the Seine, although he prefers the life of the region adjacent the Boule Miche. In Paris they speak of Bobbie as an infant prodigy. They seem to be laboring under the impression that our pet sculptor is only twenty-three. All the Paris papers speak of him as "that San Francisco youth." A certain San Franciscan who is studying music in Paris thinks that the young sculptor has discovered the fountain of youth for as he says "I knew Aitken in San Francisco five years ago and he was then twenty-three. Now I meet him again and they tell me he is going on twenty-four. Will Bobby ever be a man?" In Paris the rumor is afloat that Mrs. Hearst is Aitken's financial backer, but that has been denied by some of his friends, I believe."

Among the fashionable Californians in the French metropolis recently were Mr. and Mrs. Ashton Potter, Mrs. Cort, Mr. and Mrs. Peter Martin, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hobart, Miss Lillie Lawlor, Mr. and Mrs. Sterling Postley, Mrs. Mayo Newhall and the Misses Newhall, Mrs. Miles, Mrs. Edward Moore Robinson, Prince and Princess Poniatowski, Mr. and Mrs. George B. Sperry, Miss Bessie Bowie, the Misses Joselyn, Mrs. Morton Mitchell, formerly Mrs. Ladd.

The Martins in Camp

The Walter Martins have an attack of Simple Life-itis and they intend to get it out of their systems by camping in the woods for two months. Several men are now busily engaged pitching camp near Cisco in the Sierras and the camp promises to be a marvel of rustic convenience. Mrs. Martin has gone up there several times to oversee the arrangements and returns more than ever delighted with the prospect of a sylvan existence. Probably the out-and-out camper who travels through the Sierras with a sleeping bag, a side of bacon, and a sack of beans would sniff contemptuously at the Martin outfit, which includes a dozen horses and as many servants. Mrs. Martin plans to have her two little children with her and will have a great deal of company besides, so all the inconveniences of woodlanding have been obviated as far as possible. Mrs. Eleanor Martin has decided that when one is "seventy years young" camping out is unseemly and she will spend most of the summer at the Walter Martin place in Burlingame.

I have often marveled that more of our wealthy people do not establish camps in the mountains where they can slough off all the impedimenta of modern life. In the East the so-called "camp" of the millionaire is of a piece with the masquerading of the Newport palace as a "cottage." There camping has been devitalized of its tonic virility until it is almost as exsanguinous an existence as life at the St. Regis. In comparison the Martin camp will be the real rustic thing.

E. W. Hopkins reserves a cottage at Boca, where the company of which he is president runs a plant, for his own use and once a year his entire family migrate up there to get on how-de-do terms with nature. The cottage is furnished with the bare necessities and during their stay up there they scissor off all the frills from life. Even Mrs. Gus Taylor, who is so sartorially fit that she always looks as though she has just come out of a silk lined, scented bandbox, loafs around in corduroys. A month on the water in this wise, trolling for the tonic that is abundant as trout, braces one for the sloppy pink tea winter.

The Calhouns

The arrival of Mrs. Calhoun and her daughters has crowded Thornwell Mullalley out of the house which he has occupied all winter and he has taken a handsome apartment at the Fairmont. Mr. Calhoun leased a beautiful house on Webster street last year so that he and his family could have a home out here on their visits to this city. During Mr. Mullalley's residence there he has entertained in the charming fashion which is always served with the real Maryland terrapin. It is not thought that Mrs. Calhoun will endeavor to put a head on the flat state of social affairs, as she is not overfond of the frivolings of society, preferring to fortify her circle of friends with the sort of people who take life somewhat seriously. Last year Mrs. Calhoun gave a number of small dinner parties that were delightfully informal. One of her most intimate friends here is Mrs. Alfred Hunter Voorhies.

Society at the Show

The opening night of "Peter Pan" brought out a goodly gathering of society, considering how scattered the smart set is. The largest theatre party of the evening was given by Miss Jennie Crocker, with Mrs. Walter Martin as usual in the capacity of chaperone and Gertrude and Virginia Joliffe peopling the perspective. I love to watch Gertrude at a play she is so utterly unconscious of opera glasses focused in that direction, and is so frankly interested in the play. These blase days most society girls feel that it is vulgar to show animated interest in anything, but Maude Adams' whimsical charm tore the mask of indifference from the most indurated theatre goer. Gertrude Joliffe almost fell out of the box so eager was she to show she still believed in fairies.

A. Robinson of Burlingame accompanied by Mrs. M. H. Wilbur of Colorado Springs are at Del Monte. * * * The first putting contest of the season on the Clock Green at Del Monte was held on Wednesday afternoon, four ladies taking part. The winner was Mrs. Loeser, who made two rounds in 24-27, total 51. Mrs. H. R. Warner and Miss E. A. W. Morgan tied with 52. * * * The second event of the Ladies' Continuous Handicap Golf Tournament took place on Saturday morning and was won by Mrs. H. R. Warner, who beat Mrs. Loeser by one stroke on the last hole. * * * Among the notable visitors at Del Monte were D. M. Delmas and Mrs. Delmas, who stayed for a few days last week. They were so delighted with the varied charms of Del Monte that they will return the end of June and Mrs. Delmas will stay throughout the summer. ## Maud Adams in "Peter Pan"

By Edward F. O'Day

Confronted with the unusual conjuncture of an actress who discounts sophisticated criticism in the title role of a play which artlessly but yet firmly repels the advances of cold-blooded analysis, the commenter on Maude Adams and "Peter Pan" need not feel that his task is a perfunctory one. Criticism does not of necessity spell censoriousness and in the present instance that would be a most discourteous critickin who would begrudge the actress whole-souled praise or pretend serious faultfinding with the play. At the same time the exuberance of appreciation may well be restrained within reasonable bounds; to say that Maude Adams and "Peter Pan" represent the perfection of acting and playwriting would only be slighting them both with the insincere exaggeration that superlatives usually suggest; it would also be aping the manner of those critics whose enthusiasm mounts with every clock-tick that brings press-time nearer and cools to indifference before the first paper is inked. The author of "Peter Pan" and the splendid actress who interprets him deserve more thoughtful consideration than that. James M. Barrie offers us a dramatic fantasy which marks a truly wonderful advance on the craft that shaped the delightful idea of "The Admirable Crichton" into a rather unwieldy satirical comedy. All the clumsiness shown in the handling of that play has been rounded to the graceful purposes of as delicate a theme as was ever reduced to dramatic proportions. Like the mother who imprisoned Peter Pan's shadow, Barrie has caught the intangible, has arrested an evanescent thought that must have tantalized many, many times a score of authors besides himself. "Peter Pan" challenges comparison in my mind only with "Alice in Wonderland" and a beautiful short story by H. G. Wells called "The Door in the Wall." Like these it embodies the quintessence of fairy lore together with the absolutely sure and satisfactory expression of all the daydreams that make childhood a magical estate and recur in quick, unexpected and uncontrollable flashes to show grown-ups how much they have lost in gaining worldly knowledge. Every child has dwelt sometime in Never-Never Land; has flown with the fairies to their enchanted dwelling-places; worsted pirates in blood-curdling hand-to-hand encounters and hauled down the skull and crossbones; has roamed the plains with the Indians; put howling wolves to flight; explored mysterious subterranean places; and felt the ecstasy of impersonating that hero of heroes, Napoleon. There is no healthy boy with access to the books boys love who has not known these things for greater realities than life itself. And there is no girl who has not experienced through the marvelous anticipations of instinct the joys of romantic love and the sweet cares of motherhood. These realities fade as men and women travel the ever-narrowing road that leads away from childhood, but when the occasional backward look into that sweet past is vouchsafed, those are unfortunate indeed who do not tremble on the verge of tears. Such poignant glimpses are allowed all of us at times and they leave a haunting fragrance in our lives that should not be undervalued for its benignant influence. The author of "Peter Pan" gives us more than a glimpse; he transports us to that fairyland of childhood and keeps us there for five throbbing acts. Because it accomplishes this "Peter Pan" must be given a place in the literature of childhood alongside of Lewis Carroll's masterpiece. As for Miss Adams, there is probably none of her admirers who will dispute her assertion that she is "the wonderfulest boy that ever lived." Comparison with Annie Russell's Puck immediately suggests itself, but Puck is a fairy while Peter Pan is just a boy, human to the red-ripe of the heart. The shy smile, the embarrassed movements, the husk in the voice, the fleeting moments of seriousness and the total abandonment to the excitement of adventure—these are some more obvious elements of her characterization; but there are others, subtler, hardly perceptible sometimes, that suggest an epicene quality in Miss Adams that might be startling if it were not so irresistibly captivating. Speculation as to the future of "Peter Pan" is futile; the years deal so grotesquely with what are called popular successes that it requires extreme hardihood to venture a prophecy of enduring fame. But if "Peter Pan" is still on the stage fifty years from now, the achievement of Maude Adams in the role will be at once the standard and the despair of her successors.

"You Never Can Tell"

George Bernard Shaw's numerous admirers will be pleased to know that his great comedy, "You Never Can Tell," will be presented by the Frawley Company at the Novelty this Sunday afternoon. The piece abounds in brilliant lines, pungent epigrams and amusing situations. It was the dramatic sensation of last season in London. The story centers around a lady of literary tendencies who has been separated from her more material and money-making husband for a great many years, and her children, who have been brought up in a state of ignorance as regards their paternity. Through a singular chain of circumstances the entire family is thrown together in the office of an impecunious dentist and the complications that ensue are such as can only be conceived by the mind of a Bernard Shaw. The characters are all finely drawn and should receive splendid portrayal at the hands of the unusually clever players whom Mr. Frawley has brought to the city for his summer season.

A. Countess for a Headliner

Particular interest attaches to the Orpheum programme for the week beginning this Sunday matinee from the fact that it is headed by the Countess Olga Rossi and Monsieur Paulo. The latter is a lyric tenor of renown, while the Countess is the wife of one of the Czar's proudest nobles. Previous to her marriage she was Olga Bosquovitch, one of the most popular members of the Royal Opera Company in Moscow. After a bright but disastrous matrimonial experience she returned to the operatic stage. In Russia when a wife expresses a desire to leave her husband it is taken for granted she is insane and he can have her locked up in an asylum. This is exactly what the Count did. By bribery she managed to effect her escape and with her little son, whom her relatives had gained possession of she fled across the frontier to Paris where to support herself she sang at the theatre Folier and the Marigny. This is the romance that ought to count as an asset in a stage career. In Paris the Countess met Monsieur Paulo, who induced her to make a vaudeville tour of this country. It is the lady's intention as soon as she can acquire a legal residence to institute divorce proceedings against her husband and to ask the American law courts to make her the legal guardian of her little son. The Countess and Monsieur Paulo will appear in a sketch entitled, "During the Performance," which abounds in lyric opportunities. The other new people in the week's programme are the St. Onge Brothers, the greatest comedy cycling novelty act in vaudeville, Ferry "the human frog," in his acrobatic act, "The Dismal Swamp," and the Three Abdullah Brothers, European novelty acrobats. Next week will be the last of Hayes and Johnson, the Frederick Hawley Company, the Bootblack Quartette and Arthur Dunn and Marie Glazier.

"Old Heidelberg"

"The Undertow" has had its day at the Alcazar, and hereafter we shall see the players in pieces of less ephemeral character. For a starter we shall see them in "Old Heidelberg," the most sweetly alluring play that has been seen in this country in many years. I have begun to think of "Old Heidelberg" as something of a classic. It surely has the enduring qualities of a classic. I have seen it half a dozen times, enjoyed each time and hope to enjoy it many more times. I know many people who are equally enthusiastic. Yet "Old Heidelberg's" vitality is mainly in its atmosphere. But it presents some very good character drawing and tells a story that can be best appreciated by those who are conscious of the conditions that make for the emotions which it depicts.

Another Italian Opera Season

Manager Will Greenbaum has a string of attractions for the season. In addition to Gadski, Kubelik and Hoffman, he will present an Italian grand opera company. The season will open in September. Contracts are now being entered into with some of the leading artists of Italy. Signor Polacco has been engaged as the conductor.

"The Ameer"

Victor Herbert's picturesque and tuneful opera, "The Ameer," will be the main attraction at Idora Park for the next two weeks. This opera is one of the many melodious works written to exploit the personality of Frank Daniels, and like "The Idol's Eye" and "The Wizard of the Nile" it is also suitable to the talents of Ferris Hartman. The popularity of Idora appears to be increasing every week.

In the Limelight

"You Never Can Tell," the Bernard Shaw satire to be played by the Frawley company at the Novelty Theatre, was one of the big hits of the past season in New York as played by Arnold Daly.

It is said that the immense Van Ness Theatre has held no less than twelve thousand people during the past week at the performances of "Peter Pan."

Ethel Barrymore follows Maude Adams at the Van Ness Theatre and will be seen in her latest success from the Empire Theatre, New York.

Seats for the remaining performances of "Peter Pan" at the Van Ness Theatre have been taken up in great numbers. There is a continual line of ticket purchasers before the box office.

AUTO NOTES

Mr. J. Goldberg and family made a trip to Santa Cruz and return on Sunday last in their 60 H-P. Thomas "Flyer."

One hour and fifteen minutes is the somewhat modest time that Mr. W. F. White claims for his model "M" Winton on a recent run to San Jose.

On Saturday last, the Pioneer Automobile Company sold 70 H-P. Thomas runabouts to Messrs. Fernando Nelson, E. J. Freeman and W. A. Speck.

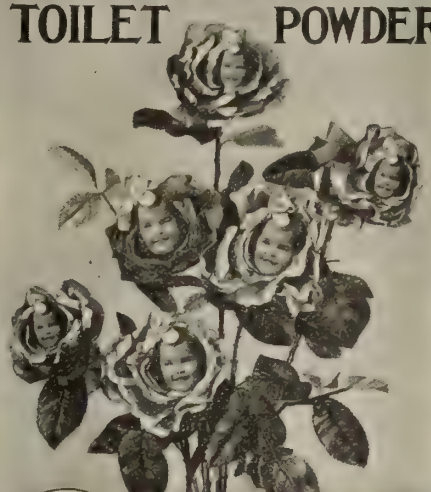

Mr. M. M. Michael of Des Moines, Ia., has in his service a Winton Model C that has run more than 20,000 miles and is doing excellent work every day.

The Cadillac touring car which started at 6:55 a. m. Tuesday, May 28, from Los Angeles, came to San Francisco, returned to Los Angeles and ran on the streets of Los Angeles, stopped Tuesday, June 4, at 4 p. m., having run seven days and nine hours without a stop.

Mrs. Haily Booth will drive her new 40 H-P. Oldsmobile to Santa Barbara the latter part of this month and, if road reports are good, the tour will be extended to Los Angeles and possibly San Diego. Mr. and Mrs. Booth have just returned from a trip to Monterey.

Chas. B. Shanks, general sales manager of the Winton Company, has arrived home from a three weeks' visit to Pacific Coast cities. "San Francisco looks infinitely better than when I was there just after the fire," said Mr. Shanks, "and it will once more be the cosmopolitan metropolis of the great West. Seattle is brim full of enthusiasm and hustle, and is certain to become one of America's greatest cities. Automobile interest out West grows with the country. The demand for highest quality cars is decidedly on the increase."

Five hundred miles without a skip, thereby earning a perfect score, was the record of a Winton Model M in the recent New Jersey Automobile Club's endurance contest. Under the test the cars ran on a legal speed schedule and were penalized not only for tardiness at each control, but also for repairs and replacements.

Rare Chances for Book Buyers

Book-buyers, especially those that appreciate works of rare character, should avail themselves of the exceptional opportunities afforded at Fay's book store at 1534 Bush street. Mr. Fay is a man of great experience in this field, and he has a knack for picking up old classics at English auctions and works that appeal to lovers of the best literature. He deals more extensively in English publications than any other local dealer, and he does not limit his stock to high class literature. He carries all the latest fiction in the English editions, and at present he is having a remainder sale of the products of English publishing houses, and disposing of books at about one-third of the regular price. There is a great demand these days for the works of such men as George Moore and G. K. Chesterton and H. G. Wells, in the English editions, their admirers greatly preferring the workmanship of the London publishing houses to those of New York and Boston. Fay's book store is the one that makes a specialty of this trade, and hence its great popularity. Mr. Fay is holding the remainder sale to make room on his shelves for a large stock of rare and attractive works recently purchased in London and now arriving in sections almost daily. People who lost their libraries in the April fire, and who are laying in a new supply of books, will find it greatly to their advantage to visit Fay's and inspect some of the editions that have been imported from England.

A New California Syndicate

A notable example of the energy and progressiveness of the "young blood" of our rising generation is found in the personnel of the Ocean Shore Realty Syndicate (a California Corporation), whose principals are well known in San Francisco's social and financial circles. They have chosen for their field the developing of properties along the line of the Ocean Shore Electric Railway, which is rapidly nearing completion.

The Syndicate is developing the property known as Brighton Beach, which includes a lagoon of warm salt water, connected at high tide with the ocean. Around this lagoon bath houses, cafes, tourist hotels and amusement enterprises will be constructed, similar to the most exclusive Eastern watering places, affording San Francisco what has heretofore been her greatest need—a safe surf bathing resort.

The directors of the Syndicate are Arthur H. F. Renton, Arthur G. Duncan, Percy T. Hannigan and Carter P. Pomeroy. The officers of the company are: President, Arthur H. F. Renton, a sugar planter and capitalist of Hawaii; Vice-President, Arthur G. Duncan, a successful suburban real estate man; Secretary and Treasurer, Percy T. Hannigan, for many years with Baker & Hamilton; Depositary and Registrar, Mercantile Trust Company; Attorney, Carter P. Pomeroy. The General Offices of the Syndicate are at 20 Fifth street.

position to do anything else but simply "croak," to use her own expression.

The clearness of this line of thought was inexpressibly sad and painful to me, and I felt that if I kept silence any longer I was really bound to weep . . . And it would have been shameful to have done this before a woman, especially as she was not weeping herself. I resolved to speak to her.

"Who was it that knocked you about? I asked. For the moment I could not think of anything more sensible or more delicate.

"Pashka did it all," she answered in a dull and level tone.

"And who is he?"

"My lover. . . . He was a baker."

"Did he beat you often?"

"Whenever he was drunk he beat me. . . . Often!"

And suddenly, turning towards me, she began to talk about herself, Pashka, and their mutual relations. She was "one of the street-walking girls who . . ."—and he was a baker with red moustaches and played very well on the banjo. He came to see her at "the establishment," and greatly pleased her, for he was a merry chap and wore nice clean clothes. He had an under-vest which cost fifteen roubles and boots with dress tops. For these reasons she had fallen in love with him, and he became her "creditor." And when he became her creditor he made it his business to take away from her the money which the other guests gave to her for bonbons, and getting drunk on this money would fall to beating her; but that would have been nothing if he hadn't also begun to "run after" other girls before her very eyes.

"Now, wasn't that an insult? I am not worse than the others. Of course that meant that he was laughing at me, the blackguard. The day before yesterday I asked leave of my mistress to go out for a bit, went to him, and there I found Dimka sitting beside him drunk. And he, too, was half seas over. I said to him: 'You scoundrel, you!' And he gave me a thorough hiding. And he kicked me and dragged me by the hair—and did everything. But that was nothing to what came after. But he spoiled everything I had on—left me just as I am now! How could I appear before my mistress? He spoiled everything . . . my dress and my jacket too—it was quite a new one—I gave a fiver for it . . . and tore my kerchief from my head. . . . Oh, Lord! What will become of me now!" she suddenly whined in a lamentable overstrained voice.

And the wind howled, and became ever colder and more boisterous. . . . Again my teeth began to dance up and down. And she, too, huddled up to avoid the cold, pressing as closely to me as she could, so that I could see the gleam of her eyes through the darkness.

"What wretches all you men are! I'd burn you all in an oven, I'd cut you in pieces. If anyone of you was dying I'd spit in his mouth, and not pity him a bit. Mean skunks. You wheedle and wheedle, you wag your tails like cringing dogs, and we fools give ourselves up to you, and it's all up with us! Immediately you trample us underfoot. . . . Miserable loafers."

She cursed us up and down, but there was no vigor, no malice, no hatred of these "miserable loafers" in her cursing that I could hear. The tone of her language by no means corresponded with its subject-matter, for it was calm enough, and the gamut of her voice was terribly poor.

Yet all this made a stronger impression on me than the most eloquent and convincing pessimistic books and speeches, of which I had and have read not a few, both earlier and later, and still read to this day. And this, you see, was because the agony of a dying person is much more natural and violent than the most minute and picturesque descriptions of death.

I felt really wretched, more from cold than from the words of my neighbor. I groaned softly and gnashed my teeth.

And almost at the same moment I felt two little arms about me—one of them touched my neck and the other lay upon my face, and at the same time an anxious, gentle, friendly voice uttered the question:

"What ails thee?"

I was ready to believe that someone was asking me this and not Natasha, who had just declared that all men were scoundrels, and expressing a wish for their destruction. But she it was, and now she began speaking quickly, hurriedly.

"What ails thee, eh? Art cold? Art frozen? Ah, what a one thou art, sitting there so silent like a little owl! Why, thou shouldst have told me long ago that thou wert cold. Come . . . lie on the ground . . . stretch thyself out and I will lie . . . there! how's that? Now put your arms round me! . . . tighter! How's that! thou shouldst be warm very soon now. . . And then we'll lie back to back. . . The night will pass so quickly, see if it won't. I say . . . hast thou too been drinking? . . . turned out of thy place, eh? . . . It doesn't matter."

And she comforted me. . . She encouraged me.

May I be thrice accursed! What a world of irony was in this single fact for me! Just imagine! Here was I, seriously occupied at this very time with the destiny of humanity, thinking of the reorganization of the social system, of political revolutions, reading all sorts of devilishly-wise books whose abysmal profundity was certainly unfathomable by their very authors—at this very time, I say, I was trying with all my might to make of myself "a potent active social force." It even seemed to me that I had partially accomplished my object; anyhow, at this time, in my ideas about myself I had got so far as to recognize that I had an exclusive right to exist, that I had the necessary greatness to deserve to live my life, and that I was fully competent to play a great historical part therein. And a venal woman was now warming me with her body, a wretched, battered, hunted creature, who had no place and no value in life, and whom I had never thought of helping till she helped me herself, and whom I really would not have known how to help in any way even if the thought of it had occurred to me.

Ah! I was ready to think that all this was happening to me in a dream—in a disagreeable, an oppressive dream.

But, ugh! it was impossible for me to think that, for cold drops of rain were dripping down upon me, the woman was pressing close to me, her warm breath was fanning my face, and despite a slight bouquet of vodka it did me good. The wind howled and raged, the rain smote upon the skiff, the waves splashed, and both of us, embracing each other convulsively, nevertheless shivered with cold. All this was only too real, and I am certain that nobody ever dreamed such an oppressive and horrid dream as that reality.

But Natasha was talking all the time of something or other, talking so kindly and sympathetically, as only women can talk. Beneath the influence of her voice and kindly words a little fire began to burn up within me, and something inside my heart thawed in consequence.

Then tears poured from my eyes like a hailstorm, washing away from my heart much that was evil, much that was stupid, much sorrow and dirt which had fastened upon it before that night. Natasha, too, encouraged me:

"Come, come, that will do, little one! Don't take on! That'll do! God will give thee another chance . . . thou wilt right thyself and stand in thy proper place again . . . and it will be all right. . ."

And she kept kissing me . . . many kisses did she give me . . . burning kisses . . . and all for nothing . . .

Those were the first kisses from a woman that had ever been bestowed upon me, and they were the best kisses too, for all the subsequent kisses cost me frightfully dear, and really gave me nothing at all in exchange.

"Come, don't take on so, funny one! I'll manage for thee tomorrow if thou canst not find a place"—and her quiet persuasive whispering sounded in my ears as if it came through a dream. . .

There we lay till dawn. . .

And when the dawn came, we crept from behind the skiff and went into the town. . . Then we took friendly leave of each other and never met again, although for half a year I searched for that kind Natasha, with whom I spent the autumn night just described by me, in every hole and corner . . .

If she be already dead—and well for her if it were so!—may she rest in peace! And if she be alive . . . still I say: peace to her soul! And may the consciousness of her fall never enter her soul . . . for that would be a superfluous and fruitless suffering if life is to be lived . . .

A Tale of Mystery

In "The Mayor's Wife," Anna Katherine Green has produced a tale of mystery which will prove fascinating enough to those who enjoy dark secrets, to make them defer bed time, or anything else until the secret is revealed. This time it is neither murder nor robbery, but the sudden and singular indisposition which attacks the wife of the mayor of a western city, in the midst of a political campaign in which he is candidate for governor. The woman, young, beautiful, comfortably well-to-do, happily married, popular in society, and of a naturally cheerful disposition, suddenly becomes hysterical, moody and distraught. There is no apparent reason for the change, and none can be either surmised or discovered, and Mayor Packard, unable to give up his business arrangements, is unwilling to leave his wife alone, fearing, indeed, that her reason is tottering, engages a companion for her. The development of the plot reveals the fact that the house has the reputation of being haunted, and the lady in the case admits herself that she has seen something. There are unpleasant personal paragraphs appearing in the local newspapers intimating untold things, and there are notes in cypher as mysterious as all the rest. There is a legend of a great fortune spirited away almost under the eyes of the legatee, and of a scape grace nephew who has disappeared from the knowledge of his kin. There is also the remarkably handsome, efficient and deferential secretary to the mayor, and all of these are in one way or another involved in the matter which weighs on the mind of the mayor's wife and which she will not even admit exists, much less confess or confide to her husband or any one else. Part of the solution is discovered by accident, and the first break in the rampart of silence and mystery easily lets in the light, but, as the whole interest of the story is in the matter of what is the matter, it will be unfair to give even a hint of the end. The remarkable cypher, however, in which the threatening notes was couched is but a slight modification of one known to nearly every public school child of the seventies. Mrs. Green has almost as large a following as A. Conan Doyle, and none of them will be disappointed in "The Mayor's Wife." Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

A Botanical Book

"Fifty Flower Friends With Familiar Faces" is the somewhat cumbersome title chosen for Miss Edith Dunbar's field book for boys and girls. The title, however, is accurately descriptive. It is a botanical treatise designed for the use of young observers, but by no means a dull, scientific text book. For each of the fifty representatives chosen there is a page of scientific description, but added thereto are other pages telling of the habits and habitat, family connections, origin of names, and other matters of interest, besides such well-known poems as Arlo Bates's "Columbine," Whittier's "Jack in the Pulpit," Longfellow's "Fleur de Luce," and Bryant's "Fringed Gentian." Each flower is accurately presented through the medium of a drawing by W. I. Beecroft, artist and botanist, besides which there are twelve full page colored plates, making a remarkably handsome, as well as a useful and interesting volume, but one more suited to the eastern and New England states than to the Pacific Coast, since many of the familiar faces are unknown in our part of the world. However, it will prove a revelation to little Californians, who meet references to the "bouncing-bets," "butter-and-eggs," "bluets," "arbutus," and others, and to see how insignificant they are as compared with their own escholtzias, Mariposa lilies, "baby-blue-eyes," and hundreds more. A book prepared on the same lines as this of Miss Dunbar's on the familiar wild flowers of the west would be an excellent thing. It would do for the Pacific Coast children what she has undertaken for those of the other shore, and would, moreover, give the other little people a glimpse of the glories of California, where flowers bloom all the year round, and where instead of poking under the dead leaves of last spring for May blossoms, the fields are aglow in late February. "Fifty Flower Friends" is not put forth as a special edition at a high price, though it easily challenges comparison with the expensive holiday books and editions de luxe of children's classics. Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard who make a specialty of books for the young generation.

George Ade's Latest

"The Slim Princess," George Ade; that places it at once as a humorous and more or less satirical quip. Kalora was the elder daughter of the Governor-General of Morovenia, an Oriental kingdom in which the beauty of womankind is measured by avoidupols, and where, likewise, it is the rule for the younger sisters to wait with what degree of patience they may possess or acquire for their turn in the matrimonial market until their predecessors are disposed of. Kalora was decidedly falling into the period of the sere and yellow leaf. She was nineteen, and had, as yet, no suitors, for, despite the fact that the Oriental beauties are discreetly secluded rumor and gossip cannot be as rigidly confined. And Kalora was frightfully ugly and unrepresentable. She weighed only a hundred and eighteen pounds and she persistently refused to eat of the prescribed starchy and saccharine diet. She doted on pickles and olives, and exercised most shamefully, aided and abetted by her tutor. The Governor-General, once, in a fit of rage, had hurled at Popova such epithets as made him long for a suitable revenge, and though the potentate had long since forgotten, Popova had not. So, it was with the deliberate purpose of heaping sorrow on the paternal head that Popova had evolved this slim princess. Jeneka, the younger daughter, was all that a dutiful child should be. She slept and idled and feasted and fattened. She weighed a hundred and eighty, was as shapely as a balloon, and waddled as gracefully as a goose. She was sought by all the eligibles, and could have been married a score of times but for the obstacle of the elder and undesirable one who would not grow fat and therefore could not be married. It was at a garden party given in honor of the British Consul that Kalora disgraced herself entirely, and likewise, where she discovered, for the first time, that weight and circumference were not the universal tests of worth, and it was after the departure of the guests that she made the acquaintance of a fresh American youth, the heir of the "Pike family of Bessemer, that robbed all the orphans, tore down the starry banner, walked on the humble working girl, and gave the double cross to the common people," according to the muck-rakers of the ten cent magazine. What happened then, and thereafter, and what surprising advantages may accrue from being an exalted ruler of this and a grand sachem of that, and a cockorum of something else will be found duly set forth. Some foundation must surely exist for the American notion, and the surprisingly small amount of jealousy that exists, considering that the Presidency is an elective office supposed to be open to all, that the real reason which lay back of the calumny was that we are a nation of Presidents. There is none so poor that he cannot be president of something. And after all, a Knight Templar, a Noble of the Mystic Shrine, or any other of the high-sounding designations carries with it as much real power as that of many of the political titles of our unchristianized grandfathers. It would not do to derive a particle from the interest of "The Slim Princess" if one were to peruse all the details of this plot, for nobody but George Ade can tell a story, and it is the telling that counts. ## An Explanation Wanted

In his own good time the triumphant Mr. Francis Heney will probably explain why the testimony taken before the Grand Jury in reference to the trolley deal was not taken down in shorthand. We hope that Mr. Heney is able to give an explanation that will silence his critics and satisfy the courts. This hope we indulge, because as we have heretofore intimated, the failure to take down the testimony is susceptible of diverse interpretations none of which is complimentary to the Prosecution. While at this time the Prosecution can afford to mock at the thin, small voice of unfriendly criticism, it would be fatuous for our little coterie of redeemers to persuade themselves that they have been divinely anointed with a prophylactic against reaction of public sentiment. The laws of human nature are very much like those of the laws of physical nature. Mr. Heney and his confreres cannot afford to be indifferent to the fact that the life of the present Grand Jury is brief. Perhaps the next Grand Jury will inquire into the methods of Mr. Oliver and his associates, and endeavor to ascertain whether there has been a conspiracy to indict innocent men. Hence the importance of an explanation of the failure of the Grand Jury to take down in shorthand the testimony given by the principal witness for the Prosecution. It is the right of the defendant to demand a transcript of such testimony. This was the course pursued in the case of Louis Glass, and upon his demand he was furnished with a complete record of all of the evidence upon which the indictments were founded. The justice and fair play of this procedure are apparent. It is a substitute for the confrontation of witnesses, which is every defendant's right. In ordinary procedure, a defendant who is cross-examined on a felony charge appears in court and has the right to cross-examine witnesses against him, and if he be held for trial, he has information of all the matters upon which the indictment is based and of all of the facts which he is called upon to meet to prove his innocence. The transcript of the evidence taken before the Grand Jury is a substitute for this. A poor substitute, it will be admitted, and yet a substitute which, as we have said, makes plainly for justice and fair play.

What Their Critics Are Saying

When it is asked, as it is asked ten thousand times, Why was not Ruef's testimony before the Grand Jury taken down and why were not Calhoun and his associates given a copy of it as the law contemplates shall be done, the enemies of the prosecution make answer that the only conceivable reasons are two: first, because the prosecution proposed to force indictments whether the evidence justified them or not and to this end were unwilling that the records should show that indictments were returned without evidence. The second reason advanced is that by preserving the testimony of Ruef and furnishing the defendants with a copy of it, it would thereafter be impossible to force Ruef to change his testimony to meet the needs of the prosecution. With no present record of his testimony Ruef may be lashed into saying whatever the prosecution may desire him to say. In this connection, it is pointed out that the inspired article in the "Call" to the effect that Ruef had requested that no record be kept of his testimony is puerile and on its face, absurd. If Ruef's testimony was damaging to the defendants, he could not have objected to its preservation since in the course of affairs it is inevitable that he will be called upon to testify in open court and thus to publish his shame and infamy to the world. These are the arguments which are urged by the enemies of the prosecution which is doing so much to purge our civic government. Of course, they are unfounded; of course, they are untrue. A ready and complete answer to them must be at hand, but unfortunately that answer has not yet occurred to us and we are reluctantly compelled to add that, despite much zealous inquiry on our part we have not yet been able to find anybody to whom it has occurred.

Medical Pessimism

If gentlemen of the medical profession in this country had not long ago lost the power to startle laymen by their revolutionary statements, the United States would probably be in a ferment of excitement over the declaration of one Dr. J. H. Kellogg, made to the national conference of charities and corrections, that the American people are rapidly becoming a nation of idiots. Dr. Kellogg who may or may not be a respectable authority on alienism and degeneracy—certainly his fame has not yet penetrated to this western country—maintains that in the last fifty years insanity has increased three hundred per cent. The logical outcome of this increase he finds to be a nation of slant-heads with weak knees, bleared eyes and all the other outward manifestations of physical decadence. Within a year, says Dr. Kellogg (if the press report of his address may be relied upon) fifteen million Americans will die. At that rate of mortality the dullest student of primary number lessons could figure just how long the country will continue populated. But obviously Dr. Kellogg does not wish his vital statistics too rigorously applied for he also declares that in three hundred years from now Illinois (the doctor hails from Michigan) will be a state of driveling idiots. All of these statements of Dr. Kellogg are said to have been backed up with statistical tables which demonstrated their truth to a mathematical nicety. Strangely enough none of these medical pronouncements inspires the least alarm. The lugubrious influence which on their face they may seem calculated to exert is entirely absent. The prospect of this country becoming within a short space of time something between a vast cemetery and an insane asylum ought to be tremendously depressing, but it is not. American common sense refuses to believe that idiocy is a synonym for dementia americana and American health scouts the notion of national decay. Despite the deductions of the gloomy science the country refuses to take to its sick bed and it will not submit its mental condition to the tender mercies of a commission in lunacy appointed by Dr. Kellogg or any other expert. The plain truth of the matter is that this country is "on to" the doctors, to use a homely phrase. It knows that when they step outside the narrow limits of their calling they are usually the most credulous persons in the world and that their credulity is most frequently seasoned with the rankest sort of pessimism. The medicine of the books is a conservative science, like every other science that rests on solid principles, but the ordinary practitioner and especially the medico with an inclination toward the newspaper exploitation of his opinions is the most arrant radical in the world. The ethics of his profession prevents him from openly seeking publicity as other men seek it, so he has learned the trick of winning it through the enunciation of startling statements which are either read at medical conferences or contributed to medical publications. Fortunately these methods have become so common that little weight attaches to such utterances as those of Dr. Kellogg. Whether his pessimistic outburst raised the Michigan physician in the estimation of his brothers of the Esculapian craft cannot be known to outsiders, for the doctors are extremely careful about criticizing one another in public, but certainly it does not elevate either Dr. Kellogg or his profession in the minds of hard-headed laymen. Accustomed to the bewildering variations of medical belief and to the spectacle of doctors continually recanting on second thought what is most revolutionary in their utterances, the exoteric show a most unflattering indifference to such prophecies and are not at all surprised when the usual retraction follows. Remembering that so learned a doctor as Sir Thomas Browne was not ashamed to say about his own divagations from wisdom: "These opinions I never maintained with pertinacity, or endeavored to enslave any man's belief unto mine, nor so much as ever revealed or disputed them with my dearest friends; by which means I neither propagated them in others, nor confirmed them in myself; but suffering them to flame upon their own substance, without addition of new fuel, they went out insensibly of themselves"; laymen will be inclined to admire rather than despise Dr. Kellogg when he chants his palinode.

Preaching Peace, Conniving at Violence

Let us felicitate ourselves on the awakening among our passionate and pugnacious labor leaders of a sense of the deference due to public sentiment. Some months ago, at a labor mass-meeting in this city, called to protest against the trial of Moyer, Haywood and Pettibone, the prevailing tone of the speechmaking was most sanguinary. The blood of the meeting was on fire. The dominant sentiment was favorable to the organization, if necessary, of resistance to abominable governmental authority. One of the perfervid orators talked of blood as though it were his favorite beverage. The speeches were published in all the newspapers without comment. To be sure the speeches were all sound and fury, but they embodied a sentiment far more dangerous to society than any crime that since received the attention of our aggressive moralists. There is no immorality worse than that which attacks social order. It was most distressing to right thinking persons that our reformers of the press with their exalted ideals and praiseworthy sensitiveness in the matter of decency and the higher moralities should have remained quiescent while the ranters of unionism were giving utterance to their incendiary appeal. But now it is pleasant to observe that without the influence of any moral agency the labor leaders have assuaged their passion for internecine strife. We learned of their change of temperament this week when the terrific Tveitmoe from the socialistic atmosphere of Norway and the fustianic Furuseth from God-knows-where, rushed into print to deny that there had been any talk of wading through streams of blood at the meeting held last Sunday. That meeting was called when the Norwegian gasconader and his bilge-water pal became conscious of the fact that Patrick Calhoun has demonstrated his ability to operate his street car system despite the hostility of organized labor. It was called to urge the poor, unfortunate carmen, who were coerced into quitting their jobs, to pursue a course of intimidation toward the patrons of the car service. Ostensibly their purpose was to discourage union men from riding on the cars; for while the blatant Cornelius has been vociferously affirming, with most indecent disregard of the obvious truth, that the boycott is a success, thousands of members of the unions have been putting nickels into the treasury of the United Railroads. Union men have been riding in despite of the fines by which the unions have testified their consciousness of the disloyalty of their members, and all the while Cornelius and his fellow screechers have been ululating against the loathsome element of the community which has seen fit to associate with blood-stained strikebreakers. Ostensibly, we say, to deter union men from riding on the street cars, was the course of intimidation agreed upon, but the underlying motive was to provoke turbulence and scare the public. And when Furuseth and Tveitmoe were represented as having fired the hearts of their hearers with old-fashioned blood and thunder discourse, these erstwhile belligerent leaders were quick to demand a correction. They emphatically denied that they had employed any incendiary language. They wished it to be understood that the meeting was a peaceable one, and that it was resolved to win the strike without resort to violence. But as violence is being employed every day, and as the methods decided upon at that meeting can be productive of nothing but violence nobody is likely to be deceived by the transparent insincerity of these amiable advocates of peace. The strike is over so far as Calhoun is concerned. He has triumphed over the forces of anarchy and for the fight that he made he is entitled to the gratitude of the community.

War Notes at The Hague

Remembering that the idea of an international peace conference originated with the czar, it may seem grotesque that the first speech listened to by the delegates at The Hague should be a repudiation of the proposal to limit armament and that it should come from the leader of the Russian delegation; but the mask of hypocrisy which nations usually don before sitting down together in diplomatic pow-wow is so carelessly worn when the abolition or restriction of warfare is the subject of international debate that this obvious inconsistency surprises nobody. It is, in fact, so coolly taken for granted that Mr. William T. Stead who recently made himself so unpopular in this country by his pugnacious advocacy of peace and the parliament of the world, did not draw special attention to it in writing of the opening of the conference. With Russia,

Germany, Austria and the United States obstinately opposed to the limitation of armament, it is difficult to see what good can come of the Hague conference, even on the violent supposition that Great Britain, France, Italy and the other powers should espouse the contrary side of the argument. To be sure there are delegates in the conference who insist that plans for the inauguration of universal comity must be considered, but their piping tunes of peace have been pretty effectually drowned by the trumpet note of war which M. Nelidoff hastened to sound. According to this gentleman who left St. Petersburg in the condition of an armed camp, universal peace is a dream, "a star floating far above this mundane sphere, to be always striven for but never attained." Considering that this delicate intimation that the delegates were engaged in the pleasant but inutile pastime of stargazing was made by the president of the conference in the speech which opened proceedings, there is little likelihood that the doors of the temple of Janus will be slammed to during this summer. The abolition of war is a fascinating idea and the nations are always willing to discuss it, but they regard it as being strictly an academic question. Germany's position in regard to the matter was frankly set forth before the peace conference began when Chancellor von Buelow said: "Our armament has shown itself to be a good instrument of peace, not only technically, but morally too. Nobody can resent our desire to keep this instrument." This is a trifle more euphemistic than the "walk softly but carry a big stick" of President Roosevelt, but it expresses the determination of all the great powers to keep on building battleships and inventing explosives—and to keep on using them—until the millennium and the Greek kalends arrive. Meanwhile the nations are not unwilling to accept the pleasant hospitality of Holland and to soothe the asperities of winter diplomacy with soft summer speeches.

The Immunity Doctrine

Those who have registered a mental protest against the immunity which rumor says was granted to the self-confessed boodlers of the board of supervisors by the officers of the graft prosecution, will find food for serious thought in the position which this country finds itself placed in with regard to Edward H. Harriman. Despite the revelation of criminal acts committed by him in the notorious Alton railroad deal, it is announced that there is no possibility of proceeding against him, for the reason that his testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission renders him immune from prosecution. Here is an extension of the immunity doctrine to conditions so grave that the principle becomes infinitely more mischievous than in its local application. In this city the immunity of the supervisors, if immunity has really been promised them, is compensated for, in principle at least, by the use of their testimony against other offenders, but in the case of Harriman there is no such advantage to be derived from his escape. He alone has offended, yet he is to go scot free. The decision of the federal agents that it would be useless to institute criminal proceedings against the railroad baron is based on the Humphreys' decision in the case of the Chicago packers, a decision which was bitterly but vainly fought by former Attorney General Moody. Unless Bonaparte, his successor, finds new arguments wherewith to break down the immunity doctrine as at present formulated, it will be possible for Harriman and all other corporation manipulators to safeguard themselves against criminal prosecution by the simple process of testifying against themselves before the Interstate Commerce Commission, surely as anomalous a condition as can well be imagined. The barrier which the government thus finds itself unable to surmount in its pursuit of powerful criminals cannot be removed too soon. No immunity was promised to Harriman when he gave his testimony before the commission; it seems to have come automatically through the application of the Humphreys decision. The necessity for the reform of the laws which place such offenders as he beyond the reach of punishment is obvious; until the obnoxious decision which has already saved the beef trust men and the railway overlord is overturned the government attack on corporation abuses will proceed but haltingly.

The Mob's Idea of Justice

The Chronicle is of the opinion that the men who have been indicted by the grand jury should waive all technicalities and go to trial. "As for the claim," so says the Chronicle, "that an indictment improperly brought works an incalculable injury to the accused if he is innocent, that is all nonsense. If a man is innocent he need not fear the action of a trial jury. If there is no evidence to convict he will be vindicated by an acquittal far more thoroughly than by quashing an indictment because of some informality." These are quite plausible platitudes, but in the light of the recent trial of Eugene Schmitz and in the consciousness of the facilities to hand for exciting public clamor against all men who have come within range of the Prosecution's guns they are not so persuasive as they might otherwise be. Moreover we know that a man may be innocent and yet have reason to fear a trial jury even when he is not the victim of public clamor. This fact was illustrated not long ago when a man who was sent to the penitentiary for robbing Dr. Leland was subsequently vindicated by the confession of the real culprit. The conviction of innocent men is by no means an uncommon occurrence. But even though trial juries were infallible, it is hardly just to condemn a man or question his motives for availing himself of his constitutional privileges. It is especially unjust to assume this hostile attitude against the men indicted by Mr. Heney, for we know that that gentleman expects to procure their conviction with the assistance of Abe Ruef who has been repeatedly told in the public prints that he must give the "desired" testimony or suffer the consequences of his own stubbornness. Surely the editor of the Chronicle would not wish to see a friend tried for a felony amid such circumstances as those that will attend the trial of the men indicted by the Oliver grand jury. We doubt that it would please him to see an enemy sent to the penitentiary on the word of Abe Ruef especially if that word had been uttered in consideration of a guarantee of immunity. It might be well for the editor of the Chronicle to fancy himself in the place of one of those indicted, and speculate as to whether he would forfeit his constitutional rights in order to hasten his trial before Judge Dunne even though he were assured that his jury would be nicely cared for by Mr. Biggy. The unprejudiced viewpoint of the person most concerned is conducive to accuracy. It was from that viewpoint that Justice McFarland discussed the Bruner case years ago when a writ of prohibition was applied for to restrain a Superior Judge from trying the defendant on an indictment found by an irregularly impaneled grand jury. "In times of great public excitement," said Justice McFarland, "a citizen who has incurred censure in certain quarters would have scarcely a remnant left of that protection which is afforded by a fair trial before an impartial jury; and to say that such unlimited power can be safely lodged with all men who may happen to be judges would be to ignore human history and the principles of human nature. It must be remembered that unauthorized power may be used for bad as well as for good purposes. A spectator might, for the moment, look in safety and complaisance on the barbaric tumult of a mob, if he happened to be in sympathy with its present design; but let the fury of another mob be directed against him, or those whom he knows or believes to be innocent, and he will appreciate at once the value of legal protection. So also he may look lightly on the spectacle of a jury packed for the purpose of prosecuting one whom he believes to be guilty; but if such a course were pursued toward him or his friend, he would have clear views of personal security and the sacredness of a jury trial. Under the best system that human wisdom can devise, an innocent man will, at long intervals, be punished and a guilty one go free; but that a government of law is better than a government of unlimited personal power is a principle that has been fought out in England and American history, and established as a monument of liberty." It is gratifying to know that Justice McFarland is still on the Supreme Bench. There is perhaps no jurist in California who enjoys a greater measure of the respect of the bar.

The Blat Elephant

By George Maxwell

Ahman, my head boatman, came into the verandah by the front stairs, and I knew that he had important news. The old man had his own way of doing everything, and whenever he came to see me about the Government boats, or any other matter of pure business, he came in through the servant's entrance. If he came on an errand connected with shooting or fishing, he felt that the relationship between us justified him in using a side entrance to the bungalow. But when he came with khabar of big game, he always presented himself at the front door.

"The Blat Elephant is feeding near Kuala Sol." He paused to let me take in the news to its full extent, and then continued: "The tide will be running up this afternoon. If we start at five o'clock in the big house-boat, we shall reach Kuala Sol by eight o'clock, and can start tracking the first thing to-morrow morning. May I give orders accordingly?"

He went away to make the necessary arrangements, and a few minutes later Sleman, another of my boatmen, came up to put my ten-bore rifle in its case. He was the youngest of my crew, and always accompanied Ahman and myself upon our shooting expeditions, his special duty being to carry the sandwich case and water bottle. An exceedingly nice youngster of about nineteen, he came from one of the northern unprotected states of the Malay Peninsula, and being new to the ways of the white men was, when he first joined my service, somewhat shy and awkward. He was very keen, however, to learn all that he could about every form of sport, and under Ahman's tuition was going through a regular course to "obtain courage." Abstinence from certain kinds of food, ghee in particular, seemed to be the most important condition, but there were many charms and invocations to jins and legendary heroes to be learnt, and there were some rather extraordinary observances to be kept. Both men looked upon the course as a very serious matter.

Punctually at five o'clock everything was ready; the house-boat pushed off from the landing-stage at the bottom of my garden, and the incoming tide bore us smoothly up the Kuantan river.

Both banks of the broad river were covered with a dense forest of mangroves, and trees with dark, glossy, fleshy leaves and quaint shaped fruit pushed one another actually into the river. A couple of miles above my house we entered a tributary of the Kuantan, the Blat, which gave its name to the elephant we were seeking.

Soon after sunset the house-boat entered the Sol, a tributary of the Blat. A short way up this river the mangroves were replaced by ordinary forest, and before long a bend in the river disclosed the cheerful light of a small house in an isolated clearing on the bank. We tied up at the landing stage, and in answer to our hail the owner of the house, a man named Brahim, came down to the boat.

He was able to give us all the information that we required. The great solitary elephant, which for years out of memory had appeared at intervals in the valley of the Blat, played no small part in his life and in that of the agricultural population of the district. On every visit it did an enormous amount of damage in the plantations and gardens, destroying cocoa-nut and plantain trees and knocking down houses, and Brahim and the Malays of the district looked upon it as one of the ills to which their life was subject. They regarded it as they would regard a flood, a harvest failure, or small pox. All of these things were alike in the respect that of none of them could the occurrence be prevented by any human power, and that forethought was therefore merely an unnecessary and unintelligent anticipation of a possible future evil. A calm acceptance of the fate that placed him within the area influenced by the elephant thus gave a curiously impersonal tone to the manner in which Brahim thought and spoke of it. He said that the elephant had fed the night before in an abandoned clearing about a mile further up the river, and that he expected it to invade his plantation this night or the next, but talked in a voice so unconcerned that one could hardly realize that he was speaking of the imminent depredation of what was practically the only property that he had in the world.

He told us that he had vowed to slay a goat when the elephant was killed, and mentioned the names of some of the richer Malays in the Blat district, each of whom had vowed to slaughter a buffalo upon the same auspicious occasion.

While we were thus talking, voices hailed us out of the darkness that lay upon the river. A couple of Malays passing down stream in a dugout, recognizing the house-boat and guessing our errand, called out to let us know that they had just heard the elephant feeding on the opposite bank of the river about half a mile up stream. Brahim told us that the ford by which the elephant generally crossed the river was at this place, and we decided that, if we waited there in a boat, we might possibly surprise the animal at the shallows. Ahman, Sleman, and I therefore took a dug-out and started without further delay.

Before we had gone far, we heard the elephant feeding about a quarter of a mile inland from the river bank. It is not easy to say how impressive was the sound in the stillness of the night as it came from the darkness of the forest, which stood up wall-like above the river bank. The wind was blowing from it to us, and we waited in silence beside the ford. It fed slowly towards us until only a couple of hundred yards separated us, and then stopped a long time under a tree to pull down a hanging creeper. The whole operation was marvellously distinct. We could hear the branches shake, and bend, and creak, as the animal

In the Matter of Justice

By Theodore Bonnet

A great deal of nonsense is being uttered these days about the conduct of Judge Dunne in the trial of Eugene Schmitz. It is all very well to criticise him for a course that seems arbitrary and autocratic and to deplore his impatience with the set forms of judicial procedure, but we must consider the urgent necessity of ridding ourselves of the Schmitz incubus and vindicating the morality of the community. Judge Dunne's conduct may have the gravest aspect in the eyes of the wisest and best, but so great was the provocation that it is vain to expect effective condemnation of it by public opinion. It is in times such as these that the law is made to subserve the ends of moral rather than of legal justice by judges whose instinct for its principles and susceptibility to its spirit and traditions are subservient to their zeal for the public weal. And fortunately for them they may feel assured that they will be sustained and approved by the people so long as there is colorable justification for triumphs that make the merely judicious grieve.

It might be urged that even when the public mind has been upset, a decorous and resolute enforcement of the law is feasible, and that such enforcement would satisfy the public welfare and desire without deranging the sober course of justice. In the abstract this is true, but in the concrete case of Eugene Schmitz there were circumstances over which Judge Dunne had no control. The fact is that despite the moral certainty of the defendant's guilt, the prosecution was handicapped by a shortage of evidence. So we should not be inclined to censure harshly Judge Dunne's conduct. His conduct was justified by a noble and salutary object.

The sentimental may be inclined to reflect that we are a people whose boast it has always been that we never press hard on the vanquished, that we are inflamed by the spectacle of a man struck when he is prostrate on the ground, but it is more important just now to realize that the stricken city of San Francisco has been redeemed from corruption. It is of course unfortunate that to abate graft in public office it should be necessary to deface the shrine of Justice, but history abounds in examples of desperate remedies applied to desperate cases.

While admitting that much of what Eugene Schmitz received at the hands of Judge Dunne is facetiously called justice, I would not be understood as accepting the views of his severest critics respecting misinterpretations of the law. One of Schmitz's attorneys has announced, and a daily paper has given publicity to the slander, that fifty exceptions were taken to the rulings and conduct of Judge Dunne, almost any one of which is sufficient to justify the setting aside of the verdict. Obviously this assertion implies malfeasance to a colossal degree on the part of the court. It is almost incredible that in this enlightened age and Christian country a judge would so far transcend the bounds of decency and justice even in his zeal for reform. It is to be hoped that Schmitz's attorney has been guilty of gross exaggeration; that he has, let us say, multiplied the number of fatal errors by not less than two. Fifty fatal errors! Was there ever a record in an American criminal court so thickly inter-persed with expressions of juridical prejudice? Most certain am I that no such record can be found.

That Judge Dunne committed some errors I do not doubt. The records of the Supreme Court show that Judge Dunne finds it extremely difficult to try cases in strict accordance with law. And by a singular fatality he invariably errs on the side of the prosecution. This circumstance is an infallible indication of temperament. But this temperament is not peculiar to Judge Dunne. Nor can it be truly said that his attitude toward the defendant in this particular case was vastly different from his attitude toward the average prisoner in the dock. Judge Dunne in common with most of the judges of our criminal court in recent years has exhibited a salutary severity toward offenders. These judges as a rule regard their elevation to the bench as a special and blessed interposition of providence for the good of mankind, and they devote themselves most earnestly to the task of improving the pursuit of life, liberty and happiness for all that keep out of the dragnet of the law. We usually have one or two judges on the bench who are entirely unconscious of the fact that while the attributes of God are all equal that of His mercy is in our eyes the most pleasing and attractive. But the severity of these judges is not altogether due to a dread of indulging the infirmities of men. Not because of a lack of human sympathy do they restrain every impulse to lenity, but rather because of their consciousness of the popular notion that a judge who is zealous for the ridding of the community of criminals is a good man to keep on the bench.

Some among these judges are conscious also of a strong popular prejudice against technicalities, and they cater to that prejudice to the best of their ability. Nor is it only in open court that they smooth the pathway of the prosecution. Behind the draperies of their chambers they consult with the attorneys for the prosecution as to the best course to be pursued to minimize the defendant's chances of establishing his innocence. They have even been known to give prosecutors special tips in open court, by significant winks, respecting jurors who, like themselves, are animated by a mad passion for sending men to jail. Singular to relate these occurrences have not occasioned much scandal. They are the subject of gossip in the legal profession, but that is all. Some lawyers have been shocked in their experience with judges of the character of these I have described; others have become callous, and now view with cynical indifference the vicious practices of tyrannical magistrates who are ever on the alert for the bribe which comes in the shape of public favor. There is perhaps not a lawyer in town who has not laughed at the boast of one of our judges: that he can contrive to get more limelight out of the trial of a petty larceny thief than the cleverest of his confreres can extract from a murder case. This is perhaps a harmless conceit indicating nothing more detestable than an inordinate craving for publicity, which, to say the least however, is hardly consistent with the dignity of the Bench. It suggests an unbecoming avidity for fame, and implies a yearning for popularity that must impair the quality of justice dispensed by a magistrate thus afflicted. "A popular man," says John Dryden,

"is in truth no better than a prostitute to common fame and to the people; he lies down to every one he meets for the hire of praise, and his humility is only a disguised ambition." It is perhaps to be regretted that we have men on the bench, especially on the criminal bench, who desire above all things to be popular.

This yearning for popularity is especially mischievous when it is manifested by a disposition to earn a reputation for zeal in the interest of the people. So many are the ugly passions which find zeal a convenient mask that it has been said that it would have been for the benefit of mankind if zeal had never been reckoned in the catalogue of virtues. To zeal may be attributed the fact that the Bench has been disgraced by so vicious a knave as Wright, so loathsome a rascal as Saunders, so bloodthirsty a villain as Scroggs and so hideous a tyrant as Jeffreys. It is the zealous judge eager for popularity who caters to ignorant prejudice against technicalities in despite his knowledge of the fact that public justice is endangered whenever the principles of the law are permitted to be warped by judicial decision, whenever what is thought to be expediency is put in the place of what is known to be just.

Every judge who is not a Shallow or a Dogberry knows that while legal justice ought to form the nearest approach to moral justice that human tribunals are capable of, it must always take effect through general rules applicable to all men alike. Every judge who is learned in the science of jurisprudence knows that it is most mischievous and vicious for him to ignore the general principles upon which the law is founded.

But in addition to popular and harsh judges there are judges woefully unfamiliar with the science of jurisprudence. They came to the bench upon the same theory as that which moved Robert Wright to follow the advice of Lord Jeffreys. "As you seem," said Jeffreys, "to be unfit for the bar, or any other honest calling, I see nothing for it but that you should become a judge yourself." And he did, and he became Lord Chief Justice of England in which position he gained distinction for his ignorance and his knaveries.

But to return from my digressions:—it was the design of the earlier paragraphs of my simple recital to indicate the spirit of our bench and bar so that it should be obvious that there is much to be urged in extenuation of the attitude of Judge Dunne toward so monstrous a criminal as Eugene Schmitz. Unquestionably Judge Dunne started upon the trial of that case with preconceived notions respecting the character of the defendant. It was human nature for him to do so. He must have been conscious moreover of the importance of co-operating with Mr. Spreckels and Mr. Heney and Mr. Burns for the redemption of this city. That he did gallantly co-operate with them nobody will deny. The gentlemen behind the prosecution have affirmed in the public prints that Judge Dunne is entitled to the gratitude of the community. If he had merely presided over the trial in the manner prescribed by law, and performed the functions of his office in strict accordance with the spirit of his oath, it would be the height of absurdity to suggest that he was entitled to gratitude either from the people or the defendant. But it was obvious to the whole city that Judge Dunne, throughout the trial, was intent on facilitating the beneficent task of the prosecution. And in view of the factitious factors of which the prosecution availed itself, its deft evocation of public sentiment, and its successful exploitation of public clamor, it should be said in justice to Judge Dunne, that a man of far greater strength of character might have found it difficult to resist so powerful an influence. Judge Dunne's conduct of the case was that of a magistrate discreetly deferential, of a jurist sensible of the concessions to which the mob is entitled. Not altogether by his rulings did he thus vindicate his respect for the pee-pul; he held court in a hall of dimensions commensurate with the importance of the case, and gave signal recognition to the newspaper camera as a paramount aid to justice.

And now we are told that he gave Schmitz the worst of it in as many as fifty distinct rulings, each of which entitles the defendant to a new trial. Well maybe he did, but it will surprise me very much if the higher tribunal decides that Schmitz did not have a fair trial before an impartial judge. It will surprise me because I am aware of the fact that there is lacking in our judiciary two qualities which are essential to the dispensation of justice. One of these qualities is intellectual honesty. This is a mental, not a moral quality, though, to be sure, it involves high moral integrity. It is the faculty of seeing things just as they are, unmoved by prejudice or passion or excitement or clamor; seeing them and reaching conclusions by a conscientious course of reasoning. That quality has been a characteristic of every great judge that ever lived. It is a quality that is universally recognized, and commands immediate confidence. Chief Justice Marshall possessed it in a high degree. And it was so generally recognized in him, that even in the times of great political excitement when he decided important constitutional questions, the defeated side went away satisfied, convinced that it was mistaken.

The other essential quality is moral courage. It has been said that you can find plenty of men to face batteries but very few that will face majorities. When it comes to resisting the pressure of an excited popular opinion even proud and learned jurists exhibit a cowardice that is most despicable. Indeed in no department of public life can we find any species of courage other than that which plucks dead lions by the beard. But the bench above all places is where we most need the courage that would prefer to abide in self-respecting obscurity than yield to the dictates of an inflamed public opinion. Daniel Webster's motto, "Vera pro gratis," is a very old fashioned sentiment, but it is one that makes for reputation with posterity if not with one's contemporaries. Daniel Webster possessed a high degree of moral courage and he had many detractors in his day, but now he stands the stateliest figure of his period, the noblest citizen of his time. There is hardly any vice which so debases us in our own esteem as moral cowardice; there is no virtue so ennobling to character as moral courage. It remains to be seen which predominates in the court that must pass upon the questions raised in the case of Eugene Schmitz.

Phelan Emerges

The Hon. James D. Phelan solemnly assures us through the medium of a newspaper interview that he does not wish to succeed the unlamented Schmitz. "I have been mayor for five years," says the Hon. James, "and I really do not want another term." In that same interview he said that he would return to San Francisco this week, but only to look after his business interests. But the Hon. James will undoubtedly find time while here to look after his political interests too, for while our distinguished young publicist has no appetite for the mayoralty job there is a job higher up that he would not scorn. That he intends taking a hand in politics I infer from these statements: "The next mayor of San Francisco will be honest and efficient. The supervisors will appoint any man we decide on, as we hold indictments over their heads." The Hon. James has emerged from his modest self-sought obscurity to take the helm and guide the ship of State once more. Some weeks ago I suggested that Mr. Phelan was the genius in the background of the Prosecution, the main source of Mr. Spreckels's inspiration, and now he kindly gives verisimilitude to my surmise. From far away New York he discloses the most secret plans of the Prosecution. Schmitz is to go to jail for life, Ruef is to be dealt with leniently, the supervisors will not be prosecuted, and the political campaign will soon be opened. Thus has it been ordained by the guiding spirit of the Prosecution.

The Ways of a Millionaire

The fanfare of the coming campaign has already been sounded and all the old-time reformers are gathering for the fray. The Hon. James Duval will mash them and resume where he left off with his incomplete and somewhat rickety political machine. Let us welcome the young millionaire into the field once more. There is one thing about Jimmy—he will give us a clean administration, and that is the main desideratum. With Jimmy in the saddle we can go to bed o' nights reasonably certain that the sacks of coin in the treasury have all been hefted and that our funds will be intact in the morning. There is only one objection to be urged against Jimmy—he will do politics. And when Jimmy does politics he is remorseless. Now it is not wrong for a sacrosanct reformer to do politics providing he does not confound his personal interests with those of the community. Unfortunately Jimmy is given to this sort of confusion. He was guilty of it when he designed the charter ostensibly for the purpose of perfecting our system of government but in reality to facilitate the upbuilding of a political machine with the aid of which he might reach the United States Senate. One of the most conspicuous consequences of the charter is Eugene Schmitz. Nevertheless I am quite willing to give Jimmy another trial. He has learned a lesson; perhaps it will profit him. Now if he can discipline himself into assuaging his congenital prejudices against all that do not agree with him it will be much easier to bear with him than it was in the days when every man was pronounced a crook who saw flaws in the charter.

Our Ferocious Reformers

It seems characteristic of reformers to be noisy and spiteful and bigoted, and the nauseousness of such company makes it very hard for a man to lend countenance to its enterprises. It is the misfortune of the Hon. James D. Phelan that he always surrounds himself with such cattle. The bellowing of them is already to be heard. All the chronic, long-haired reformers of the city with whom we have been familiar during many a job-chasing campaign are once more to the front vindicating their exalted principles by affirming their antipathy for all that do not agree with them in thought, word and deed. With the average vociferous reformer you must agree or be eternally damned. If you are not with him, you are against him; there is no neutral territory. The reformer is temperamentally impulsive and ferocious. He is convinced that his set of passions are the only respectable passions for a man to have, and that no imperfection of character is so ugly as the other fellow's. When he summons us to do the right and divinely heroic he never stops to consider what is fair and kind toward the person immediately concerned. I have seen many reformers come and go, and I cannot help seasoning my observations with the salt of historical parallels. Experience has taught me that of all reformers the one whose declension is the most rapid is the one who is always gratifying his own spleen and eructating his invectives against those whom envy and disappointed avarice and ambition have induced him to revile.

Some Philosophical Reflections

It seems to be one of the designs of nature to detach the passion for governmental reforms from all the virtues that sweeten character and commend men to the tender and sympathetic regard of their fellows. At any rate the average personality that consecrates itself to the uplifting of politics is seldom as magnetic as the unfortunates in need of uplifting. The almost universal rule is that the wicked politician has his chief vice redeemed by many virtues, whereas the reformer has a virtue encrusted with many ugly traits of character among which it is difficult to find those distinctly human blemishes which have made the male of our species worth saving. Nevertheless the reformer serves a very wholesome purpose in the world. He inspires spasms of virtue that are quite essential to the preservation of government. Without him we should be in a sad plight between the devils of public office and the marine depths of corporate dishonesty. I am far from intolerant of reformers. Nor am I hopelessly prejudiced against the Heney's of the graft prosecution. If they succeed in landing a few big and little boodlers in jail they shall receive my ardent felicitations. From them I dissent only in the matter of the view that has been taken of all citizens who decline to add volume to the public clamor which Mr. Heney deems a legitimate aid to justice. For their passionate devotion to that view one might ridicule the reformers until he wheezed at his own jest. But what's the use! I have come to realize that every opinion, howsoever fantastic to you or me, is to some one so important as to be espoused at the risk of life. So keen has become my appreciation of the diversity and undulancy of human nature that I am ever changing color sympathetically therewith. Like Montaigne I am beginning to realize as I weigh for my own edification in my own little balance, the characters of certain wicked citizens and the characters of certain noble publicists by whom they are scorned and abhorred, that none of us can ever be despised according to his full desert. Nevertheless to the reformers and publicists say I, Go to it! and put the apprehended wicked behind bars, but be like the poet who felt that he was in himself a sufficient theatre of ridiculous actions and expected no company either in a court, a town or a playhouse. I feel that I must forbear from joining the crusade that was organized for redemption purposes but that has violently digressed. It has never pleased me, despite the humbleness of my fortune either to play the demagogue or draw the deformities of life when every figure of imperfection more resembles me than it does others.

Civic Patriotism

Pleased as I shall be to see the bribe-givers go to jail if convicted by due process of law, I cannot enter into the spirit of the Prosecution with the feelings of the average unit of the community or the average molecule of the body politic who sees only the necessity of vindicating justice, who has his viewpoint obscured by no oblique shadows, who follows the trend of affairs with the narrow pertinacity of a respectable ant, who is guided mainly by his knowledge of the fact that his interests are involved in the interests of the larger number and who never sees the wires behind the scenes or the hand that manipulates them. Yet perhaps it would not be impossible for me to enter into the spirit of the Prosecution were I able to yield my imagination to the seductive touch of the civic patriot in his variety. Those who can do so are to be envied. Carlyle tells us that it is natural for us to worship heroes, and he thinks there is no finer sentiment than that which inspires that worship. I quite agree with him, and yet I cannot overcome an unfortunate predilection for discrimination even in the matter of heroes. My ideal hero is an humble individual who is content with an obscure station in the temple of virtue and who is averse to being set on the pinnacle of it. There is in me the stubborn notion that true greatness, if it be anywhere on earth, is distinctly a private virtue, never suggestive of pomp and vanity, confined to the contemplation of the joys that are its offspring and the happiness that it diffuses.

As to a Conspiracy

So it is clear that I have some ill-founded prejudices which may account in a measure for my failure to augment the chorus that is so pleasing to Mr. Heney and his confreres. But these prejudices are not alone responsible for my apathy. Being mindful of the fate of Cicero I am somewhat concerned for the gentlemen behind the Prosecution. Such was Cicero's avidity for fame that he earned the contempt of posterity. By his action against Cataline he saved the city but became intolerably vain. This vanity made his virtue so suspected by his friends that Brutus, whom of all men he adored refused him the honor of participating in his conspiracy. A wit has made the commentary that coveting the favor of posterity, vain Cicero begged it as an alms of all his friends the historians that they flatter his consulship, and the histories having been lost the vanity of his request stands recorded in his own writings. Not because I am laboring under the vain delusion that I could render invaluable service to Mr. Heney and Mr. Spreckels do I recite the considerations that restrain my enthusiasm, but rather to suggest an explanation of the apathy of others. For while the Prosecution continues its stentorian notes of alarm respecting a conspiracy to destroy popular confidence and besmirch Mr. Rudolph Spreckels, I know there is really no misapprehension among the reformers. It is unreasonable to suppose that the Prosecution is apprehensive of direful results of popular revulsion. Admitting that there is a conspiracy on foot, why should the Prosecution be agitated by that emotion which has been aptly described as the tax that conscience pays to guilt? The gentlemen behind the prosecution assure us that they are performing a great public service. If so there is no occasion for misgivings; their slumbers should not be disturbed by bad dreams. But men so familiar with justice as they have become should not dishonor it with foul suspicion. My advice to them is to calm themselves. This constant rumbling of robustious nonsense has become wearisome. Moreover it is offensive to the pee-pul in whose intelligence and virtue the gentlemen behind the prosecution have frequently expressed their flattering confidence. Let it not be supposed that the pee-pul whose interests are so carefully guarded by the Prosecution with the assistance of the holy alliance formed by our immaculate dailies, are to be deluded by the rich villains of this community and their innumerable despised hirelings. As I pointed out last week the conspirators haven't a ghost of a chance against the invincible strategy of the disingenuous Mr. Heney, so irresistible is his sway, with a grand jury at his beck and call and a judge highly sensitive to his emotions and carefully insulated against all prejudices that might unduly advantage the defendants. So why these pangs and throes of a mock agony of concern for the dear pee-pul! This feigned spirit of apprehension at this time is in the nature of an anachronism. It served a good purpose in the beginning when distrust was rife, and before the machinery of the law was satisfactorily adjusted to the important business in hand, but now popular sentiment is no longer available.

Personal Abuse

In the circumstances it seems to me somewhat unjust to hold that neutral men like myself are traitors and that by our indifference we are a menace to the welfare of the city. To charge that everybody is corrupt who is not on the housetop contributing to the clamor with which the Prosecution hopes to influence timid judges is of course absurd. As for the besmirching of Rudolph Spreckels, that is another matter. Rudolph Spreckels's motives may properly be challenged, but controversies are not to be illuminated by personal abuse. Nor is it fair to hold Rudolph Spreckels responsible for the canicular rages of his perfervid devotees. But Mr. Spreckels is standing for all that the Prosecution has done, and he should not complain if some of the men who have been traduced by his hired prosecutor should retaliate. If they can find channels through which the public may be reached with proofs of chicanery, with evidence that Mr. Spreckels is not the man to set up standards of rectitude in this community, it would be something in the nature of poltroonery for him to utter a whine of protest. Far be it from me to assert that such evidence is in existence. Far be it from me, if any could be found to assist in its dissemination. Mine is merely the duty of publishing legitimate news and legitimate comment. I merely wish to acquaint Mr. Spreckels with some of the rules of the game which he is playing. To be a real hero he must stand the gaff. Meanwhile it might be well for him to read the interior press and learn something of the opinions that are held respecting the character of the prosecution beyond the circle of the journalistic combination formed for the redemption of San Francisco and the establishment of a brand new political machine.

Respecting Criticism

In all ages of the world kings and heroes of high and low degree have made the fatal error of hearkening only to the counsel of their favorite courtiers. Surely

Mr. Spreckels does not believe that the conspirators have bought up the leading newspapers of the interior. It is not likely that he believes that General Harrison Gray Otis of the Los Angeles Times, one of the most distinguished journalists of the West, a gallant old soldier whose paper is one of the few big dailies of California that have not at some time or another sold their editorial utterances—it is not likely, that Mr. Spreckels believes that General Otis has been subsidized by the associated villains. Politically General Otis is bitterly hostile to the Republican political machine which Mr. Heney is desirous of destroying; but General Otis is saying much tougher things about Mr. Spreckels and his associates than have yet been said in San Francisco. So it might be well for Mr. Spreckels and Mr. Heney and some of his other saintly and spotless but febrile touts whose superfetation of godliness swells them to a proud and just conceit of their superiority to all sinners within striking distance, to reflect that perhaps diversity of opinion is largely a matter of diversity of mental constitution. It would do them no harm to have a little of that large serenity of the poet in whom years strengthen the philosophy of everyday life. It bespeaks an unhealthy mind that can conceive no sincerity in hostile opinions. The world has ever been viewed by men of different dispositions in a light totally different. To the thoughtful and melancholy it has the aspect of a vale of misery; to the frivolous and the volatile, as a theatre of delightful diversion. It all depends on the viewpoint. Experience has made sceptics of many of us, and we cannot enter with enthusiasm into all enterprises that to the more credulous seem highly beneficent. We are told that it is civic patriotism that inspires the Prosecution, but we know that true patriotism is a species of heroic virtue which in all ages of the world has been denied to the preservers of their country and given to the destroyers of it. And when we see how the law is being tortured by Mr. Heney, how Justice is being put through new paces by Judge Dunne, we marvel that there should be such tropical violence of taste in the matter of patriotism. There is no doubt much to be urged in justification of all that has been done. Even Judas felt justified in his traitorous kiss, but his faith in his own motives in no sense diminished the detestable character of his act.

Two Pictures

The reporters who stood outside of Mayor Schmitz's brilliantly lighted home last Sunday night and listened to the sounds of revelry that issued therefrom formed a very erroneous conception of the character of the scene within. But it is not surprising that they were guilty of a misinterpretation. Their impression was distinctly in accord with the externals by which it was conveyed. The music was of the sort that betokens lightness of heart and buoyancy of spirits. The childish laughter assured the listeners of emotions that indicated a vulgar indifference to the shame that had been brought upon the family by the father on whose shoulder was resting the ponderous hand of the law. What more natural than that there should rush into the mind two vivid pictures instinct with poignant contrast—the frivolous, laughing family at home, the father steeped in the agony of remorse in his prison cell. It is by such contrasts that great dramas seize the imagination and stir the emotions. But the picture in the Schmitz domicile was itself composed of those conflicting elements that are dear to the heart of the dramaturgist. If the soul of that picture had been bared to the eyes of the reporters they would have wept, for it was a picture of infinite pathos. The very laughter of the prisoner's children and their exuberant efforts at the piano were as tragic as the tears of unspeakable grief. This is the fact; those children are in ignorance of their father's plight. They have been told that he is in the country, in the midst of a political campaign. They are not permitted to see the newspapers, and they are told that the papers are abusing their father because of the political campaign. The mother of those children must enter into the spirit of their juvenile pastimes and conceal the agony of her heart. Eugenia, the eldest of the four, aged twelve, was to have graduated from the Pacific Heights Grammar School this month. Before the trial of her father began she was called home by her mother. The friends of the family and their children have been told to refrain from discussing the father's affairs. So it is evident that the situation is quite different from what the reporters supposed it to be as they listened to the gay tunes that fell upon their ears last Sunday night.

Ruef Knows What Struck Him

Even amidst the wreck of his fallen fortunes, all of the Gallic lightness and humor which once characterized the debonair "Boss," has not departed from him. To a commiserating friend, he is reported to have said: "I thought at first it was the heavy hand of Justice which had struck me, but on investigation it proves to be a sugar barrel."

Schmitz's Rough Riders

T. Halloran, "chaplain" of the Rough Riders of California, is not a clergyman. Nor am I able to discover that he is particularly given to piety. However, as a union carpenter who had yawped consistently and vociferously for Schmitz in previous elections, he deserved an office and there was no one to dispute the chaplaincy. It was idle curiosity to learn who this Chaplain Halloran might be that prompted an inquiry, which was thus richly rewarded in information volunteered by an active Rough Rider. In the first place, my informant expects that most of the 2,000 members will attend the encampment to be held on the last Sunday in June at Schuetzen Park. For though Schmitz is down and out, the Rough Riders go marching on and will protect the city treasury from foreign invasion to the last ditch. "While the Rough Riders were originally organized to aid Schmitz," concluded my informant, "their objects are non-political so far as parties are concerned, aiming to back the best candidates of all followings." Such catholicity is greatly to be commended.

The Picket Eye

If the evil eye superstition still had some influence over the credulous the United Railroads would long ago have lost to the Carmen's Union. The public, which is willing to take chances with mere cobble stones and dynamite, would hardly care, were it superstitious, to subject itself to the witchery of the union pickets. The pickets are certainly doing effective eye work. Even those have caught the trick whose eyes in ordinary circumstances are scarcely more notable than the traditional burnt holes in a blanket. The union glance is one of deep concentration and infinite scorn. It would penetrate the victim's soul and then tear out his name and address, leaving in its stead a horrible dread of future developments. The primitiveness of the idea invites another comparison. It is remarked by philosophers that primitive folks have their will under better control in many respects than the more cultured; as, for instance, the Polynesians would die of hunger rather than touch "tapu" food. Certainly not the most rabid union hater tramped the town in pre-strike days just because union men ran the cars.

Older and Harry Bunkers.

Human nature is a very peculiar thing. This bromidic remark is called forth by what I have heard of a recent visit made to San Quentin by Fremont Older, editor of the Bulletin. Older was over at the Marin County establishment which is so often in the thoughts of city officials just now, for the purpose of helping to make Jack Chretien happy again by the restoration of the credits he lost sometime ago. After prevailing on the prison directors to give Jack a chance to start life over again, the editor of the Bulletin accompanied Senator Felton in his rounds of the penitentiary, and among others whom the senator pointed out to him was Harry Bunkers whom Older sent from Sacramento to San Quentin for boodling. ment had so changed the legislator that Older did not recognize him, for although he is a great favorite with the other convicts, all the old cocksure jauntiness has gone out of Bunkers' face and manner. He recognized the editor who put him in jail and asked if he might speak with him. So the newspaperman and the hoodler had a friendly chat and the result was that Older was overcome with pity and determined to help Bunkers out of prison as he had formerly helped him in. He learned from Bunkers that one-half of his term will be up in a short time and that he intended to apply for parole. "I'll help you, Harry," said Older, whereupon Bunkers started to thank him and burst into tears. Of course the stern penologist will say that having been instrumental in sending Bunkers to jail for a serious crime of which he was unmistakably guilty, the editor should insist on keeping him there until his term expires, but the stern penologist does not always reckon with human nature and, as I remarked before, bromidically but truly, human nature is a very peculiar thing.

Shortridge Wanted in Boise City

Another distinguished Californian attorney has been summoned from afar to devote his intellectual powers to the vindication of a man charged with murder. And once more the case in which those intellectual powers are required is one of world-wide interest. It is the case of the alleged murderers of Governor Steunenberg, and the lawyer is none other than the Henry Clay of our bar, the Hon. Samuel M. Shortridge. Negotiations for the employment of Mr. Shortridge were begun this week, and though he has virtually consented to co-operate with counsel for the defense, to what extent he shall contribute his services has not yet been determined. His presence at the scene of the trial is earnestly desired, the other attorneys in the case being of the opinion that he is able to render important service. They learned something about Mr. Shortridge's ability when they were investigating the matter of the explosion in this city, which, according to Harry Orchard's testimony was caused by a dynamite bomb with which he sought to take the life of Frederick W. Bradley.

The Explosion Case

It is by a curious set of circumstances that Attorney Shortridge comes to be an object of interest to the Western Federation of Miners, and a rather strange story is that which links a civil law suit in San Francisco with the trial of a murderer in Boise City, Idaho. Moreover it is a story that from its elements is of peculiar interest to the legal profession. In November, 1904 the story opened with an explosion at the corner of Leavenworth and Washington streets which wrecked the front of three flats owned by Walter Linforth the attorney. Frederick W. Bradley, formerly superintendent of a mine in Idaho was at the moment of the explosion in the act of making his exit from one of the flats. Bradley was very seriously injured. From what the officers of the Fire Department learned of the circumstances of the explosion it was inferred that it was the result of a gas leak. Suit was brought on behalf of the landlord against the Gas Company and Shortridge handled the case for the plaintiff. The case was tried with a great deal of zeal on both sides. The principal feature of the trial was the expert testimony and it was Mr. Shortridge's deftness in tearing that expert testimony to tatters that lifted the case out of the domain of the prosaic.

Did Bradley Have the Right Impression?

There was only one simple question for the jury to determine, and that question involved the location of the gas leak. It was the plaintiff's theory that the leak occurred at the meter in the basement. Hence the responsibility of the Gas Company. It was the defendant's theory that it was a gas grate that leaked. Hence the responsibility of the landlord. The battle raged over this question. Neither side had any doubt respecting the character of the explosion. It was unquestionably a gas explosion. Bradley testified that just as he reached the front door on his way out of the house, he applied a lighted match to his cigar. He was lighting his cigar just as he opened the door, and he saw a blue flame shoot out from the cigar. His first impression was that somebody had given him a trick cigar. He had no second impression. The defense called Professors O'Neill and Muller from Berkeley, and those eminent scholars testified that it is a scientific fact that "gas kicks back." They were positive that if the gas which Bradley ignited on the first floor had come all the way from a leak in the basement it would have kicked back to the basement. The basement having exhibited no signs of distress it was obvious that the gas must have come from a leak on an upper floor. All this seemed self-evident until Attorney Shortridge, who used to teach chemistry among other things, in a country school, before taking up the study of law, and who crammed himself for the occasion, raked those scientific gentlemen fore and aft with a rattling fire of withering interrogatories. He first asked them if they had ever heard of the celebrated Thomas Graham. They looked at Judge Graham who presided over the trial and confessed that they had. But Attorney Shortridge alluded to Graham the Scotch chemist and it was with the aid of that scholar that he completely upset the notion of the kicking proclivities of gas. The jury gave him a verdict for $10,000. The case was appealed and it is still on appeal. But now comes Harry Orchard, principal witness for the prosecution in the case of the men charged with the murder of Governor Steunenberg, with the story that it wasn't gas at all that wrecked Linforth's flats and confined Frederick Bradley to a single impression one memorable morning in November, 1904. He avers that it was dynamite that exploded, and that he was responsible for the explosion, explaining furthermore that Bradley was one of the men marked for slaughter by the associated assassins known as the Western Federation of Miners. Now while Orchard's testimony complicates the case of Linforth against the Gas Company, it remains to be determined whether he has been merely lying. One thing is certain: it is no longer so important to determine whether gas has a kick in it as to ascertain whether Mr. Bradley's impression of a blue flame was nothing more than a delusion contracted in the moments of his unconsciousness that followed the opening of a door which had a bomb tied to it.

An Estate With a History

My Hawaiian correspondent writes: "The local courts have just ordered the distribution of an estate which will be very widely scattered and which was somewhat romantic in its origin. It is known as the J. H. Coney Estate and it has remained for many years undistributed. Among those who will share in the distribution are Mrs. Hubert Vos, the wife of the celebrated Dutch painter, who has painted portraits of a number of prominent Chicago people including Mrs. Potter Palmer, and who painted one or more portraits of the Empress Dowager of China. Another one who will benefit by the distribution is Mrs. H. Renjes, now of Germany. Her husband was for many years the Consul of Spain in Honolulu and left about the time of the breaking out of the Spanish war and the annexation of Hawaii. A third beneficiary of the estate is Mrs. Mary Coney Ashton Moore. As Mrs. Ashton, Mrs. Moore figured quite conspicuously in litigation and publicity of one kind and another in and about San Francisco a few years ago. About four years ago the "Examiner" published a series of letters written to her by Rear Admiral Merry of the United States Navy. Four other beneficiaries of the estate reside in the Islands. The estate had its origin in the Great Division of the lands of Hawaii in 1848 when Kamehameha III first gave the common people any real ownership in the land. The land was divided about one-third to the king, another third to the chiefs and the remainder to the people. One of the great chiefs was Haalelea. He died soon afterwards and his son inherited his estate. J. H. Coney, a young college graduate, came to the Islands from New York and married one of the daughters of Haalelea, the second of the name. It is the children of this union who will now participate in the distribution of the estate."

Lily Fires Carter

Carter, uncle of Governor Carter, had resigned as her man of business and that she had appointed Joseph Aea to the position. Of course everyone knew that Carter had resigned because she had asked him too, and they felt that she was very ungrateful. Joseph O. Carter has been the Queen's man of business for many years. Before the overthrow of the monarchy he was her most loyal subject. His loyalty has cost him more than any other one of her subjects ever lost by loyalty. Through good report and evil he has been faithful to the Queen. He has given her the benefit of sound judgment which has often saved her from making serious errors and would have saved her from many more if it had always been followed. At the time of the overthrow and before, he advised her against those acts which precipitated her downfall. In her financial affairs he has given her the benefit of sterling integrity and sound business judgment. In social and other affairs he has sought to guard her against impolitic mistakes. During the bitter days following the overthrow his loyalty to her cause cost him the managership of C. Brewer & Company, the largest sugar agency in the Islands, a concern that has just converted a million dollars of surplus into capital stock and still has a surplus of $800,000."

Ford Masters the Surf Board

"Alexander Hume Ford," says my correspondent, "who came hither to write an article about surfing for Outing, has learned a trick which very few white men have been able to master. He has not only learned to ride the surf board, but he has learned to stand up on the board as it comes in on the crest of a rapidly moving breaker at Waikiki. This is the crowning feat of surf board riding. Inspired by Ford's success Jack London has determined to learn. He has progressed so far that he can ride the surf board lying flat on it, but he has not yet learned to stand up on it. But in making the progress that he did London got a case of sunburn that kept him in bed for a couple of days and made him a cripple for several more days. In the enthusiasm of the beginner he remained out in the surf at Waikiki in the hot sunshine of the summer solstice for about six hours. The next day every movement of a muscle was exquisite torture. London has engaged Captain Rosehill as sailing master of the Snark. Captain Rosehill has made his home in Honolulu for over thirty years and for a longer time than that he has sailed the South Seas as trader and "blackbirder." There is scarcely a part of the South Pacific or an island in it that he does not know. He discovered Marcus Island in the early eighties and filed his claim to it with the State Department. In 1903 he went there in the Julia E. Whalen to examine its guano deposits, but the announcement that he was going had been widely spread and when he got there he found that the Japanese government had sent a warship and landed a detachment of marines on the Island, and he was barely allowed to land to replenish his supplies of water.

Josselyn In Paris

Mr. Charles Josselyn, author of "The True Napoleon," and one of the most distinguished of the Bohemian Club's literati is being taken seriously in Paris. In this city where the standards of literary taste are not remarkably high Mr. Josselyn's literary work is regarded as something of a joke. Because his "True Napoleon" was written mainly with a scissors the local critics, who have a hard and fast prejudice in favor of the typewriter as an implement of the literary craft, have sneered the work almost into disrepute. Yet it contains many of the best things that were said about the great Corsican by writers for whom Mr. Josselyn has profound admiration. According to a correspondent of the New York Herald Mr. Josselyn "is making his temporary home in France on account of his admiration for Napoleon." And the correspondent says that "long before he had ever been in Europe he wrote and published a life of Napoleon purely as a matter of personal esteem." Which of course is no small token of appreciation. During the course of an interview with the Herald's correspondent Mr. Josselyn said that he obtained the material for his "True Napoleon," not in France but in histories. "I guess I read them all," he said. "It was a big task, but it was worth it."

A Smash at San Francisco

The correspondent by whom the Josselyn interview was written sent the Herald the following news which is of some local interest:

Facial Wizardry

From time to time, apparently at pure hazard, without law, without warning, suddenly you see in the face of the child the man. In a moment, again, the vigorous man of forty becomes the old man of eighty. The fresh face of the graceful child will take on for a moment the heavy features of the hard and sensual-looking woman; the young girl is transformed into the comfortable motherly matron. More uncanny still, the very infant sometimes for a second, in a flash, assumes the face of old age. Backwards, too, in the delightful elderly lady appears the girl, real, radiant: but she comes not suddenly; phantom-like she seems to rise slowly, faintly, out of the elderly face you see in the flesh, and then in a moment of time and for a moment she stands before you complete. The happy old man, full of merry memories, expands into the boy of twelve. All this, no doubt, sounds only like scenes from a pantomime or the commonplaces of the fairy books. It does: that is just the effect these appearances leave on those who have eyes to see them, the awesome feelings of children at the transformations of fairy worlds. It is hard to think them merely natural. Meditating on these strange sensations, one wonders whether they are not the origin of those familiar features of all folklore. Everywhere the wizard strikes children into old men and the good genius by a touch gives back youth to age. When suddenly, wholly unprepared, you see complete the full-grown man in the boy, or the smooth girl countenance shrink into the wrinkled elderly face, it is difficult not to conjure up some wholly external agency, some person, who works the change from without. It is generally so sudden, so unprepared, so manifestly put on externally. We look about for a cause, for some one who did it. And we do not wonder that primitive men invented fays and wizards to fill the place of beings they felt must be there, but could not see. It is all natural enough, of course, in reality; we know all about everything now; we do not wonder now; we have put away such childishness; except just at the moment of the apparition, when our hair, if many of us told the truth, stands on end just as did the less knowing people's of earlier days. We do not believe in goblins; we have explained them away; but their ghosts revenge themselves by grinning at us from

"Nearly all Californians are very much disgruntled at the financial conditions existing in San Francisco. Lack of business confidence has upset many plans and ruined many a European summer outing. It is absolutely impossible to borrow money in San Francisco now," said one gentleman who is largely interested in business affairs there, "for building purposes or the improvement of real estate. If a man is a merchant the banks will let him have grudgingly a little money to carry on his business with, and that is all. I owned thirty houses that were completely destroyed either by the earthquake or fire, and I cannot raise a cent to rebuild them, although I own the land outright. Why," he continued, "I am half owner of a bank in a small California city. I was told by my agent the other day to ask them for a loan of $20,000. They replied by asking if I could not get along with $10,000. That from a bank I half own and where two years ago my note for $100,000 would have been taken without question."

limbo: and we don't like their wraiths much more than our ancestors liked themselves. But the ghosts of goblins have no chance in the clear light; there is the difference. Once the eeriness is off us we become quite happy, quite brave, and we insult the imps with a hardihood our forefathers could never command. So if for the moment the touch of a fairy wand seems necessary, we soon see clear and understand that these strange metamorphoses are but a freak of perfectly natural movements of the face. If we could trace exactly the course of physical growth and decay on the features and make a map of the inevitable writing of the wrinkles, we could draw from the face of the child the face of the man, and the old man, with something very near precision; though the uncertainty of expression would prevent a picture to the very life. And in fact many of the lines of youth and age are scientifically traceable, while we all recognize them by instinct. And no doubt what happens is simply that from time to time the play of the face or some feature of the face cuts deep one or more of the dominant age-wrinkles, or the aged countenance is so moved as to smooth one out. And then we do the rest ourselves. We have a piece of the puzzle, a bone in a skeleton: a few pieces are quite enough; the rest is inference and imagination. We mentally work it out, though we seem to see the whole instantaneously. Why then can it not be done intentionally? Up to a point it can be.

HOTEL CAPITOLA, Capitola, Cal.

The hotel lobby is a work of art aided by generous nature. The dining room jutting out toward the breakers with a fine view of the entire bay with the Monterey mountains in the background, is unequalled in picturesqueness and scenic effect while the ozone laden air assist digestion, the table, none better. The concert hall is ample and the floor is just right for dancing. The guests' rooms well furnished and the bay in full view of most of them. The music of the waves bring sleep and rest. The spacious porch in front of the house furnishes a complete rest cure. The bowling alley and club house with the surf breaking against the walls a never ending enjoyment.

Electric cars leave Capitola for Santa Cruz every 15 minutes.

Why not stay at Capitola Hotel in large sunny rooms at 1-3 less cost. Address: HOTEL CAPITOLA, CAPITOLA, CAL.

The play-actor knows that. He can make you up as you will be when you are old with considerable probability: but—it is a very different thing indeed from what we have been pondering. It is mechanical, and the other, however natural, is not mechanical. The divine something comes in after all.

Perhaps we should have considered the sceptic; you do not believe in these wondrous transformations? You have never seen one? And after all what can we say to that? Only that we have: and everyone that is fond of observing faces must have done so too, often. An unobservant person might easily miss such facial phenomena, for they come unexpected and are gone as quickly. But anyone who has seen the young face suddenly take on the old face, a very revelation of the future, will not forget it. It is interesting, but it is rather awesome, this sudden passage of time. Fortunately one cannot catch such a transformation on his own face. The chances of looking in the glass at the psychological moment are too small for that.

AUTOMOBILE NOTES

Mr. R. M. Smilie, of Berkeley, in speaking of his experience as an automobile buyer and user, has this to say regarding his Thomas "Flyer": "In buying my new car I left the agents entirely out of the deal so far as trying the car was concerned. I knew it had power and speed—roadability and reliability were what I was after and, having the time, I made a round of the Eastern Factories and shows and, with this information as a basis, I went to the owners of different cars and got their opinions, then struck an average and the result was a Thomas. I can cheerfully say that after three months of hard running, that my plain of selecting a machine has justified the trouble.

Mr. E. J. Holland, of San Leandro, goes to the Southland on the first of July, via the Oldsmobile route, San Diego being the objective point.

Mr. P. F. Pinnella, who owns a cafe, besides two or three tailoring establishments, is now busy with a Model "A" Oldsmobile of fashionable color and proven speed.

Jos. Schmeer last week purchased a 60 H-P. Thomas "Flyer" from the Pioneer Automobile Company, which he will drive in the rent service in this city.

One of the regular events looked forward to each year by Pacific Coast motorists is the initial tour of the year from San Francisco to the Yosemite Valley and return. This year the trip was made by Frank L. Johnson of San Francisco in a Thomas Flyer, and now that he has started the ball rolling it is probable that other tourists will soon follow in his tracks.

Mr. John Brichetto, of Banta, has just returned from a tour through the Northern part of the state in his new 60 H-P. Thomas "Flyer." Accompanying Mr. Brichetto were Mr. and Mrs. L. B. Smith. The trip included Elmira, Vacaville, Sacramento, Red Bluff and other towns. Mr. Brichetto reports the roads in good condition excepting for the unexpected shower on Tuesday which rendered them in some places almost impassable with the ordinary automobile. "Give me a Thomas car for touring," said Mr. Brichetto. "I have had my car for the past six weeks, have run over 1000 miles and, up to the present time my only inconvenience has been that of filling the machine with gasoline and oil. Have not had to make an adjustment of any kind."

The Winton Model M, driven by Chas. A. Carlson in the Long Island endurance test, was the only car of its price to make a perfect score in both the original run and the run-over.

Social Prattle

By Tantalus

Mrs. Martin For Harmony

Mrs. Eleanor Martin's genius, that expresses itself through the social arts, has been vivifying mere existence for those who were at the last ditch of boredom. No one's ear is more delicately attuned than the dowager Eleanor's to the little rift within the social lute. The discord that started in the Grand Jury chambers, spread to Pacific Avenue, and finally clanged into the very heart of Burlingame is not to the liking of this diplomatic dame. "Let the men fight it out, but let us have peace" she cried to her skirted henchmen, who took up the slogan and sounded it where the oolong bubbles merriest. But the white dove of peace is a coy bird and having been driven away by the icy breath of discord, refused to flutter back at the first sign of truce. Having put on her war paint for peace Mrs. Martin determined not to fizzle out in the usual manner of peace conferences. Less intrepid workers in the cause of patching the rents in the garb of the smart set resigned the task in desperation. But Mrs. Martin evolved a daring plan that seemed to be perfectly simple. She would give a tea and assemble the warring factions. She did and the tea was a frost. Mrs. Martin has become resigned to the frappe layer in society. Her tea, not serving to scald the icicles, the dinner which she gave in honor of General Davis, who is out here on Red Cross work, was not a love feast in disguise. Warring factions were not given a chance to peel off their armor and trifle with terrapin. General and Mrs. Funston, Mr. and Mrs. Calhoun and Mrs. Bowie-Detrick represented the married set, and Virginia Joliffe, Elsie Sperry, Lillie O'Connor, Winifred Mears and an equal number of men completed the party.

Praise From Sir Tristan

The Vicomte de Tristan, who is related to San Francisco by marriage, has been throwing large scented bouquets at us through an interview in a French newspaper. The Vicomte and his wife, who was Miss de Guigne, arrived in Paris not long ago and de Tristan has been proclaiming the wonders of these people by the western sea. This young Frenchman does not see us with the jaundiced eye that most foreigners train upon our shortcomings. I remember at the first Greenway ball of last season he worked himself up into a fine frenzy of appreciation. He rushed up to one woman after another and ecstatically breathed "Regarde! The beautiful women, the flashing jewels, the soft music, the flowers!" Then taking them up to a window that looked out on a sea of ruin and desolation he said, "Voila, now look on this picture and confess that you are the most wonderful people the moon ever looked down upon. A ball against a background of despair—and such a ball!"

Oh, la la, la la we are a wonderful people, and its awfully nice of de Tristan to show us to Paris in a form not labeled "graft"—which term is being muelaged to us in fashion altogether too generous and too world-wide.

Little Helen Has Faith

Last Saturday afternoon, when "Peter Pan" stepped down to the footlights and implored the audience to save little tinker Bell's life by professing belief in fairies, a little girl's voice was the first sound that broke the fateful second that it takes the audience to rise to the occasion. "I do—I do believe in them"! came in clear childish treble. I was told that it was little Miss Helen Crocker who thus refuted the charge that there are no more children in this dreary world—just little manlets and womenlets who wear spectacles and call fairy stories "lies." Mrs. William Crocker had a large party of children with her and their flushed, excited little faces proved that the proverbial "golden spoon" does not always flatten out the imagination. Helen Crocker is a dark, bird like little thing who always looks just poised for flight. Her coloring is distinctly like the Sperry side of the family the blonde Crocker strain not showing at all.

In the Matter of Name

The Will Taylors have decided to christen their baby William. Young William III not only keeps up the paternal tradition of his father and grandfather but on the Hopkins side of the family there is also a seasoning of William in the nomenclature. Mr. E. W. Hopkins' middle name is William so the baby couldn't escape his fate. In view of the fads and eccentricities that have fastened on the smart set it is really worth recording the fact that for the most part people have reformed from the sort of names that Victor Hugo would define as "the word turned convict." Bizarre inventions, and the antics in orthography of Ethyl, Alysse, and other respectable names gone wrong, are now left to the Sunday picnic sort. In only one or two families in the smart set are the names "to laugh." Mrs. Adams of Oakland, whose originality so frequently gives a piquant flavor to society on the other side of the bay, christened one of her children "Sweet-heart." Her other children wear just as unusual titles and Mrs. Adams, herself, whose name was originally "Ernestine" now writes it "Dearestine."

Cupid's Latest

of matrimony. However, as youth is the one fault we all outgrow, Mr. Sheehan finally consented to the marriage of the young couple. The young man was preparing to enter Stanford University next semester but will go into business instead. Miss Sheehan is an attractive young girl who was the special protegee of Mrs. Ynez Shorb White last winter and Mrs. White has beamed on her brother's suit. The engagement is to be very abrupt, the wedding to take place on July 2 at St. Mary's Cathedral with a reception afterwards at the Fairmont. The wing of society which preens its feathers after Mrs. White will be fully represented at this affair. It was at Mrs. White's dance that Frances Coon met Oliver Kehrlein and I hear that when the accounts of those cotillions are fully audited there will be served more cardiac affairs credited to the influence of those tripping hours.

Gayety at Santa Cruz

My Santa Cruz correspondent writes as follows: "There were great doings at Santa Cruz last Saturday for it was again the opening of the season at that grand seaside resort. The magnificent new casino and bathing pavilion were thrown open to the public. It lacked just one week of being a year since the old casino was burned and although the new casino and the other buildings were not started until February of this year, their cost last Saturday night was over $600,000 and they were completed. It may be stated to show the immensity of this undertaking that there are 22,000 electric lights used in the illumination and 125 miles of electric wires. This enterprise is owned by the Santa Cruz Beach Co., and consists of the casino, natatorium and three hundred furnished cottages. The company is composed of many share holders. John Martin is President, C. W. Conlisk is Secretary, and among the largest stockholders are R. A. Hotaling, Louis Sloss, F. W. Swanton, Joe Grant, Leon Lowe, John Coleman, Harry Stetson, Walter Hobart, J. Downey Harvey, Capt. John Barneson, Eugene de Sabla, and J. J. C. Leonard. The company gave an elaborate dinner at the casino Saturday evening which many San Franciscans attended. Mr. A. W. Foster, Jr. and party, Spencer Grant and Geo. T. Davis came down in their machine. Joe Bishop brought down L. A. Steiger, John McDonald, Jr., Otis Parkhull and L. C. Shield. Eugene de Sabla, Jr. came down from San Mateo bringing Mrs. de Sabla, Miss de Sabla and Mr. and Mrs. Clement Tobin. Mr. L. J. Scooffy came down with Mrs. Edith Cook and Mrs. Polk. H. R. Simpkins and Francis Carolan drove down from Burlingame.

After leaving Santa Cruz the party proceeded to "Dotswood," Dr. Cool's country place just out of Los Gatos. From there they will go to Lake County and spend several weeks touring the country. With all of these guests and many others the Sea Beach Hotel was crowded and the whole occasion opens up the hotel and beach for a magnificent season.

The Sadler-Mead Wedding

One of the prettiest weddings of the summer was that of Miss Mae Lydia Sadler to Mr. Lewis Risdon Mead on Wednesday Eve, June 19th. It was ceremonious and English in character. The St. Cecilian Choir of Young Ladies sang and met the bride and conducted her with her bridesmaids to the altar. The ushers were: Dr. Faulkes, Mr. Tripler, Mr. A. E. Gillespie and Dr. Percy Gaskill. The best man was Mr. Ralph Jones of Martinez. Miss Ruth Sadler was maid of honor, and Mrs. David Edwards of Piedmont, matron of honor. The bridesmaids were Miss Winifred Burdge, Miss Myrtle Wood, Miss Esther Sadler and Miss Mabel Sadler of Berkeley. The flower girls were Miss Marian Phillips, Miss Ada Nelson. The bride's gown was of Parisian make of rare satin with costly old lace severe in style to suit the bride's regal appearance. Dr. Bode of the Theological Seminary at Berkeley and the Rev. U. Bugbee officiated.

A Run to Del Monte

Arthur B. Watson, Chairman of the Runs and Tours Committee of the Automobile Club of California, has been down to Monterey making arrangements for the Club run to Del Monte during the Independence Day Holidays. According to the present plans, the motorists will make their way to Del Monte on Wednesday, July 3, and on the fourth there will be a Gymkhana (meeting for races and games) on the Del Monte race track, which will be put into condition for the event. On Friday, Saturday and Sunday, the autoists will make trips around the Seventeen Mile Drive.

Mrs. Kempff, wife of Admiral Kempff, U. S. N., with C. P. Weeks and Mrs. Weeks, of Burlingame, is at Del Monte.

Miss Armsby a Winner

In the ladies's Golf Handicap, played last Saturday morning on the Del Monte links, there were five contestants: Mrs. Loeser, Mrs. H. R. Warner and Miss Cornelia Armsby, who played from scratch; Mrs. Arthur Lord of New York, who received eighteen strokes, and Miss Morgan, who had a handicap of four strokes. Miss Armsby won with a score of 117, her nearest competitor's net score being 124. Miss Armsby's name will be engraved on the silver pitcher to be presented by the Pacific Improvement Company as a trophy to the lady who scores most victories during June, July and August.

Frawley in a Shaw Play

By Edward F. O'Day

Undoubtedly a large number of people made George Bernard Shaw's acquaintance for the first time this week by going to the Novelty Theatre to see the Frawley company in "You Never Can Tell." For all his popularity Shaw is still as caviare to the vulgar as Oscar Wilde or Maeterlinck or Ibsen. It requires therefore no license of exaggeration to imagine a person sitting in the theatre on Monday night who had never read and never seen enacted a Shaw play. This person, we will suppose, remembers Shaw principally as the author of a play called "Mrs. Warren's Profession" regarding which he has formed the opinion, based on newspaper reports, that it was too nasty even for the strong stomach of New York. What opinion would this person form of George Bernard Shaw after witnessing the Frawley company's performance of "You Never Can Tell"? A most unflattering opinion, to be sure. He would look upon Shaw as a writer for the stage who disregards all its conventions, beginning his acts anywhere and ending them nowhere. He would set him down as a radical with opinions about marriage, politics and religion that are half startling and half absurd. He would infer that Shaw makes pretensions to wit, but would be satisfied that they are hollow pretensions and that he strains his mind every time he attempts to say something smart—no, not every time, for he would admit that there are some good lines in the play, but nearly every time. And he would conclude, thinking of what he had read about "Mrs. Warren's Profession," that Shaw had summoned the resources of uncleanness to repair the faults of his art and to compel a factitious attention. If this person, after drawing these conclusions about Shaw from the Frawley presentation of "You Never Can Tell," should take the trouble to read the drama as set down in the "Pleasant Plays," it goes without saying that he would immediately revise his estimate of the author and would cast about in his mind for an explanation of the distorted notion of the Shavian character and the Shavian genius which he had obtained by witnessing the stage version of "You Never Can Tell." It would not require unusual discernment for our student of the drama to discover that the explanation of his mistake lies in the acting of T. Daniel Frawley and the Frawley company. For Frawley and his company are impossible in "You Never Can Tell." They seem to have approached it in the same spirit in which they would grapple with "My Friend From India" or "What Happened to Jones," and finding that it refused absolutely to capitulate to this frontal attack, to have continued the siege only from a fear of acknowledging defeat. It is apparent from first to last that neither Frawley nor any player in his company, with the possible exception of one, has the least idea why "You Never Can Tell" should be regarded as an acting play. Walter Craven who plays the inimitable waiter seems to appreciate the character aright, but lacking the inspiration of an intelligent response from his fellow-players, he cannot help adding occasionally to the general depression. It is as though a company wholly unable to understand why Hamlet is ranked so high in dramatic literature should essay the play perfunctorily for the sake of appearances. The only difference is that Hamlet has become so fixed a tradition of the stage that no company can fail completely to suggest the meaning intended by the author, whereas "You Never Can Tell" is comparatively new and demands pioneering abilities which cannot be looked for in a company that has always taken its interpretations at second hand. Nothing more cross-purposeful can be imagined than the Frawley company in a Shaw play, except possibly T. Daniel Frawley lecturing on "The Quintessence of Shavianism."

Mrs. Fiske in Mitchell's Play

By Theodore Bonnet

After a long absence from the theatre I was lured to a matinee performance of "The New York Idea," and on emerging from the playhouse it occurred to me that perhaps I had grown stale in the interim of my abstention from dramatic sweetmeats. For if Langdon Mitchell's play is as brilliant as it is said to be then I am in need of a tonic to stimulate my powers of appreciation. If it is as poor a play as it seems to me the success of it passeth my understanding. It far from gratified my hopes of edification. It impressed me as the work of a man with a sense of just how many lines a character must speak; how long each character must be on the stage; how a situation must be constructed and how the scenes must be distributed to produce a symmetric, logical and congruous whole. It was evidently designed to win its way on the strength of its smart dialogue, but its paltry contrivances and inane witticisms almost made me weep. When I heard one of the characters say, "This is a marry-go-round," I felt that I should be justified in doing something desperate by way of expressing my emotion. Fancy such a pun being accepted as evidence of brilliant wit! All through the play I was persuaded that the atmosphere and tone of it were familiar. I applied myself to the task of recalling where I had previously encountered the spirit of the story, in what play I had seen domestic infelicity handled with almost identical cynicism; and presently I thought of "Rebellious Susan." Later on I consulted my Henry Arthur Jones and sure enough I found in the comedy which that clever Englishman, as early as 1894, dedicated to Mrs. Grundy, has for its protagonists the prototypes of Mr. Mitchell's simple burlesque. I would not accuse Mr. Mitchell of plagiarism, for of that peccadillo he is guiltless. But that he steeped himself in "Rebellious Susan," that he saturated himself with the spirit of that truly brilliant comedy before writing "The New York Idea." I am convinced, and all that I would indict him for is his failure to make infinity of imitation compensate for the lack of an ounce of inspiration. From "Rebellious Susan" I have made some excerpts at random to serve the purpose of indicating for the benefit of those who have seen the Mitchell play the similarity of philosophy and the superiority of the Englishman's wit:

"After a lifetime's practice in the Divorce Court

I still feel myself like Newton, a mere child on the seashore, with all the boundless ocean of woman's mysterious nature stretching silent, and unnavigable, and inexorable before me."

"If towards the close of your married life you can look back upon it, not indeed without regrets, but without remorse, and on the whole with pleasure and thankfulness, it will only be because you have shut your eyes to much, forgiven much, and utterly forgotten a good deal more."

"Married life isn't very romantic anywhere, with anybody and it ought not to be. When it is, it gets into the Divorce Court."

"There's an immense reputation to be made as a moralist by any man who will show you ladies the way to break the seventh commandment without leaving any ill effects upon society."

"It's very absurd to make a fuss about other people's love-affairs."

"When a husband and wife have quarreled it's clearly one's duty to advise them to make it up. And one does it, the same as one goes to church because it is one's duty, not because there is any result from it."

"At twenty-five you have the delight of your illusions, and you laugh at the fogies. But at fifty you'll have the far greater delight of seeing through your illusions and laughing at the youngsters. Take my word for it, fifty is the age when a healthy man begins to enjoy life."

Those of my readers who have attended a performance of "The New York Idea," will quite agree with me I am sure, after reading the foregoing excerpts, that Mr. Mitchell derived his idea from "Rebellious Susan." Both plays, it is needless to say, deal with married people of similar temperament who quarrel and make up. There is a heady wife in "Rebellious Susan" who vents her temper on the furniture as does Mrs. Karslake in "The New York Idea." Mrs. Karslake throws the chairs about and her husband reviews her conduct in the same strain as does the Jones' husband. "My darling," says the husband in the English play, "I have always wished to treat you as something entirely sweet and perfect and gracious, something sainted and apart, but when you insist on getting on a chair and breaking the looking glass, you do make it a little difficult my darling for me to cherish my ideal of you." It is a coincidence of no significance that both husbands use the same figure of the wife with a bit in her mouth. But I am not trying to make out a case of plagiarism; only am I seeking to indicate the similarity of ideas. If it were worth while I would demonstrate the inferiority of the American's work. Briefly I may say that the basis of the comic is an esteem for common sense. The Mitchell play doesn't seem like comedy because it is so far removed from common sense. Therein it differs from "Rebellious Susan." Respecting the handling of the play in the histrionic sense my criticism must be as it always has been of Mrs. Fiske; that her inarticulateness fatally mars her work. She minces her words abominably. Judged from the standpoint of emotional effectiveness she is an actress of considerable force, but in a play that depends for success on smart dialogue she is not acceptable. She is a woman prodigally endowed with the qualities of personal magnetism and temperament that almost dominate her fatal fault, and therefore she is more effective in the display of the deeper emotions, the stronger passions, than in the expression of the softer, lighter sentiments of humanity.

MARIE SHOTWELL,

Leading Lady of the Frawley Company in "A Lady of Quality," at the Novelty Theater.

Stage

Maud Adams's Season

Considering the unpropitious conditions under which Maude Adams appeared at the the Van Ness Theatre in "Peter Pan," her great financial success has been most gratifying. Three matinees this week have been hardly sufficient to meet the demands of the thousands who wanted to attend the afternoon performances of the delightful Barrie fantasy. The house has been crowded at every presentation and already the advance sale of seats for the coming week is enormous. "Peter Pan" is to be played on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday nights and at the matinee on Wednesday. At these performances the house will be crowded to the doors and on Thursday night another brilliant reception will be tendered Miss Adams when she makes her initial appearance here in the role of Phoebe Throessel in the comedy, "Quality Street." The piece is the work of J. M. Barrie. All the Empire Theatre stage paraphernalia for this production as well as for Rostand's "L'Aiglon," the bill for the fourth and last week of the engagement has been sent here and will be utilized to special advantage on the large stage of the Van Ness Theatre.

"A Lady of Quality"

At the Novelty Theatre commencing with Sunday matinee, June 23, the Frawley Company will make its appearance in the dramatic romance, "A Lady of Quality," one of the most successful of modern works and a play in which Julia Arthur won great success as a star. Its five acts are all splendidly worked out and the story holds a remarkably fine interest. The piece is the work of Francis Hodgson Burnett and Stephen Townsend and its success during the coming week seems assured as Frawley has selected an especially strong cast including Marie Shotwell, Ethel Clayton, Lola May, Christine Hill, Henry C. Mortimer, Walter Cravens, Edward Emery and others. Marie Shotwell in the role of Florinda Wildairs is sure to win as great a triumph as she did in the title role of "Leah Kleschna." The Frawley season at the Novelty Theatre is gaining in popularity with each succeeding performance. The matinees at special prices, 25c and 50c, are crowded to the doors.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The programme at the Orpheum for the week beginning this Sunday matinee cannot fail to attract for it is rich in quality and novelty. The list of new artists is headed by Julia Heinrich and Margaret Easter who promise a great musical treat. Miss Heinrich is one of the best concert contraltos in America. Miss Easter is a soprano with an Eastern reputation. Miss Heinrich has added to her repertoire a number of pretty songs and among them is "April" by Lander Ronald which the musical critics of the East are enthusiastic over. Miss Easter will contribute typical songs in English, French and German. She enhances the effects of her numbers by wearing picturesque and appropriate national costumes. The young ladies conclude their performance with some charming duets. Emil Hoch, an actor of fine artistic temperament and splendid insight into character, who is pleasantly remembered by Orpheum audiences will also be an interesting feature of the coming programme. Mr. Hoch who will be supported by his own company which includes Florence Burnsnore, Walter Lewis and Edward McGuire, will present his latest success "Loves Young Dream" which is described as being fascinating in the extreme. The Kinsons who play on all kinds of instruments and objects and extract melody from everything they touch will introduce their clever act entitled, "Going It Blind," and Mademoiselle Nadjé, a remarkably beautiful girl of twenty whose life since she has been eight years of age has been given up to the exciting whirl of the acrobats existence, will make her first appearance in San Francisco. She was a fixture for years at the Alhambra and other London Music Halls. Nadjé's act is most sensational and consists in addition to graceful posing of contortion stunts and dazzling head balancing. It will be the last week of the St. Onge Brothers, Ferry, "The Human Frog," the Three Abdullah Brothers and of the Countess Rossi and Monsieur Paulo. There will be new Motion Pictures.

MADMOISELLE NADJÉ

"Mrs. Leffingwell's Boots"

Miss Laura Lang, leading woman of the New Alcazar Stock Company, who has been confined to her room for the past weeks with a severely sprained ankle, has so far recovered as to be able to attend rehearsals and will appear in the cast next Monday evening, when Belasco and Mayer put on Augustus Thomas's clever comedy, "Mrs. Leffingwell's Boots." She is cast as Mable Ainslee, the leading feminine role.

"Mrs. Leffingwell's Boots" is delightfully funny. The play gets its name from the compromising incident of a bachelor finding outside his window on the fire escape a pair of dainty woman's shoes. They are identified as Mrs. Leffingwell's. This causes complications of a very comical kind. There are many ridiculous situations, all of which turn out well in the end and everybody is satisfied and happy after three hours of uproarious fun.

Bertram Lytell will play the part of Walter Corbin. Ernest Glendenning is cast as Dick Ainslee, the brother of Mabel and the individual that is responsible for all the trouble. He in his youth has met with an accident which renders him temporarily insane. He does most astounding things all of which add to the complication. John Maher, in the role of the butler who waits on the table at the Bonner dinner has an exceedingly happy part. "Mrs. Leffingwell's Boots" will be followed by "Before and After."

Idora Park

Victor Herbert's melodious opera, "The Ameer," is being given in excellent style by the splendid opera company at Idora Park. The ensemble work under Steindorff's skillful baton is far above the average and the cast of principals includes such favorites as Edith Mason, Hope Mayne, Bernice Holmes, Tom Persse, Walter De Leon and Ferris Hartman. Smith and De Koven's charming work "The Highwayman" follows. Band concerts are given every Sunday afternoon from two until five in the Park.

tugged at the creeper's stem, and then the creeper's hold would give a little: its tendrils would release some part of their clutch of the leaves and twigs of the tree, and the tearing and rending of the severance was followed by the elephant's slow munching of the lower part of the creeper until it had eaten up as far as it could reach, and began again to pull down more. While this was going on, a couple of bears passed by, "woofing" to one another as they hustled through the forest in search of food. Soon afterwards the elephant stopped feeding, and moved away.

The next day was a long and uneventful one, spent in following up the elephant's tracks without success. In the evening I had the house-boat poled a mile or two up river, for that was the direction that the elephant appeared to have taken. After dinner, while I lay upon my mattress in the house-boat, I heard old Ahman telling Sleman and the other boatmen stories that deserve to be recorded. This is one way to kill a rhinoceros.

Take a piece of hard wood (lengapus for choice) eight inches long and two inches thick, and sharpen the two ends to as fine a point as possible. When you come upon it, shout and boldly advance. The rhinoceros will thereupon rush at you. As is the custom of the animal, it will charge you with its eyes shut and its mouth open. When it approaches, step aside, and taking the stick between your thumb and first finger—so—hold it out perpendicularly, and put it in the animal's open mouth. The rhinoceros will snap upon it, and the pointed ends entering the upper and lower jaws will close the mouth for ever. As it cannot eat it will starve, and all that you have to do is to follow it until it drops down dead.

Ahman was beginning another story descriptive of a method of killing elephants by a dynamite fuse on the end of a bamboo pole, when one of the boatmen, a mannerless cub from Kemaman, interrupted the tale by bluntly calling him a liar. Ahman was so hurt that he refused to speak another word. The light was soon put out, and the men pulling their cotton cloths around them, disposed themselves for the night.

We were all awake at early dawn, and when the sun was showing over the distant mountains Ahman, Sleman, and I set out again to look for fresh tracks. We took a straight line through the forest for some miles in the direction which we imagined the elephant to have taken, and then made a wide sweep round towards the place we had been in the day before. We found nothing, however, and late in the afternoon returned to the house-boat disappointed and weary.

As we appeared upon the bank, we were greeted by a shout from the other boatmen, almost in chorus.

"'It' fed in Brahim's garden last night."

Poor Brahim! There was something very pathetic in his fate. While we had been running through the forest, like questing hounds, in search of the elephant, he had sat quietly in his house to await its coming.

We unmoored the house-boat, and paddled down stream to Brahim's house. He was perfectly calm and impersonal, the fact that the damage was in the past instead of being in the future making no difference to him. He took us round his garden as the sun was setting, and, amidst the wreckage of the leaves and branches and the great pit holes where the enormous feet had sunk into the soil, showed us where some twenty fruit trees had been destroyed.

While we were discussing the probability of the elephant's return to the plantation during the night, a couple of rattan cutters passed by on their way home from their day's work, and informed us that it had in the last hour or two crossed to the other side of the river some three miles lower down. There was little chance of another visit from it, therefore, and we turned in to sleep at an early hour.

At daybreak next morning Ahman, Sleman, and I set off down stream in a small dug-out. We found the place where the elephant had crossed the river, and landed. The tracks showed that it had fed close to the river bank most of the night; then they led inland, and we followed them for some hours.

The tracks followed a well-defined animal track through the forest, and it was only necessary to keep to this path and have a watchful eye for any place at which the elephant might have left it. We hurried along, Ahman close behind me and Sleman at his heels. And a few hundred paces further on, at a place where the path made a sudden bend round the trunk of an old dead tree, I saw lying down on the path, only a few yards away, the Blat Elephant.

It was sound asleep. Elephants usually sleep standing, and it is rare to see one sleeping, as this one was, on its side with its head on the ground and with all four feet stretched out. It lay across the path with its back to me, and rattans and forest creepers so hemmed it in that its head was hidden on one side and its hind quarters on the other by undergrowth and tangled foliage of every description. The two men stood still behind me, while I crept forward a few paces to take a steady aim. The animal was not more than fifteen yards away, but the gaunt ridge of its backbone and the nape of its neck were all that I could see. To right and left were great tangled masses of rattans, whose stems were sheathed in great thorny coverings and whose every delicate tendril carried strings of clinging hooks; and I dared not attempt to make a detour to get a shot at the elephant's forehead. I knew by experience how alert it was, and knew that I should not be able to move more than a few yards before it would hear me. I took a steady aim, therefore, at the last vertebra at the nape of its neck, expecting the bullet to smash its backbone and perhaps to rake into its brain. I fired and all was still.

Peering under the smoke of my ten-bore, I saw the animal lying motionless. I waited a few seconds, and then looked round towards the two Malays. The week before, shooting in the Kuantan valley, I had killed a fine tusker elephant with a single bullet in the brain. This made two consecutive elephants with two consecutive bullets; and the second of them was the famous Blat Elephant. Trying to conceal my emotion, I beckoned to the men to come up, saying that the animal was dead. But "dead" had barely crossed my lips when there was a rending of the rattans, and before I could move the elephant was charging straight at me.

A second before, it had been lying on the ground with all four feet stretched out, and with, I believed, a bullet in its brain. An elephant cannot spring to his feet, and a tame animal generally takes some time to rise. The suddenness of this charge may therefore appear exaggerated: I can only say that I was standing within a few yards of the animal, and was not aware of any interval of time between its lying silent on the ground and its charging me. I saw the green rattans tearing asunder to right and to left, away from an enormous brown head—a trunk tightly coiled up and a pair of huge gleaming tusks. It was all high up in the air, and right above me—imminent as a wave that curls before it breaks. With my second barrel I fired into the center of the enormous brown chest, the head being so high and so close that it was covered by the tightly coiled trunk, and then with an empty rifle I turned and ran down the track up which we had come. The elephant was only a few yards behind me, and I ran for life.

Before I had gone more than fifteen or twenty yards, I tripped and fell heavily to the ground, my rifle being flung from my hand. Death seemed certain, and I could only hope that it would be painless. But, to my intense surprise, the elephant had not followed me. Looking over my shoulder, I saw it standing under the great dead tree, from underneath which I had fired both shots. I picked myself up and, not daring to wait to get my rifle, which had been thrown into a thicket by my fall, raced down the path again and hid behind the first convenient tree. From this point of comparative safety, I saw the elephant still standing under the dead tree. It was fumbling dizzily with its trunk in the heavy smoke of the black powder—fumbling to find me. The blood was pouring from the wound in its chest in great throbbing jets, and the bright green undergrowth was drenched with heavy red.

After a few seconds the great brute began to scream with rage and pain. How it screamed! As the numbness caused by the shock of the first bullet wore off, the pain of the wound and of the second bullet in its chest drove it to frenzied madness. It trampled over the ground which was already besmeared with its blood, and, with trunk outstretched and ears thrust forward, turned in every direction to seek its assailant. My empty rifle lay between us, and I could not think of attempting to move towards it. Neither dared I move further away, for any motion on my part might attract its attention. Ahman and Sleman were both unarmed, and we all cowered behind our respective trees.

After a time—it may have been only a few minutes, but it seemed like hours—weakened by the loss of blood and convinced perhaps of the futility of its search, it moved slowly away. We came out from our hiding places, and all were very shaky. I picked up my rifle and re-loaded it, and then after a few minutes' rest to settle our nerves, we set off again after the elephant. When we had gone about a quarter of a mile, Ahman, who followed in my tracks, step for step, tapped my shoulder.

"He is going to plug up his wound," he whispered, pointing to a dwarf palm from which some leaves had been torn. A few yards further on he pointed to a place where the elephant had picked up in its trunk a small quantity of soft oozy mud. "Aih! Is he not clever? There is the poultice." This time I stopped, and asked him what he meant. He replied that the elephant would insert a plug of the palm leaves into the opening of the wound in its chest, and then cover the whole wound over with mud. It seemed almost incredible, but the time was not one for arguing about animal intelligence, and I followed the tracks again. And, sure enough, before we had gone much further the blood that had so plenteously besmeared our path suddenly dwindled to a scanty sprinkle, and shortly afterwards to a few thin drops at intervals.

After another hour or so the tracks grew firmer, showing that the animal was staggering less, and was recovering its strength. Later we came to a fallen tree some five feet in diameter that lay across a bit of swamp, and saw that the elephant, instead of wading through the swamp, had used the tree as a bridge to walk upon. This was most disheartening, and Ahman, cursing the elephant heartily for a tight-rope dancer, urged me to hasten, saying that the animal was now in all probability going faster than we were. We therefore pushed on as fast as possible, trusting that any sound we might make would be unheard by the elephant in the noise of its own movements.

But we had soon to redouble our caution, for in one place the elephant had taken a sudden loop and turned round to watch its own tracks. This is not unusual with wounded animals whose strength and size makes them dangerous, such as rhinoceroses, sladang and elephants; and when any animal adopts these tactics, its pursuers are running a very great risk. They see the tracks lying before them, and naturally only look for danger in front. But what has happened is that the animal has all but completed a great letter P. It just stops short of completing the lower part of the loop of the capital letter, and standing back a few yards from the main line of the letter watches its pursuers advance. It allows them to pass. And then without warning it charges them from behind.

On this occasion, however, luckily for us, the elephant had for some reason moved on again before we reached the spot which it had been watching.

At about two o'clock in the afternoon the tracks turned toward the river. Our luck here deserted us. The elephant decided to recross, and made for the point at which it had crossed the river the night before. This was the spot at which we had joined the tracks in the morning, and where we had left our boat.

As the elephant stepped down into the river, in a fury at the sight of any implement of man it seized our craft and swung it out of the way, snapping the iron chain by which we had tied it to a tree and sending it adrift down the stream.

When we arrived on the scene we only found a few links of a chain on the near bank, and in the distance saw the huge foot-prints which showed where the elephant had clambered up the further side. The river was not particularly broad, but it was tidal mangrove water, and infested with crocodiles. To cross it without a boat was out of the question. We had the alternative of taking a path back through the forest, making for Brahim's house, which was some three miles away, or of waiting on the chance that some boat might pass. To return was to give up all hope for the day; we therefore decided to wait. But luck was against us: for nearly three long hours did we wait upon a slimy bank, grilled in the sun and devoured by mosquitoes, mocked by the glitter of undrinkable water and insulted by the footprints fast drying upon the opposite bank. At last, at about five o'clock, a boat came round the bend of the river and took us off. It was too late to follow the tracks further, and I sadly gave the order to return to the house-boat.

It was not until after dinner that I heard of the accident to which I owe my life. Both Ahman and Sleman swore positively that when I fired my second barrel at the charging elephant, an enormous rotten branch, loosened by the concussion of the shots of my heavy rifle, fell from the tree under which I was standing. As the elephant charged down the path, the great branch fell fair upon its back. It was this that had stopped the elephant's charge, and not, as I had imagined, my second barrel. If their story is true, and I see no reason to doubt it, it was a marvellous chance that the branch, which would have killed me had I remained where I was for a moment longer, should have saved my life by falling upon the elephant.

I ordered the house-boat to be taken down to the point where the elephant had crossed and re-crossed, and we were drifting lazily with the stream and consoling ourselves for the day's want of success by an assurance of the certainty of meeting the elephant again on the morrow, when suddenly we were hailed out of the darkness by a police-boat.

"Amok—amok!"

When the boats approached one another, a corporal came on board and reported that a Malay had run amok, killing his wife and two men. The scene of the murders was on the sea coast, not far from the border between my district and an independent native state, and the murderer, who had escaped into the forest, would undoubtedly make for the border. The sergeant and a posse had already left in pursuit.

There was no police inspector in the district, and therefore no option was left me. I took the police crew on my boat, and with a double set of men we paddled hard for the river mouth. By midnight we had transhipped into the Government yawl, and a few hours later were out at sea skirting the coastline to make for the Kemaman border.

We eventually caught our man, but it was long before I could find time to return to the Blat river. It was then of course out of the question to follow the tracks that we had left, and all that I could do was to organize parties to search in all directions for any signs that there might be of the elephant's dead body. But all in vain.

The next month I left Kuantan on transfer to another district. Soon after my arrival at home I got a letter from Ahman to say that a Malay rattan-cutter had come upon the dead body of the Blat Elephant, and had stolen the tusks and sold them to a Chinaman over the Kemaman border. I wrote to my successor about the matter, but the lapse of time made it impossible for him to do anything. And that, I am afraid, is the end of the Blat Elephant.

It is satisfactory so far as Brahim and the cultivators of the Blat and Sol rivers are concerned, for they have, I hope, killed the goats and buffaloes that they vowed to slay; and, unless a new elephant has appeared to take the place of the old one, their crops are safe.

But where are the tusks that I should have to grace my story? I sigh to think of them lying in a shop-window, cut up into hair-brushes or frittered away to be the fittings of a dressing-case. For, in my dreams, I see them as I shall never see them again: gleaming in great curves, with an overpowering bulk of head and body behind them, and framed by a veil of green rattans torn asunder to right and to left.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN: Our three-year-old daughter, having been ill for some time and being treated by the most prominent physicians, gradually became worse and was finally given up by them. We were then recommended to Dr. Wong Him. We started with his treatment, and within two months' time our daughter was cured. Respectfully,

MR. AND MRS. H. C. LIEB, 2757 Harrison street, San Francisco.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., December 19, 1906.

TO THE PUBLIC: This is to certify that Dr. Wong Him has cured me of lung and stomach trouble, from which I had suffered for many years. I tried many doctors, but they failed to cure me. I consulted Dr. Wong Him, and after taking his Herb Medicine for six months am now permanently cured. I wish to recommend him to the public as an efficient and skillful physician.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 19, 1907.

TO THE PUBLIC: I had a very severe case of Throat Trouble and general breakdown. Did not sleep or eat for eight days. After trying every remedy I heard of without success, I called on Dr. Wong Him, 1268 O'Farrell street, who by feeling my pulse correctly diagnosed my case. His remedies gave me immediate relief. Cannot say too much in favor of his teas.

Labor's Opportunity

Usually jealous to the point of supersensitiveness of the good name of organized labor in this city, the gentlemen who are engaged in safeguarding the rights of the laboring man through the agency of the San Francisco Labor Council have allowed themselves to be beguiled for the nonce from their wonted vigilance. Forgetting momentarily the purport of those high-sounding platitudes wherewith they delight to hold spellbound the attention of our citizenry, they have placed themselves in embarrassing opposition to a plan outlined in the sincere interests of union labor and calculated, one would say offhand, to win their most enthusiastic endorsement. Given the opportunity to demonstrate to all the world the purity of their motives and the straightforwardness of their course throughout the interminable series of labor difficulties which have disturbed this city during the last twelvemonth, they have, with truly astonishing warmth and hastiness, repudiated the chance and absolutely refused to avail themselves of as splendid an occasion of glorification as comes their way in a lifetime. Taking advantage of the announced fact that three members of President Roosevelt's cabinet are to visit this city in the near future for reasons connected with the administration of their respective departments, a number of gentlemen whose enthusiasm in the cause of industrial peace has survived some disheartening setbacks, conceived the brilliant idea of invoking the offices of these personal advisers of the President on behalf of our strife-rent city. It was an alluring program. Messrs. Strauss, Metcalfe and Garfield might be supposed to have peculiar qualifications for the unknottng of the seemingly hopeless tangle of difficulties that enwrap local capital and labor. At least they would bring to a question which has been rendered artificially obscure to San Franciscans by the very persistence with which they have been compelled to regard it, the freshness of undulled vision and the mental alacrity that accompanies a totally novel viewpoint. That they would be strictly impartial in their deliberations and unswayed by prejudice in their final decision seems beyond the province of doubt. Remote considerations of expediency might perhaps be urged against this plan of calling in three federal officials of the highest rank to be the umpires of our intramural struggle; yet are they of the sort which would not occur to the leaders of organized labor whose wont it is to spurn the limitations of expediency whenever they happen to militate against the forward sweep of unionism. And still the opposition to this plan of laying the moot questions that divide the employers and workers of this city before three enlightened members of Roosevelt's cabinet and invoking their kindly assistance for the furtherance of industrial peace came swiftly and with unmistakable determination from the leaders of organized labor. The clique of men who mold the destinies of the San Francisco Labor Council would have none of the scheme. They denounced it in unmeasured terms that were as startling in their import as in their vehemence. It was, they declared, nothing less than a capitalistic plot hatched to destroy the labor organizations of this city. Their language carried the plain intimation that they would resent any attempt to bare the bleeding wounds of this city to the professional eyes of Messrs. Strauss, Metcalfe and Garfield.

Rejected By the Council

Here is a most extraordinary situation. If there is one chord on which union labor as represented in this city by the San Francisco Labor Council has persistently harped it is that attuned to the pretense of liberality and fairness. It has always been the contention of the gentlemen who do the talking for the unions included in that council that their demands on capital have ever been such as ought to commend them to the consideration of square-dealing employers. They have ever insisted that naught save impossible conditions of labor and living have prompted them to call for those increases in wages and those modifications of hours with which the public is familiar and to enforce their applications with strikes when they have been refused. There has been an unexpressed notion that between the methods of the San Francisco Labor Council and the methods of P. H. McCarthy's personally conducted Building Trades Council lies a gaping chasm broad enough to receive all who disagree with the Honorable Pin Head's conduct of union affairs. It has been currently believed that a certain measure of wisdom denied the Building Trades abided with the deliberations of the Labor Council. But now are these ideas seen to be of gratuitous inspiration and entirely devoid of any basis in fact. The Labor Council has rejected a program which, if the reiterated assertions of its leaders may be relied upon, could not fail to cover organized labor in this city with glory by discovering to all the world the soundness of its diverse demands on employers, the blamelessness of its strike methods and the selfish motives which have caused capitalists to resist its justifiable applications for more wages and fewer hours. It is inevitable that this incontinent rejection of so glorious an opportunity for vindication should excite the suspicion that its demands are not all fair, that its methods of conducting strikes are not at all times above reproach and that the resistance offered by employers to its bewildering requests are grounded on sound reasons. To these suspicions, unworthy perhaps, the San Francisco Labor Council has exposed itself by its extraordinary treatment of the proposal to acquaint Messrs. Strauss, Metcalfe and Garfield with the current disturbances in the labor market. In an age when cynicism is rampant and motives are impugned without compunction the upright chiefs of the Labor Council have exposed themselves to the severest strictures. They have been guilty besides of most defective strategy.

A Strategic Mistake

For it is not at all certain that the three gentlemen whose duties call them to this city from Washington will find time to hearken to our local troubles nor is it more certain, admitting that they could find time, that all three of them would consent to become the arbiters in so complicated a dispute. At any rate their assent to the scheme had not been obtained when the Labor Council saw fit to denounce it. Messrs. Strauss, Metcalfe and Garfield may tarry in this city and may, despite the protestations of the labor body, lend their valuable counsel to the settlement of our economic difficulties, but one great branch of organized labor has gone on record as opposed to their well-meant interference and this fact must discount all future platitudinous assertions on the part of that great branch that it welcomes intelligent and fairminded co-operation in the adjustment of its disputes with employers. The Labor Council has given its opponents a weapon that will be used against the workingman with telling effect. It may be said now with greater appearance of truth than ever before and with smaller ground for contradiction, that the Labor Council does not welcome impartial consideration of its troubles; that it fears the results of unprejudiced arbitrament; that it hesitates to discover to outsiders the history of its strikes. It will inevitably be said that between San Franciscans, case-hardened as they are to the amazing methods of organized labor, and easterners, used to the supremacy of the law and careless of the distinction between organized and unorganized workers, the Labor Council recognizes a difference of considerable significance and accordingly balks at extra-Californian publicity. Of course it will be hinted that the Labor Council sees danger in the exploitation of the circumstances surrounding the carmen's strike, from its inauguration at a packed meeting in which the free expression of dissenting opinion was impossible to its riot and bloodshed, its insults to defenseless women and children and its impudent attempts at universal boycott. There is ground now for the assertion that the Labor Council does not dare to have uncovered its pretty habit of organizing workers merely to call them out on strike as was done with the unfortunate telephone girls who were swept into a union and out of their positions by the specious arguments of paid organizers who must have strikes or forfeit their comfortable salaries. All these assertions will of course be repudiated in the scornful and bellicose manner characteristic of labor leaders who find themselves subjected to attack, yet will it be difficult wholly to disprove them in the face of the furious refusal of the Labor Council to be lured into conference with unprejudiced and disinterested cabinet officers. That simple fact must deprive the labor leaders of the advantage of position which they have for a long time and with a strategical agility that must be acknowledged and admired, held against the onslaughts of the hated capitalists. The burden of proving sincerity has ever been on the shoulders of the employers and they have been hard put to it at times to make good their argument. Henceforth it will rest with the labor leaders to vindicate the purity of their motives and all because they saw fit, most undiplomatically and mayhap most unstrategically, to decline sitting down in council with three personal representatives of President Roosevelt.

How the East Regards Us

Aside from all other considerations the intervention of the Washington statesmen in the local difficulty would work exceeding benefit to this city by correcting misapprehensions about our situation that are widely spread throughout the East. This fact is so obvious that it even occurred to one or two of the more enlightened leaders in the Labor Council who advocated the acceptance by that body of the suggestion to call in the visiting cabinet men. They pointed out to their resisting brethren that Messrs. Strauss, Metcalfe and Garfield might be relied upon to carry East with them a correct impression of our actual conditions and to use their firsthand information for the good of the city. This argument was probably not germane enough to the particular interests of organized labor to impress men who seem to regard their own personal aggrandizement in all municipal happenings to the exclusion of every other consideration. Yet is it one that should not be overlooked. Unquestionably San Francisco is getting a very hard name along the Atlantic seaboard. Positive misstatements about conditions here are not uncommon and where facts or purported facts fail the resources of jest and sarcasm are used to make of our unfortunate mishaps a by-word and a mockery. It has become possible for men like Professor Goldwin Smith whose every utterance commands widespread respect to say of us: "Believers in Karl Marx, who hold that in production labor is everything and capital is nothing, should turn their attention to the state of things in San Francisco. There the domination of the unions, carried to an extravagant height and enforced by violence, has succeeded in scaring away capital. The consequence is that the rebuilding of the city has been arrested and San Francisco, marked out by nature as the queen of that coast, is in danger of failing to recover herself and of being eclipsed by her rivals. To such a pitch has the peril come that they talk of a vigilance committee." To accuse Professor Goldwin Smith of wilful misrepresentation would be grotesquely unjust; he has but reckoned with our status in the light of the data placed at his disposal by the eastern press. That press, it need hardly be pointed out, would extend unequivocal welcome to anything which Messrs. Strauss, Metcalfe and Garfield might care to say about us; but however well-intentioned those gentlemen may be they will lack the assistance of the Labor Council in estimating conditions and preparing to correct the misapprehension current in other parts of the country.

Unscrupulous Detectives

Attention has been focussed a good deal during the past few months on the defects of this city's detective system. That men insufficiently qualified for the position should be charged with the task of hunting down criminals and securing evidence of their guilt in an administration of the police department that is notoriously inefficient and demoralized does not excite surprise, but when it becomes possible for such incompetents to place innocent men in the shadow of the gallows or of life imprisonment it is certainly time to call a halt. This is exactly what has happened in this city at least three times within the last twelvemonth. How many cases of the same kind lie undiscovered amid the records of the two state penitentiaries there is no way of estimating. It will be recalled that the confessions of the gaspipe murderers saved two innocent men, one from capital punishment and the other from fifty years' imprisonment. Here were two appalling mistakes corrected through no means within the power of the police but only by voluntary confession. Those who took the trouble to study the evidence on which those two innocent men were placed in such fearful jeopardy know that it was inconclusive and that unmitigated blame should have attached to the detectives who prepared it. A similar case of faulty detective methods is at present occupying the attention of the criminal courts. After being convicted on circumstantial evidence of murdering an ex-policeman in a saloon hold-up and just before receiving the sentence of the law, an unfortunate named Byrne has probably been saved from undeserved capital punishment by the affidavits of two men whose testimony could have been obtained during the trial if our police and detective forces were less bent on securing convictions and more impressed with the weighty responsibility resting upon their shoulders. Too often baffled by the ingenuity of criminals and repeatedly compelled to acknowledge their inability to trace offenders through any but the plainest clues, they have become so unscrupulous that they do not always hesitate to twist the evidence at hand to fit the case of a mere suspect. That seems to have been done by the detectives who handled the O'Connell murder case, for certainly there were enough suspicious circumstances surrounding the trial of Byrne to raise the question of his innocence even in the mind of an inexperienced outsider. Yet until two men whose testimony is sufficient to free him from suspicion came forward with affidavits which would never have been secured if police efforts had been relied upon, Byrne stood beneath the gallows. Not the least important result of a new police administration in this city will be the comparative assurance that detectives, held to the strict and untiring performance of their duties, are not sending innocent men to death or to life terms in prison.

Marriage With Orientals

When a university co-ed engaged in the interesting but severe study of psychology is constrained to the newspaper exploitation of her conviction that what California needs most of all for the hastening of her progress along the road to culture and all other good things is the giving in marriage of her beautiful daughters to Chinese, Japanese and other orientals, the indulgent reader is apt to smile as at an exhibition of brain-storm and pass on to other more sensible topics. Undoubtedly too much weight should not be attached to the salad utterances of immature young women swept off their wonted base by the opening vistas of philosophy as expounded at the state university. It is not necessary to summon the assistance of the heavy ordnance of argumentation to confute them; their position will yield quite as readily to the pop-gun fire of pleasantries and will not be held long if just simply ignored. However there is a germ of thought at the bottom of the erratic idea propounded by this feminine student of Berkeley psychology which might be cultivated for the benefit of those anxious to see the Chinese and Japanese granted unrestricted rights of entrance into this country. It is this, that familiarity of intercourse with orientals is apt to deprive superficial men and women of that keen appreciation of the gulf that separates the white race from the yellow which ought to have impressed itself upon their minds when they first dipped into the primary school geography. Light-headed men and women are especially liable to forget this fact when they become fascinated with oriental art and literature and have a fashionable veneer of Chinese carving or Japanese prints spread over their uncultivated minds. Those best acquainted with the oriental character know that intermarrying of whites and yellows results in hopeless miscegenation, but faddists and enthusiasts are either ignorant or forgetful of this undoubted fact; hence the occasional marriages between Americans and Japanese or Chinese; hence also such foolish statements as that of the fair psychologist across the bay. Almost at the same time that this young woman was confiding her new-born ideas about American-Japanese matrimonial alliances to some enterprising reporter, the president of her university was pointing out to an eastern audience that one of the grave dangers to be anticipated if Chinese and Japanese are given the freedom of this country is the likelihood of Americans adopting oriental customs and extending mental hospitality to oriental habits of thought. This danger is not so remote as it may appear to those who do not reckon with the American facility for imitation, particularly when the glamor of art and refinement blinds to racial differences. It is to be hoped that the philosophic course at Berkeley includes some study of those radical differences which cannot be set aside even by the enthusiasm of pretty co-eds for cultured and fascinating orientals.

Up-to-Date Criticism

An Englishwoman, Miss Florence Farr by name, has discovered as the result of a visit to this country which must have played havoc with her mental mechanism, that Bernard Shaw is New York incarnate; and she has elaborated this amazing discovery in a way that proves the existence of a dementia britannica, unsuspected perhaps by Mr. Delmas, but calculated to make the American variety look like perfect sanity. Impressionistic criticism has never before become involved in such a maze of outlandish symbolism as flows from the pen of Miss Farr. To her vitalizing imagination the New York skyscraper suggests Mr. Shaw's religion; the multiplicity of building operations suggests Mr. Shaw's prefaces; Tiffany's with its mixture of the sacred and the profane is piquant and so is Mr. Shaw; the cooking at Delmonico's has all the qualities of Mr. Shaw's plays; Central Park reminds of the poetical in Mr. Shaw; and the New York woman is the feminine counterpart of Mr. Shaw. Just how unadulterated nonsense in the guise of criticism could go to greater extremes than this it would be impossible to imagine. If Miss Farr were bent on parodying the peculiar system of critical appreciation perfected in England by Mr. Arthur Symonds and other Gallicized exquisites she would be entitled to considerable praise for this effort, but her work is unmistakably intended to be taken seriously. It has all the characteristic marks that distinguish the "paper" read at a woman's club and which forbid any suspicion of a frivolous intent. But the saddening feature about all this is that it undoubtedly will be taken seriously by numerous readers who have received no instruction in the fundamentals of criticism and have not been taught to perceive that all such glittering output of the brain is the merest trash. So-called literary magazines are the vehicles by which this ridiculous stuff is conveyed to a public which has not been educated to a taste for substantial mental food and their editors are more to blame for it than the foolish persons who write it. Miss Florence Farr might easily write a book of criticism on the lines of her Bernard Shaw effort; it would only necessitate an unbridled imagination and an absence of literary shame, both of which are illustrated in the tour de force called forth by Miss Farr's visit to New York. Undoubtedly she could discover points of remarkable resemblance between a Maeterlinck play and a Cincinnati pickle, draw parallels between Sudermann and Milwaukee lager, note the affinity between George Moore and New Orleans gumbo. In fact the reaches of this sort of impressionistic criticism are only limited by the industry and assurance of the critic. Let Miss Farr but persevere and she will gain the reputation of being a subtle and profound student of literature—at least that is what the monthly organs of culturine will say about her.

Roosevelt's Conservatism

Indications of a growing conservatism on the part of President Roosevelt which were not lacking in his much-discussed Indianapolis speech on railroads have been more frequently discernible in some of the addresses he has delivered since. It would appear that the president is either becoming tired of carrying the "big stick" continually or—and this seems more likely—is awakening to the necessity of struggling against that American tendency toward destructive criticism and mere denunciation which finds its extreme expression in our socialistic and labor demagogues. There is evident more and more in the president's public utterances a careful attempt at the balancing of praise and blame, a sincere determination not to exceed the exact limits of truth and fact, either in favorable or unfavorable criticism of men and measures. This is not a sign pointing to a reactionary process in the chief executive's mind but rather to a maturing process which carries a greater consideration for the lights and shades of conduct. Thus, in his speech to the editors who assembled in national conference at the Jamestown Exposition he pleaded for greater equanimity in the journalistic handling of the issues and personalities that just now interest this country. "There are good and bad men," said the president, "in every walk of life, and their being good or bad does not depend upon whether they have or do not have large bank accounts." And again: "It is a sure sign of moral and mental dishonesty in any man if in his public assaults upon iniquity he is never able to see any iniquity save that of a particular class. There is equal need to denounce the wealthy man who swindles investors or buys legislatures or oppresses wageworkers, and the needy man who inflames class hatred or incites mob violence." These, as the president points out, are elemental facts, but they are often ignored by public men and public writers. Careful followers of the procession of events may see special significance in the emphasis President Roosevelt is beginning to place upon them.

Free Books A Doubtful Good

In these "best seller" days conservative thinkers see no reason why municipalities should supply free reading matter other than books of reference and technical works. Nine-tenths of the library frequenters read too much. Their selections are almost invariably of the lightest fiction which requires neither thought nor concentration. Many, who read two or three novels a week are, at the end of the year, no better off mentally than is the water pipe through which a stream has flowed daily. No better indication of the futility of this seeming intellectual industry is needed than the stamped indicators on the library slips. As soon as an ordinary novel ceases to be "new" it is neglected, and remains thereafter untouched on the shelves for months and years. Except to the discriminating few, who are apt to buy books rather than borrow them, it is all one whether a romance has permanent qualities or not, for nothing is read a second time unless perchance it is billed for stage presentation. Libraries purchase novels in quantity, as many copies as will satisfy a reasonable demand of their patrons, and the waiting list for anything which attracts special attention is apt to be both lengthy and clamorous. If these same people really felt an interest beyond that of mere curiosity, at least one-half of them would purchase for themselves, with corresponding profit to both author and publisher, not to mention the humble book-dealer.

The First Kiss

By Mabel Porter Pitts

No hope, no regret, no remembrance of pain,
No dead of the past to be wept or despised,
The heart all unknown to remorse that is vain,
Unused to fulfillment of that which is prized;

No eyes from the shadows to search through the soul
In question of right to the glance fondly met,
The innocent lips gain the innocent goal
With naught to remember and naught to forget.

For not till a voice that was loved has grown dumb
Can any soul reckon of pleasure or pain,
And not till the red of a mouth has become
A chalice of gall for remembrance to drain.

Perspective Impressions

Time was when money made the mare go but now its the autos make the money go.

And now Schmitz says he's too sick to go to jail and Ruef is hinting that he expects an attack of undigested securities. What a lot of ailments that immunity bath saved the supervisors.

With the Peace Conference now going on at the Hague and three Cabinet members on their way to San Francisco to bring about peace between warring capital and labor it looks as though the rattled dove would be cajoled into carrying some kind of a "package" instead of the olive branch.

San Francisco recognizes the car strike has petered out but Cornelius is so busy handling the $15,000 a month contributed by sympathetic unions to help the cause that he hasn't time to take notice. By the way why is not a proper accounting demanded regarding the disbursement of this money?

It is gradually becoming apparent that something went wrong with the method in which Ruef was given his immunity bath.

Oh, that mine enemy would write a "letter"! The more General Funston frankly explains his Fourth of July letter the more ammunition for bushwhacking purposes will his barking enemies transmute from his utterances. His stand for San Francisco during and after the big fire is the best explanation of his position.

What's the matter with San Francisco that every bolt of lightning the world around comes hurtling in her direction? The national telegraphers union, before their strike, discussed nearly every city in the United States as a possible auspicious point to open the battle.
San Francisco was not even mentioned till the committee recognized that the fatal day was at hand and then every last one of them decided it was the only place in the universe to start the fracas. Suffering—but, oh, well. Next!

The College Question

By Harry Cowell

For many years past the unfeed advisers of the youth of this land of Stanfords and Rockefellers—namely, the old who have made a howling success of business and a flat failure of life—have been in the habit of exhorting the second generation after this wise: Put knowledge in your head, young man, that being their indireet, judicious way of advising: Young man, put money in your purse! Knowledge, they reasoned, is power, and power is bound to be used to the end of putting money in one's purse, it is wasted else.

But Knowledge, once in awhile, introduces young men of parts to her who is justified of her children—if only such by adoption. Hence the question: Does college education pay?—that is, does it pay interest on the money invested? In other words, Do university graduates, as a rule, make better business men than the street-bred orphans who have never known a benign mother's care? It is to be hoped not. I, for one, am happy in the belief that they do not; it being incredible that anybody who has had for four years the run of one of Wisdom's many mansions, and seen life from the windows thereof, should ever come to regard it with the eyes of the street, as an all too brief moment given us wherein to make money. Surely the making of money belongs to the "unadorned remainder" of a cultured man's days; that unadorned remainder which, according to an English scholar of note, it is the chief function of education to cause to be as though it were not.

But vulgarly mistaken as is the point of view of the street, far as the adding of house to house or field to field or dollar to dollar is from being the end of human existence here, there is an ultimate wage for which all men alike work, or consciously or unconsciously, and that is happiness, blessedness, well-being—call it what you will. Now, from the point of view of what may be called the higher hedonism, does what is called the higher education pay? The higher education that does not make thinkers of whom it educates is not worthy the name, and, as I have said once before, or twice, it may be, to think is to be sad.

And yet, when we listen to the unhappy possessors of knowledge expatiating upon the blissfulness of ignorance in general, we tend to smile, just as we do, to hear the rich holding forth on the blessings of poverty; suspecting them of practicing a more or less interested self-deception of which we ourselves are incapable. As for me, I take with a good-sized grain the doctrine that the mental pauper, without a thought in his head, is on the whole better off than the millionaire in the things of the mind; a doctrine so ardently preached nowadays, too ardently to be entirely disinterested. "The first wealth is health!" Thus sentimentously the high priests of mental poverty, in that original way of theirs. "Behold the countenance of no-thought. It is of a ruddy cast, ruddy in the extreme, and enviable." And then an exposition, lengthy as learned, of the beauties of being in very deed brothers of the ox, of living close to Nature, of lying at one's ease, full of clover and contentment, gazing at nothing in particular with great bovine eyes incapable of looking before or after.

Alas, good sirs, we are, some of us, nay, all of us, after a sort, inescapably men, born to thought and sorrow as the sparks fly upward. Thinking is doubtless, as one has said, a disease. Like love, however, it is a disease which makes for life and longevity (men have died and worms have eaten them, but not of—thinking); a disease peculiarly human, whereof the pain does indeed spiritualize the limbs, and is, moreover, so extreme as to be indistinguishable from pleasure. The truth is, that the aristocracy of intellect is as loath to see obliterated its invidious marks of distinction as is the aristocracy of money, its, or that of birth, its. The outcry against the education of woman, and of the lower classes generally, is made, nearly all of it, by man the aristocrat. You all know the arguments. Uncultured women make the better wives. Naturally. Give her never so little instruction in seeing the object as in itself it really is, and what in the name of all that's holy becomes of the female's worship of the male? Thought is fatal to beauty. Wherefore, then, doth man study himself so intensively in the looking-glass? Give your beggar in brains just half a chance to get astride a hobby, and he'll ride to the devil. Well, what of it? Does it make so much difference after all, whether he ride or walk? Not a few members of the aristocracy of intellect, being in the habit—a natural enough one, I grant you—of taking their humorists seriously, are deeply grieved to think of the many, many farm-bred lads who return home from college so educated that their own mothers do not know them, above all, so educated that they do not—will not—know their own mothers. "Ah Learning, now much loafing is done in thy name!" they cry, these aristocratic students of sociology, whose countenances are happily, by special grace of Hygeia, still of one ruddiness with those of the unthinking, for all that they are so deeply read in the comic papers and concerned in the proper bringing up of country lads. The comic papers, to be sure, have not much to say of the human herds that enter college cattle and go out of it men, bereft of bovine tranquility, doomed forever to the restlessness of thought.

No doubt, the moments of oxen chewing the cud pass pleasantly enough. On the other hand, there is doubtless no philosopher but has spent many a ruminant hour in no very pleasant wise. None the less, I would liefer be a Schopenhauer than an ox.

To make it possible for the once ox-like country lad to pass one exquisite human moment, and at the same time not increase his capacity for pain, no college on earth can do that.

If one is desirous above all things of adding "quality to one's moments as they pass," to go or not to go to college is a question easily answered; but if one is desirous above all things of putting money in one's purse, then not so easily; although many a beast of prey has gone to college for the express purpose of sharpening his wits, as they were tooth and claw, for use in the struggle for existence.

On the whole, however, graduates are more human than matriculates, and foolish indeed is the Alma Mater who is not justified of her children. To be sure, the college man, taught of his foster mother to see himself as heir of all the ages, his head filled with her fine old aristocratic notions, is very apt to give Money to understand that, despite its long and faithful service, he, not it, is master. For Money, as every one of the least culture is well aware, is an old family servant which we have good-naturedly allowed to take no end of liberties with us, until now we are utterly at a loss to know how to make it keep its place. For the life of us, we are unable to see how we can get along without it, though it has seen fit to change places with us, and will not let us call our souls our own. Yes, college education pays us priceless moments at the price of a little pain.

The New Butler

By Alfred Af Hedenstjerna

A providence had blessed the house of Bykvist, so that now they were millionaires, although both husband and wife had started as poor little "kids" with broken shoes, and without any absolute certainty as to their daily provender. They had reached an age between fifty and sixty, and had remained free from cancer, chronic dyspepsia, heart disease, or anything else in that line which occasionally hampers the enjoyment of the rich and shadows their sunny existence. The Bykvists fared well and heartily, and they even enjoyed the rare luxury of a good conscience, favorable circumstances having brought them extraordinary riches without demanding extraordinary rascalities on the part of Mr. Bykvist.

They had a fine, capable son, who practically directed the business. They also had two pretty daughters in the early twenties, gentle girls with golden hair, dainty figures, and delicate complexions. As a matter of fact, they had everything commonly conceded to be worldly happiness.

Yet husband and wife were deliberating whether the present standard of their fortunes did not require decisive measures, destined to lift the family once for all above all their fellow citizens. Not that they meant to withdraw from their old friends. On the contrary, their triumph was to derive its chief flavor from shining before their circle of acquaintances. Something must be done that could not be imitated by any one in Strandholm.

How about building a palatial mansion? This was already planned, but for obvious reasons the palace could not be completed before three years from date.

How about a Lucullian banquet, with champagne for the cheapest wine, a choice variety of entremets, and all the vegetables and fruits at least six months ahead of time? No, that had been done on a previous occasion, when one of the guests had gorged herself with new asparagus at Christmas time, without being at all impressed with the fact. The Strandholm gentlemen, moreover, called all brands of wine superior, as soon as they had guzzled a certain amount.

"I know!" said Fru Bykvist at last. She fetched the newspaper and read aloud with a slightly trembling voice:

"A capable man-servant and experienced butler, with excellent references, who has served for eleven years in a baronial castle, desires a position in an aristocratic family. Kindly address Reliable, Esperood, General Delivery."

"We must have him, John?" said Fru Bykvist.

"Hmm! yes, that would certainly impress the small fry," answered Father Bykvist.

"Oh, how splendid! Of course, he must have a beautiful livery," said the girls.

"He would have plenty of time to assist occasionally in the warehouse," interpolated Bykvist, Jr., who had an eye for business.

Half an hour later, each member of the family was wielding a pen. The daughters ordered fashion papers with livery patterns, Bykvist, Jr., asked for a price list of buttons, gaiters, etc., and the old man himself wrote to "Reliable, Esperood, General Delivery."

"Heaven grant that he has not already accepted an engagement!" sighed Miss Emmy.

The only one who did not write was Mother Bykvist, who was promenading up and down the avenue with a friend.

"Yes, my dear, there is going to be quite a change in our house very soon," said Fru Bykvist in conclusion.

"You don't say so! How very interesting. Pardon me, but I must hurry home now, Edward is expecting me!" answered the friend, hurrying away as if she had stepped upon a firecracker.

Edward, however, did not get a glimpse of her for the next three hours, for she first peeped into every house in Strandholm to report:

"What do you think? One of the Bykvist girls is engaged to be married! The mother herself hinted as much to me!"

Whereupon a certain ambitious young iron merchant, who loved Miss Emmy better than his life, experienced all the torments of doubt and jealousy, so that he began to dust his revolver case and polish the weapon.

Fortunately, "Reliable" was as yet free. His services were available for a paltry five hundred dollars a year.

"No more than our bookkeeper's salary," commented Bykvist, Sr.

When "Reliable" arrived at the station and inquired for the home of the millionaire merchant, some Strandholm ladies, who happened to be promenading in the vicinity, nudged each other and whispered: "Just see, will you—that's the father-in-law, who has come to take a look around."

"How peculiar that none of the family is here to meet him?"

"Why, it's to be kept secret for the present, my dear, don't you see?" explained the first speaker.

When the bell rang soon afterwards in the Bykvist home, Miss Louise herself went to open the door. Seeing a middle-aged, very well dressed and distinguished looking gentleman, with gray whiskers and a silk top hat, she inquired respectfully for his name.

The Approaching Municipal Tangle

The Graft Prosecution armed with its Big Stick is rapidly approaching a very critical point in its scheme of municipal reorganization and I am told the members show signs of perturbation over the possible outcome. For months past it has been blazoned to the world that when they considered the time ripe they would proceed with the business of appointing a mayor—vice Schmitz convicted. Scarcely was the ink dry on the record against Schmitz when the ukase was issued that the time was ripe to shear him of the prerogatives of office. The mayor's appeal to a higher court to be allowed his liberty on furnishing proper bonds was regarded by them as simply useless squirming in the net.

As the Plan Was Sketched

The ready Prosecution had already settled the appealed points in its own mind just as it self-confidently had determined all points leading up to the appointment of Schmitz's successor. Handy Man Gallagher was slated to assume the mayor's chair for a day or two; in the interim one of the supervisors, Lonergan rumor said, was to resign and acting mayor or Mayor Gallagher was to appoint the Prosecution's very dark horse to the vacant position. Gallagher was then to quit the fatal chair and go away back and sit down while the Big Stick coerced the necessary number of supervisors to elect the dark horse to the mayorship. Schmitz was then to be placed in his official coffin and toted off the political stage. No flowers. Then was to follow the long awaited municipal house cleaning day in which the self confessed grafting supervisors were to resign one by one while the new mayor replaced them with timber selected by the Big Stick. The new board, once in office, it was expected that the naming of the several important municipal committees would be simply dictation work for Spreckels, Heney and their advisors.

Schmitz Makes a Sortie

This was the alluring dream of the members of the Prosecution in their most glowing moods. But here is the rub—and Heney, Spreckels and Burns have suddenly waked up to it. While their Dark Horse Mayor is appointing supervisors what will Schmitz be doing? In jail or out he still claims the prerogatives of his office and will insist upon exercising them: Only a protracted and bitterly fought contest in the courts will determine the issue. Even if Schmitz loses he will have succeeded in clouding the title, confusing the cautious holders of city bonds and warrants and maintaining a tentative grip on the place during the rest of his term. He intends to appoint supervisors to the reconstructed board as fast as the Big Stick drubs out the present members. His new supervisors, even if they fail to collect their salaries from an enjoined treasurer or even if they are driven to meet Schmitz in jail will compose a board to be figured with, a board of sufficient importance to throw flickering rays of legal doubt on the acts of the new board framed by the graft Prosecution—the point aimed at by Schmitz.

Tying Up the City's Money

A foretaste of this non-relishable dish is now being presented to the Prosecution in the shape of the mayor's notice served this week on the bondsmen of Treasurer Bantel. Schmitz has officially announced that he will hold the surety company responsible for any public moneys the treasurer may pay out without his, (Schmitz) signature to the warrant. The Prosecution may scoff at such a move on Schmitz's part but just the same it places an irritating doubt on the legality of any money paid out without Schmitz's approval. Naturally the surety company, sensitive of the safety of its funds, has announced that there is no use to take any chances till the courts have passed upon the point at issue. To clinch the matter Bantel has sided with Schmitz. The latter accordingly has added the treasurer's office as an intrenchment to his position and he will continue to capture such municipal out posts from all of which he must be formally expelled by suits at law. Any one familiar with the Collins case knows what that means. These are complications the Prosecution would give a deal to unravel. Verily the Big Stick, as handled by its present wielders, is proving something of a boomerang.

Ruef as a Sole Support

More and more as the days roll by and the vision clears is the eye of the public opening to the fact that the whole case of the Prosecution is "one man" testimony, based on whatever Ruef may choose to furnish. And what is Ruef? A rat caught in a trap, a crafty, sly conscienceless rogue selfishly dependent on the Prosecution's promises and cajoleries for every added hour he hopes to squeeze from his just sentence; a grafter without honor, without spirit and without compunction; a greedy, vain and begging "squeeler," who would sell his word, friends or anything else to be allowed to escape with his ill-gotten spoils and a light sentence from the punishment of his rotten misdeeds. He is a trapped protean rogue who confesses to one story when given his immunity bath, juggles the same story to suit the exigencies of the Grand Jury room and regarbles it when placed upon the witness stand as a lachrymose penitent. His shuffling testimony "made the prosecution angry," according to the interviews had after his "surprising statements" offered in the Schmitz trial. This is the creature on whose word of mouth the Prosecution banks to convict those down on their list for indictment.

Winning Public Verdicts

Long ago the Prosecution heralded that "no guilty man" should escape; that graft was to be pursued through all its ramifications till every last one of the grafters was behind the bars. Glance over the record to date. People are asking why this change of front. Simply "expediency"; the early discovery that the evidence likely to be unearthed would not convict in all the cases set down for indictment. The brainstorm over this fact led to the conception of the immunity bath through which the Prosecution hoped to land somebody or something "higher up." The net result of the immunity campaign is that the Prosecution is dependent on the sole testimony of Ruef, a broken sword, a discredited rascal who is, figuratively speaking, being thumb screwed to furnish the necessary evidence to convict the indicted. This weakness of testimony is manifest whenever the Prosecution resorts to its baneful habit—the preliminary hearings of all its cases in the newspapers in order to win a one-sided verdict. Fortunately courts are more insistent on corroborative evidence.

Grudges Chasing Rainbows

Confessed grafter after confessed grafter has been promised immunity in the rabid hunt for those "higher up," till Schmitz is the only one convicted and he has an appeal which is said to be based solidly on at least fifty good and sufficient reasons. Further, there is a growing suspicion that both Ruef and Schmitz could get almost anything they asked for in the way of immunity should they furnish evidence useful to convict the indicted. This present mad pursuit of those "higher up," this willful disregard of the appeals of a distressed city by a Prosecution lost in its haste to satisfy personal grudges is in sharp contrast with the promises made when the campaign against graft began. They insist that the big corruptionists must be brought to bar. Had the evidence been one-half as strong as their assurance the indicted would have been landed long ago. While meeting so many "easy" grafters why not convict some of those who stand self-confessed. To be consistent the Prosecution should take action against the French restaurant keepers. But consistency has not been a jewel displayed by the Prosecution. Probably that is why the city is still in such a wretched mess politically, notwithstanding the many opportunities offered Spreckels and Heney to improve matters. Selfishness and rancor never wrecked such a chance to rescue a prostrate and graft burdened city.

Young Husband (dubiously)—But you always said you'd trust to my judgment.

Young Wife (tearfully)—Well, I never dreamed it was a judgment that would hint that my last year's frocks were pretty enough for this season.

A Spasm of Virtue

Introspection for the purpose of finding out one's own absurdities is a function in which our Bar Association never indulges. That is why it is blissfully unconscious of the amusement to be derived from the spectacle which it presents while writhing in a self-induced spasm of virtue. Heretofore the Bar Association, which by the way, is composed principally of the mediocrities of the legal profession, has been dominated by ideas that nullified action. Until George D. Collins had made the ethics of his profession look like a formula for defying most of the section of the penal code nobody supposed that it was possible for a lawyer to do anything that would start a frown in the Bar Association. Abe Ruef enjoyed the confidence of that association until he pleaded guilty, and he lost it then merely because he forfeited his license automatically. But the Bar Association has been suddenly seized with an ambition to purify the profession. The birth of this ambition was posterior to the Heney Grand Jury's inquiry into the conduct of Attorney Cope who is President of the association. Cope was not indicted, but he might have been. Though he committed no crime he must nevertheless be grateful to his friend Mr. Heney for his forbearance; for in these piping times of thumb-screws, iron boots and scorching flesh indictments are distributed with a prodigality that is somewhat terrorizing.

Why They Were Indicted

It is only by way of suggestion that I mention the fact that it was after Cope was refreshed by Mr. Heney's forbearance that the Bar Association precipitately resolved to purify the profession. The association we are told has resolved to start disbarment proceedings against the attorneys who have been indicted. The absurdity of this course is thought to be obvious inasmuch as the conviction of the indicted attorneys would result in the forfeiture of their licenses. But the obviousness of it is an illusion. The fact is that there is no more chance of those attorneys being convicted than there is of Abe Ruef's becoming a worshiper of the serene and beneficent goddess Truth. Attorney Brobeck was indicted for bribery merely because the Grand Jury was in the mood, and work was getting slack and they wanted to keep their hands in at the life-long maiming pastime. At this moment Brobeck's license to practice law looks much better to me than Heney's. Attorney William M. Abbott is supposed to have been indicted just because and for nothing else. He amiably acted as a body-guard one day when some money was being carted away from the mint, and that was the nearest he ever came to committing bribery. I have not kept track of all the lawyers that have been indicted, but I shouldn't be surprised to learn that the number is very large. Mr. Heney doesn't like lawyers. I'm surprised he doesn't have himself indicted, for by the time his labors are over he will probably feel that he gave himself sufficient provocation.

A Prospective Breach

Patently I am waiting for a jangling note of discord in the sweet symphony with which the local dailies have long been regaling us. I feel that it cannot long be delayed. The main purpose of the curious and unprecedented concord has been accomplished; or at any rate it has almost reached consummation. The distribution of prizes is soon to take place. This is where we come to the parting of the ways, unless the same genius that united the newspapers and tactfully kept the combined fire concentrated on the grafters is possessed of the ingenuity requisite to prevent disruption. It was the genius of Fremont Older of the Bulletin that secured for the Prosecution the concerted action of the press. His was the tactful hand that held the noble editors together. To accomplish his purpose he had to sacrifice his own newspaper interests in a measure. If the whole truth were told Older would receive greater credit than either Heney or Burns for such success as has been had, but while the newspapers worked together behind the Prosecution, they have not abated the spirit of rivalry. The editors of the Call, Examiner and Chronicle are not likely to make a hero of the editor of the Bulletin. Whether Older will consider it worth his while to continue his task of keeping the papers united I do not know, but even though he should be disposed to do so he would find that it is one to challenge the most superb ingenuity. For when it comes to running the politics of the city government there will be found a divergence of interests. Hearst backed the Prosecution because its success meant prestige for the Independence League whose recent standard bearer is the District Attorney. That gentleman holds the key of the situation. He is of course merely a puppet in the hands of the Hon. J. J. Dwyer, and it is doubtful whether the latter, as Hearst's representative will be willing to make concessions to Jimmy Phelan, who is Rudolph Spreckels's mentor in politics. Considerable friction has already been engendered, but a cooling process was discovered which prevented combustion. How far this process can be depended upon remains to be seen. If Heney and Cobb can continue to conceal their feelings respecting puppet Langdon the difficulties that now present themselves may be overcome.

Orchard As a Linguist

Assistant Postmaster Hull McClaughery, who went to Boise as a witness in the Haywood murder case, tells an amusing incident of the cross-examination of Orchard. This repentant murderer, whenever he spoke of the bombs with which he wrought death and destruction, pronounced the word "bum." Attorney Richardson, who was cross-examining him, referred to a clock which Orchard had testified he kept in a valise wherein he also carried a bomb intended for an enemy of unionism. The clock's ticking had attracted attention, and Richardson asked him why he kept it running while it was not in use as a timepiece. Orchard's reply was that the clock was not a good one—was, in fact, a very erratic and unreliable one. For that reason he kept it going in order that he might test how much it varied from his watch. This point having been arrived at, Richardson asked the witness in what part of the valise he kept the clock. "It was on the 'bum'" responded Orchard. "So you told us before," said Richardson. The spectators laughed but Orchard did not grasp the cause of their mirth. This story is funny, however, only on account of a popular idea that "bomb" is pronounced "bom." The fact is, and Webster will bear out the statement, the correct pronunciation of the word is "bum."

"Only This and Nothing More!"

Judge Hebbard is still flirting with the muse preparatory to espousing her in more generous fashion when his long expected volume of verse shall be published. Here are his latest lines of dalliance while in fantastical mood. They are entitled "An Interpretation":

Poe was a drunkard, don't you know,
But he wrote some lines about a crow,
On a bust of Pallas, as white as snow,
And the lines were written long ago.
'Twas all about Lenore;
The crow said "nevermore,"
The night a silence wore,
Lenore, lost Lenore, nevermore.
So he drank, and then he cried;
Then he died,
And the raven, just outside his chamber door,
Said "Lenore, lost Lenore, nevermore."

A Bill and a Boomerang

All Nevada is chortling over the recent appointment of Sam Davis to the Secretaryship of the State Publicity Bureau. His elevation created a merry row among sage brush statesmen and business men and the end of the previous and pertinent remarks is not in sight, although the aggressive ends of the tomahawks and bowie knives are affectedly concealed. Some weeks before the recent Carson Legislature adjourned certain Reno influential business interests conceived the artless idea of having the legislature set aside $6,000 to advertise the Silver State throughout the world; care was to be taken that the originators should have the distribution of the fund. Accordingly the bill was introduced and its care turned over to a representative. Fortune smiled, both houses were agreeable and the $6,000 looked like a ripe pippin ready for the picking, but—

Feeding a Joke to Sam Davis

On the eventful day of the bill's passage the Reno representative began to celebrate his victory rather early and fell asleep in the midst of the wine popping. Fate happened along, saw the dozing man and gave the whole proceedings a whimsical turn. Governor Sparks dropped into his office and found the bill among the day's output awaiting his signature. He signed it and slipped it into his pocket. On the street he bumped into Sam Davis and his face lightened. "Sam," he said, "here's a bill just passed to expend $6,000 through a State Publicity Bureau. It provides for a secretary but he gets no salary. No salary, mind. Now, Sam, I think I'll appoint you to the job; it'll be a joke on you." Now Sam Davis passed successfully that dreary period of monetary drouth in the sage brush state when the only dollars the anxious settlers ever saw were those locked in the cabinets of the Carson mine for exhibition purposes only, and the government had to place a guard about them to keep off the hungry and pop-eyed Nevadans. Accordingly Davis can see a dollar in a job where the fat and careless California politician couldn't glimpse a flush of color. "Six thousand dollars to be expended," repeated the editor. "Six thousand dollars and NO SALARY," was the reply. "Well, Governor," responded Davis, "its rubbing it in to ask a man to work for nothing during these union times, but I'll take a chance. Six thousand, you said?" "Yes, but remember the joke's on you." "All right, I'll take a chance and accept the appointment."

Stirred Up a Publicity Storm

Sam immediately jumped into his job. Within an hour he had wired all the leading papers in the state that the Governor had just appointed Sam Davis to the responsible position of secretary to the new State Bureau of Publicity. If he was looking for publicity he certainly got it. Instantly the "certain influential business men in Reno" set up a roar of protest that went thundering over the Nevada deserts and reverberating through the surrounding mountains. A curious outsider would have thought the state was rent and that six million dollars at least were in jeopardy. The various papers controlled by the interests pitched into the fray and the fight waxed furious. The Governor was charged with being weak, vacillating and imprudent in allowing himself to be bullied into giving the appointment to Sam Davis when certain sterling, strong principled and influential business men, pillars of the state, stood ready to see that the money was properly expended for the real benefits of the state. In the midst of this storm of charges and counter charges Davis said he'd resign the position and thereby give the Governor a chance to reconsider the appointment. He did; but the Governor promptly reappointed him.

Cashing in the Joke

The "certain influential citizens of Reno" are still bombarding Davis, but his position seems impregnable and he is energetically expending the $6,000, getting the state all the publicity possible in return. Salary? Well, the other day he served the State Treasury with a bill for $200 a month. It was disallowed of course. But that didn't feaze Davis. He promptly got out a writ of mandate. The Governor, mindful of the way Sam's salary is tied up in the courts, pleasantly wired him the other day: "How's the joke getting on?" "All right," was the cheerful reply, for Davis, recognizing the uncertainties of the law and its worrying delays, is prudently drawing $200 a month from the $6,000 at his disposal.

President Wheeler has announced officially his declination of the Presidency of the Boston Institute of Technology. "That's all"—for this season.

End of a $500,000 Task

This week I saw the last small package of charred currency, relics of the big fire, sent on to Washington to be passed upon by experts of the Redemption Division of the U. S. Treasury. The interesting work is practically wound up: it has been the most stupendous task in all the history of the department. Practically half a million dollars in new bills have been issued to those whose baked and charred bills passed the examiner. All of them passed through the hands of one woman, Mrs. A. E. Brown, who is ranked best burnt money expert in the world. A new stringent rule of the department is that at least three-fifths of the burnt bill must be submitted for examination but in San Francisco's case Treasurer Charles H. Treat ordered the examiner not to adhere too closely to the rule but

Melted Fortunes

Most of the bills submitted however were easily decipherable as they had been placed in safe deposit vaults or in private fire proof safes. The remains of such bills were simply a black or brown charred mass but the Treasury expert could pick them apart almost as easily as a paying teller handling crisp bills. The remaining ash could be distinctly made out in every detail unless it was bunglingly pressed and then it instantly became as much powder. Gold, silver and currency were occasionally submitted in a melted mass that no human intelligence could resolve into their proper values. Altogether it was a painstaking, worrying and vexatious job and the special agent of the Treasury Department here says he is heartily glad it is over. So are the San Franciscans who received $500,000 in crisp new bills for their charred wads and bits of fire relics.

Ruef's Heartfelt Lament

Now that Ruefites and Schmitzites are telling things on each other, the Average Citizen is beginning to wonder how he could have been so taken in. Among other surprises, it appears that Ruef's greed has been the limit according to his followers. During the Schmitz trial, one former adherent of the boss remarked that Ruef's testimony would be nearer the truth, according to his character, if he testified that instead of dividing the French restaurant fee he had informed his confederate that the restaurant men failed to come through. It seems to have been Ruef's plan to use money only when personal, political, diplomatic or disciplinary measures failed to move his appointees. This trait is further illustrated by an incident following Ruef's confession. In a voice that left no doubt as to the genuineness of his anguish, the boss told a lieutenant that his trial had already cost him $105,000 in hard coin. Moralists may be interested to know that at the time of this lament, the penitent's desk was piled high with letters and resolutions from Christian Endeavorers, Bands of Hope, Home Missions, Purity Brigades and graftologists, gushing fulsome jublations and praise for his moral regeneration.

Foreigners As Local Union Leaders

It is a fact worthy of comment that the two inflammatory speeches delivered at the carmen's meeting on Sunday were made by men of foreign birth—Andrew Furuseth and O. A. Tveitmoe. To Furuseth was given the task of organizing the pickets who have been impudently demanding that passengers on the cars give them their names, the avowed object being a boycott against the offenders. The strikers have so often violated the principles of personal liberty that this last impertinence seemed a mild method of badgering—infinitely milder than showers of bricks and volleys of obscenity. Furuseth is well qualified to organize a gang of pickets, having had much experience as head of the sailors' union, which depends on violence and intimidation to win its strikes.

Fanaticism Mixed With Unionism

With these two Scandinavians, neither of whom can more than talk intelligible English, as leaders, Americanism has but little chance. There is one thing that can be said in Furuseth's favor, however—he is looked upon as honest, and does not use his position as a means of advancing himself financially. He has refused to allow the sailors' union to raise his salary, which is $125 a month—a great contrast to Cornelius, who draws nearly $500 a month, while the strikers are struggling along on $7 a week. Furuseth has been offered a managerial position at a very large salary by one of the big shipping companies, but refused it, devoting all his time to the waterfront union work. When Furuseth sends a squad of union sailors out to slug non-union seamen he believes that he is doing right. He is a fanatic on unionism, looking upon any means of winning a strike as legitimate. But Tveitmoe—silence regarding him is the greatest charity.

Back to the Magazine Fold

"Jack" Wilson has just resigned the editorship of the "Pacific Monthly" of Portland because of ill health. He is suffering from nervous prostration and his doctor has ordered him to the seaside for salt water baths. Wilson has never been the same man since his extremely trying experiences here during the big conflagration. At that time he was editor of "The Argonaut" and as he expressed it "chucked the whole business to get away from that everlasting April 18th." With recovered health he expects to be back to his old vocation, writing for the eastern magazines.

Huntington Captures Another Line

Howard E. Huntington gives every token of becoming the colossus of electric railway systems in the west. County after county in the southland is falling under his dominion, the last being San Bernardino. Last week he was elected to the directorate of the San Bernardino Valley Traction Co. to succeed J. S. Wood. This shift makes it only too apparent that H. E. is in control and that a general shake up in the personnel of the directorate will follow. According to the slate given out George S. Patton will take the place of W. D. B. Brookings of Redlands and then young Huntington will step into the secretaryship. George M. Cooley, the vice-president, has already handed in his resignation. In all likelihood H. E. will himself assume the general management of the reorganized company.

Nobody Works But the Elephant

Huntington was the first of our California magnates to recognize the immense possibilities of electric roads as a field for investment, with the opening up of outside lands as a by-product. Very early in the game he began to invest, in the territory about Los Angeles, the twenty millions bequeathed him by his uncle; and now through the enormous increase in electric traction values and in his attendant land schemes he has immensely increased his big fortune. His field of operations throughout the state has expanded till his various systems undoubtedly cover the largest area controlled by any company on the continent. Certainly in the west the Key route system is the only one to approach his holdings in size and influence and the Key route is a baby in comparison. But the baby is growing. The Key route covers a particularly rich and promising territory and "Borax" Smith, the Havens and the other Oaklanders who cast their fortunes in that one-time threatened enterprise are happy in the fact that the "elephant is now the best worker in the corporation."

First All-Electric-Road to New York

Signs of electrification on all sides are plentifully besprinkling the air. Not only are the Oakland and Alameda ferry lines to be transformed into trolley systems but electric line feeders are to be built along the Southern Pacific system by Harriman. Harriman insists that electricity will oust steam power from the railroads at a very early date. His rival Gould of the Western Pacific is a step ahead of him in this particular for Gould is already installing an immense power plant in the Sierras by which he proposes to run his cars from Sacramento to a point in the eastern part of Nevada. In time of course this stretch will be increased. This California-Nevada section may be

Great Tangle in Political Wires

Very complicated is the local political situation, a condition to delight the master manipulator for out of the intricacies which confuse his opponents he adroitly moves the pawns reaching to his own triumph. The particular features of the present moment are the flirtings of the "Big Stick" with the labor leaders and the efforts of the Independence "Leg" to maintain its standing. Phelan is "not out for office," according to his insistent pronouncements, but he is energetically busy in seeking to become an arbiter of political events, a mayor-maker, as it were, in the Spreckels cabinet. Spreckels himself is in frequent conference with Casey, Furuseth and such leaders of the labor wings as are likely to prove serviceable to his designs in so-called "municipal reform," an elastic construction for handling the next mayor. The "Big Stick," having sported itself as the sceptre of municipal authority, is loath to relinquish its position and purposes making a struggle to hold fast. How Banker Rudolph is going to organize a pliable coalition out of his labor elements and splice it on the furnishings of Phelan, Dwyer, et al., passeth the human understanding. The Spreckels name, judging by passed political events, is not one to conjure with in successful politics or in the ranks of unionism. Attorney Dwyer, the official head of the local Independence League, is doubly occupied in advising Spreckels and in nursing the physical infirmities of the "Leg." In the latter calling he is having a particularly worrying time poring over the political pharmacopoeia in search of a remedy to maintain life in the expiring body. July 15 is the time limit set for filing the Independence party's petition. Signs are plentiful too that its leaders may be ambushed and scalped at the primaries. What a fearful embarrassment of explanations would ensue if in this preliminary skirmish of the campaign the organization should be captured and taken into the camp of its rivals.

Tinkering up the Republican Machine

Herrin and Crimmins are quietly maneuvering to get control of the crippled Republican machine. It goes without saying that they will have a representation to cut a figure in the forthcoming November parade.

During his brief visit to San Francisco, a successful magazine-writer and publisher will be glad to examine and comment upon manuscripts of amateur writers. Some vital defects are easily corrected. Many excellent stories are not read beyond the first paragraph. It is not necessary that you should reveal your identity. JAMES EDWARD MARSDEN,

The labor party is just now divided into several camps, each leader sensitively jealous of the other, and each one madly ambitious to become generalissimo with full authority to carry the union standard in the campaign. The regular parties are watching with keenest interest the shiftings of sentiment in the labor camp, ready to take instant advantage of any opportunity offered. The Democratic organization, under Chairman Hickey's guidance, is actively pushing the necessary work leading to an aggressive fall campaign.

The Man of the Hour

The efforts of the "Big Stick" to find a man who will pass muster in the mayor's chair is a snap compared with the gargantuan task imposed on the regular party leaders now in search of satisfactory candidates to head their tickets. The "Big Stick" has selfishly narrowed its choice so as to satisfy a dozen men, careful the while, however, not to arouse too much public protest by their choice. Their selection will be a serviceable man on whose shoulders they hope to step into a stronger position. The party leaders, on the other hand, must pick a man who will win votes under the

Automobile

You hear many people say that an automobile is a nice thing to have and all that, but costs too much to keep it up.

Maybe that's true—in many cases. But cost of upkeep depends largely on the kind of car.

We have had an opportunity to obtain definite data as to the Cost of Maintaining a Single-Cylinder Cadillac.

147 owners residing in almost every State who have kept accounts of their expenses covering gasoline, oil and repairs have made affidavits which we have on file, showing that their repairs (not including tires) have averaged

Less than $2.50 Per Month.

Their cars have been driven from one to four seasons, and as high as 30,000 miles.

The affidavits also show that the averages obtained have been about

19 Miles Per Gallon of Gasoline,

an average of less than one and one-third cents per mile per car or, on the basis of four passengers each, less than

One-third of a Cent Per Mile Per Passenger.

Remember these are not a few special cases, but averages of 147 owners. Furthermore, these records are not of automobiles in general, but single-cylinder CADILLACS only.

Most any make of automobile can show a good performance sometimes, but what interests you is what a car will do "as a rule."

When a dealer makes claims as to low cost of operating the cars he sells, ask him to prove them. We can prove ours.

There are over 15,000 single-cylinder Cadillacs "making good" all over the world.

Single-cylinder Cadillacs truly afford all there is in motoring—except the troubles.

Dealers are always glad to demonstrate.

Why he Reversed the Supreme Court

Attorney H. W. Hutton, ex-police commissioner, tells of a justice of the peace of this city who is not backward in expressing his opinion of the Supreme Court. Hutton says he does not care to give the name of the justice, for fear he might be prosecuted for lese majeste or contempt of court. According to the attorney, the justice made a ruling contrary to the opinion of the Supreme Court, and the lawyer most concerned called his attention to the fact that he failed to agree with California's most august judicial body. "I know I don't," said the justice, "but I often reverse the Supreme Court. You see, they can't agree among themselves, so why should I agree with any of them? Sometimes they go over the case in a body, then there's sure to be a dissenting opinion. Don't you worry a bit, young man, about my ruling. I reverse the Supreme Court about as often as that body reverses me."

Methods of the Walking Delegate

Some of the demands of labor unions would be ridiculous were not the results so serious to the people concerned. A typical incident is furnished by the agent of an Eastern firm that manufactures the cash carriers used in retail stores. It is the business of this agent to supervise the installation of these carriers in San Francisco, but his work has temporarily come to a halt because of the unreasonable demands of the unions. The men under him are specialists, experts in this work. A walking delegate came to the agent and told him that union steamfitters would have to be employed. The agent protested, saying that steamfitters could not do the work, which took long training. The delegate suggested that he employ the union men and let them work under the supervision of one of his experts. To this the agent objected, pointing out that not only would the inexperienced men be slow, but that he would be at the expense of maintaining a foreman expert for each gang of them. He suggested that his men be taken into the union. The walking delegate would not consent to this, saying that the union membership was full; besides, it was difficult to determine to just which union the experts should belong. At the same time, there was no difficulty in determining what sort of union men should replace the experts. The agent had another objection to offer to the plan. "How," he asked, "can you allow your union men to work under non-union foremen?" ### Hunting the Golden Fleece

Los Angeles is to the front with a "Woman's Mining Exchange." Let us trust that the name will prove a warning rather than an allurements to the curious sex for to patronize it means simply that they shall exchange their money for valueless mining stocks. The stock bought there may not be wholly paper when purchased but it certainly will prove valueless should they continue to hold it. Women's Mining Exchanges are pens where fatuous gullible ewes are shorn of their golden fleeces. They have been of this character since designing men and women conceived them. Indications of the kind of people who are handling this new venture are found in the quarrel now going on among the organizers. The successful control of a mining exchange demands a wide range of experience both in mines and finance. No sooner are the officers of this new exchange inducted into their duties than the secretary-treasurer orders the vice-president and general manager out of the place because she is "incompetent," a singular time to discover the defect. "A man" has been selected to fill the office but "only temporarily," according to the secretary-treasurer, who seems to be running things. In speaking of her successor the ousted general manager flings back this vinegar soaked shaft: "If he was any kind of a man, he would never have gone into a company composed entirely of women." This comment leaves "the only man in the business" in a rather, well, dubious condition regarding sex. Later she lightened the blow by remarking that, "although he is declared by the board to be the general manager, he couldn't even have a seat in the exchange—only women are entitled to seats." Now if some one would only bar the women from the seats—but happily lack of patronage will quickly do that; and the sheriff may nail on the door of the defunct exchange the same placard that was placed on the back of the exasperated ex-vice-president and general manager, "incompetent."

The Local Cement Situation

Property owners, who contemplate building, are inveighing against the "cement corner" as it is called, a combination which controls foreign cement shipped into the city. It is a well known fact that there are at least half a million barrels of cement scattered in the various waterfront ware houses. The actual cost to the owners was about $3.00 per barrel yet it is being held at all kinds of fancy figures. In fact the owners propose to take advantage of present local building conditions and to charge all the traffic will bear. No wonder the people here who contemplate building are loud in their complaints over the cement situation as they see it. But there is an easy and swift way to escape being mulcted by the managers of this "cement corner" and that is to deal with the local cement manufacturers. Local builders are rapidly awakening to the fact that they can get the best of cement at low prices from the Standard

Portland Cement Co. For five years this corporation has had a factory at Napa Junction with a capacity of 2500 barrels a day. So successful has its output proved that the company has been compelled to enlarge the establishment. In a few weeks it will be turning out 3,000 barrels a day. Nor does the rapidly growing demand for the company's cement stop here. At Davenport, twelve miles north of Santa Cruz, the company's factory has been turning out 6,000 barrels a day. They have been forced to add another unit of 6,000 barrels a day to fill their orders. What is the cause of such phenomenal success? Simply an excellent grade of cement furnished at low cost. The Standard Portland Cement Co. delivers its cement at $1.75 per barrel, f. o. b. at the works; to this price will be added the switching and freight charges, making about 18 cents additional per barrel. Against this is a rebate of 20 cents a barrel for all sacks returned at the company's expense. Accordingly the cement nets the local consumer about $1.72 per barrel, f. o. b., San Francisco. The company invites the most thorough going and critical tests that cement can be put to by competent chemists. Samples of such tests are preserved in the offices of the company; in some of them the cement has been steamed and boiled for eight hours and is as firm and solid as steel. So successful has the cement proved in all instances and so popular is it becoming that big additions are planned for most of the plants. A large plant is now being installed on Puget Sound. This policy will be pursued even though the price of cement be reduced in order to consume the vastly increased output of their many factories.

The Duke May Visit California

There is a palpitating flutter along the gilded high-ways, over the news that the Duke of the Abruzzi may visit California before returning to his ancestral halls. While in New York he has been regarded as the especial property of Mrs. Charles Alexander, whose house guest he has been. His excursions into New York drawing rooms are a sort of "personally conducted" tour by Mrs. Alexander. A rival hostess, with an ache in her temper over an ignored invitation, is quoted as saying "that one might fancy a Crocker arranging a railroad itinerary, but a social pilgrimage—never!" My informant tells me that we can scrape just such wonderful pea green color from the jealous utterances of any number of New York leaders who were anxious to annex the ducal glory of entertaining Abruzzi. Should the Duke journey to these parts he would probably be the natural heritage of the Crocker clan. Mrs. Will Crocker is not as keen on titles as most good Americans, having made a close hand study of the genus in the person of her own brother-in-law. But she would no doubt entertain the Duke just as handsomely if not as obsequiously as the hostess who has never had a first-name acquaintance with a prince. Of course Abruzzi is a title that has never lost its polish and it isn't often that we have an opportunity to entertain anything better than a moth eaten patch on royalty. Miss Jennie Crocker will surely entertain in his honor if he carries out his present intention of visiting us. Miss Crocker is considered a member of the Alexander household—a peripatetic member, as she prefers life out here.

Declined Society's Limelight

Society has suffered a cruel blow this week. It has been snubbed, slapped three times on the wrist as it were, and by an "actress lady" too! Fancy a woman who has earned wealth and fame behind the footlights daring to snub a woman whose pockets bulge and who has almost a generation of silk top hats behind her! A Burlingame leader, I am told, planned to entertain Maude Adams over Sunday, and Miss Adams refused the invitation. The hostess had not counted on a rebuff and had made arrangements for a luncheon at the club house. The near-hostess belongs to the common-or-garden-variety of society women who fancy that actresses are immeasurably flattered by their attentions and the refusal pricked under the thick rind of vanity and really hurt her pride. As Miss Adams has consistently refused to permit the anointed of Gotham to stroke her mane, it is small wonder that the local smart set have not been offered an opportunity to tangle it. Miss Adams has been living in seclusion at the Fairmont Hotel with her maid and private secretary. It is only when an actress scales the topmost peak of success that she needs a private secretary to mark her "footsteps in the sands of time." Miss Boynton is the name of the clever young woman who meets interviewers, answers letters, and shoos off stage struck girls who would like to cackle their ambitions into Miss Adams' busy ear. Miss Boynton comes of a distinguished Eastern family and is related to some of the "best people" out here. She is a cousin of the Coffins who have entertained in a most informal manner in her honor. Like Miss Adams she eschews society when it takes itself seriously.

Mrs. Kohl's One House Party

"Wanted: At Burlingame, Mrs. C. Frederick Kohl. Entertaining of any sort appreciated."

The foregoing might honestly appear in the "Help Wanted" column, for Blingum is decidedly in need of the animated and exuberant sort of help which Mrs. Kohl so freely gives. Mrs. Kohl is a young matron who practices the Gospel of Good Times and so when her friends heard that she was considering jaunting over to Europe from Washington instead of returning here this summer, a wail went up that shivered the tympanum of heaven. But Mr. Kohl has decided that he cannot leave the coast under present conditions so the blithe little lady will turn her toes this way and society is perking up at the very idea. The Kohls will go to Tahoe for July and as usual Mrs. Kohl will give just one house party—beginning on the day she arrives and ending on the day Idlewild is closed for the season.

Cupid Off to the Springs

Society insists on examining Emily Wilson's cardiac fluctuations with a stethoscope. There is a dim tradition that in her buxom days, an eminent physician, who can cure everything but the bald headed bacillus which flourishes on his own polished pate, was deeply attached to her. But the little mole hills of evidence which Mrs. Grundy gathered would not make a mountain and the impression went a glimmering. Last season a handsome young medico who makes a scientific specialty of the eye used to gaze so admiringly at her orbs that society was sure he would send the bill for "thorough examination" to Dan Cupid. He claimed most of her dances at the Greenways and that is considered sufficient evidence for a conviction of sentiment. The past grand masters of the Know All society insisted that the engagement would be announced at Charlotte Wilson's marriage to George Cadwalader but they had to swallow their prognostications with the wedding breakfast for the announcement was not forthcoming. And now the official score keepers for the tournament of hearts, tell me that nothing short of a capital operation on their feelings will unite this young couple. The friendship that tripped merrily to the two step and warmed its heels in palm-screened corners of smart ball rooms is as contrary minded as the climate—instead of registering balmy weather during the summer it has dropped off to the temperature of a Nesselrode pudding and the matchmakers can no longer warm their hands over the possibility of an engagement announcement.

Start "Foot and Walker" Corporation

A friend who is in Yosemite Valley writes me that Martha and Margaret Calhoun, the two eldest daughters of Patrick Calhoun, are the most strenuous "climbers" in the valley. The Yosemite climbers' veins do not run pink tea like the urban variety of climber and the sobriquet spells distinction when one is toiling up mountain heights instead of scaling social summits. The Calhoun girls have a capacity for walking that is more than pro-union in its endurance. They could outwalk the most confirmed commuter judging from the "stunts" they have been doing in the valley.

Break in Berkeley Society

Berkeley matrons are anxiously questioning a bit of rumor which has been going the rounds these last few days. Some one has knowingly said that Mrs. F. E. Farrington, the prominent society leader in University circles, does not intend to return to Berkeley when Professor Farrington's year's leave of absence has expired. At present the Farringtons are in Paris and the question of their future plans must remain unanswered. Certain it is that much of Berkeley's present social whirl must be laid to Mrs. Farrington's account. She descended about three years ago to find Berkeley's Faculty in a state of social lethargy—and started the din of the tea-cups and its various accompaniments. Unfortunately it was not all smooth sailing for Mrs. Farrington. She built a beautiful home, entertained at dinners, musicales, teas, and when her guests had dined, and listened and smilingly sipped the social beverage, they ranged themselves in two factions, so to speak, pro Mrs. Farrington and anti Mrs. Farrington. The anti faction were the moss barks who were as firmly rooted in conventionality as the live oaks are in the campus. They would rather have had her break the ten commandments than bend their pet convention that the wives of the college professors should hold themselves aloof from all undergraduate affairs. The pro faction not only applauded her as a charming hostess and recognized the pleasure and interest she brought into the lives of the college students—but they also believed themselves fortunate to be counted among Mrs. Farrington's friends. And now, in view of her untiring energy and activity for others, they ask if they have proven themselves so ungrateful that the attractions of the western college town will pale before the more pleasant social life of an Eastern University. If the Farringtons sell their unique home in Berkeley and seek other fields of learning, Mrs. Farrington's departure will be sincerely regretted by many different coteries of women in the classic suburb.

Californians In the English Limelight

A friend in London who is putting up at the Berkeley Hotel writes me that the Walter McCreerys are staying there. Mrs. McCreery, my correspondent says, really has the "fatal gift of beauty" in a marked degree, the sort of beauty that presages sentimental cataclysms. She is a target for admiring attention wherever she moves and her husband basks in the sunshine of the admiration she inspires. My friend says that we would not recognize the indifferent, cynical Walter McCreery in the loverlike husband of the English beauty. Mrs. Peter Martin was dining in the same hotel the other night and these two beautiful women were conspicuously lorngetted. From the enthusiastic regard in which Mrs. Peter is held in London I take it, we were not properly worshipful of her charms in San Francisco. It may be that because pretty girls grow as thick as weeds out here, Venus herself would not take us off our pumps.

Mrs. Peter Martin and the Duchess

But London is not so apathetic on the subject of Mrs. Martin's loveliness and in spite of the fact that she has not been press agented into the limelight, the photographers who are alert for the pictures of "new beauties" are importuning her to sit for them. England's contempt for "trade" does not extend to disdaining royalties on one's photographs and a great many English society women pocket a pretty penny in this wise. My friend writes that she did not see Mrs. Martin's picture displayed in any of the shop windows, but in one place she found a very good snap shot of the Duchess of Marlborough and the fair Mrs. Peter. It is through the friendship of the young American duchess that Mrs. Martin has achieved such prominence. These two young women are constantly together and as a result Mrs. Martin has been put through the social separator and has come out pure cream leaving less fortunate Americans to dabble in the skim milk society.

Engagement "Lavender Tea"

Mrs. G. Alexander Wright and the Misses Wright of Palo Alto were hostesses last Wednesday afternoon at a "Lavender Tea" in the Red room at the Fairmont Hotel. Thirty guests enjoyed the dainty menu and interesting afternoon. A professional orchestra of young ladies was in attendance. At a given signal each lady drew her individual bouquet which was found to contain a dainty souvenir announcing the engagement of Miss Ethel E. C. Wright to Allen H. Peck, M. D. Miss Ethel Wright is one of the daughters of Mr. and Mrs. G. Alexander Wright, well known in San Francisco and the trans-bay cities. The Wrights resided in Alameda for many years but recently removed to Palo Alto. Miss Ethel is a graduate of the University of California, having taken her college degree of Bachelor of Letters at the last May commencement. Dr. Peck is now practicing his profession in Southern California. The wedding will take place in the early autumn.

"Golf Week" at Del Monte

"Golf Week" at Del Monte begins on Monday, July 1, and lasts all the week. The programme includes handicap contests for the Del Monte Cup for men and for the Del Monte Cup for women, mixed Foursomes and Consolation Handicaps. The final round in the first annual competition for the cup presented by Walter S. Martin for women golfers will be held at the links of the Burlingame Country Club on July Fourth. The trophy will become the permanent possession of the lady who first wins three annual victories. Luncheon, with music, will be served at the Burlingame Country Club house on that day. After luncheon there will be a putting contest for ladies. The men will amuse themselves in the morning with an eighteen-hole contest against Colonel Bogie. The Walter S. Martin Cup for women golfers is open to members of any golf club and takes the place of the trophy presented by Mrs. William H. Crocker and of the Prince Poniatowski Cup, both of which were won by Mrs. R. Gilman Brown, the first champion of the California Women Golfers' Association. The Mrs. William H. Crocker Cup was won last year by Mrs. Brown and served handsomely to start her new collection of golf trophies, her first collection having been destroyed in the big fire. As R. Gilman Brown and Mrs. Brown are now in England, she will miss her chance of scoring a victory on the Walter S. Martin cup this year.

Likely Winners at Burlingame

Miss Florence Whittell, one of the strongest women golfers of the Burlingame Country Club, is away. If Mrs. Walter S. Martin is on hand and in good form, the first victory will almost certainly be hers, for she is, with the exception of Mrs. R. G. Brown, the strongest golfer of her sex in Northern California, and would give Mrs. Edmund T. Perkins (formerly Mrs. Jean Bowers of Garvanza and woman champion of the Southern California Golf Association), the 1907 champion of the California Women Golfers' Association, a close rub. Mrs. Perkins beat Mrs. H. H. Sherwood, the strongest player of the Claremont Country Club, in the championship competition at Los Angeles this year, but has never defeated Mrs. R. G. Brown, Mrs. W. S. Martin, Miss Florence Whittell or any of the strongest women players of Northern California. Players from the two sections of the state rarely meet in contests.

Mrs. Heney Guest at Luncheon

Mrs. Francis J. Heney was the guest of honor last Monday at an elaborate luncheon given by Mrs. Linda H. Bryan at her home, 2422 Buchanan street. Fourteen sat down at a large round table which was decorated with American beauty roses. Besides the hostess and Mrs. Heney, those at the table were: Mrs. General Frederick Funston, Mrs. William Seson, Mrs. Walter Remington Quick, Mrs. I. Lowenberg, Mrs. Julian Sontag, Mrs. Edward H. Hamilton, Mrs. Hiram Johnson, Mrs. Florence Porter Pfingst, Mrs. Charles Dunphy, Mrs. M. A. Huntington, Mrs. Inez Shorb White and Mrs. Charles F. Fee.

scapes, but handled in a masterful way to allure and delight the attention. One is a group of fantastic oaks, gnarled, interlocked, and lost in an atmosphere suggestive of mystery, enchantment and weird surroundings; the other is a darling bit of nature caught in a fitful mood, with the dying light of day slipping fondly off the lonely cluster of silent trees. Both pictures are typical of Cadenasso in his most sensitive moments and are excellent manifestations of his sympathy with nature in her varying moods.

Doings at Del Monte

Miss Phelan, accompanied by Miss Sullivan of San Mateo and Miss Mullen, paid a visit to Del Monte last week, touring thither in a 40-horsepower Mercedes. * * * Wickham Havens and Mrs. Havens, in a 45-horsepower Pierce-Arrow Runabout, arrived at Del Monte last Friday, returning home on Sunday. * * * J. B. Coryell of Menlo Park with Mrs. Coryell and children, motored to Del Monte last week. * * * Mrs. D. S. Jordan, Knight Jordan and Prof. J. S. Kellogg of Stanford University lunched at Del Monte one day last week as the guests of Mr. and Mrs. R. M. Loeser. Mrs. Foster, Miss Foster and Prof. R. E. Alardice were also at the table. * * * The fourth competition of the Ladies' Continuous Handicap Golf Tournament on the Del Monte Links was held last Saturday. Six ladies took part, the winner being Mrs. R. M. Loeser, who, with a handicap of 12 strokes, beat Miss Cornelia W. Armsby, playing from scratch, by a single stroke. The other ladies who played were Miss E. A. W. Morgan, Mrs. H. R. Warner, Miss Warner and Miss Foster. The silver pitcher presented by the Pacific Improvement Company to the winner of this tournament has now four names inscribed on it—those of Miss E. A. W. Morgan, Mrs. H. R. Warner, Miss Cornelia W. Armsby and Mrs. R. M. Loeser.

SULTAN BATHS READY TO OPEN

Nothing delights the typical San Franciscan more than to be well groomed and nothing to surpass the baths of the exquisites in this line have ever been established here that will compare with the style and equipments of the new Sultan Baths, now making ready for formal opening on next Wednesday, July 3. The establishment is a bathing idea on a magnificent scale, with every conceivable luxury and every convenience to suit the taste of the most fastidious. The seven floors of the carefully planned building are divided into a number of bath rooms of all kinds, lounging rooms, special service rooms for those desiring physician's baths with the attendant medical treatment, dining rooms, safes and all the sleeping accommodations of a first class hotel. But baths are the specialty of this new establishment and no place of its kind in America ever offered such a variety of them on such a complete and finished scale. There are Turkish and Russian baths of all orders and descriptions, electric light baths, ordinary baths in marble rooms, fresh ocean water plunges, hot rooms, steam rooms, shampoo rooms, and an assortment of showers, sprays and plunges that will amaze the novice. In short everything that can be imagined in the bathing line will be found there in its perfection. Go and see the place for yourself. It will be open to visitors next Tuesday and Wednesday between 10 A. M. and 6 P. M.

Alcazar Stock

When the annals of the stage in San Francisco come to be written—and we have plenty of alluring material here for a Dr. Doran or a Percy Fitzgerald—the historian must make a particular and painstaking study of “Alcazar Stock.” Not only is the Alcazar stock company known all over this country as one of the few stock organizations outside of New York which it is a calculable distinction to belong to, but it is also respected on Broadway as the dramatic school in which some of the cleverest mummies in America have been trained. The Alcazar has traditions which no conflagration could blot out and it is pleasant to reflect that its management is conscientiously living up to them in the new playhouse out on Sutter street. It would be disingenuous to say that this present stock company is the best the Alcazar has ever had; O’Farrell street saw some remarkable aggregations of capable players gathered in the little old furnished Moroccan theatre and it is no disparagement that they sometimes made greater demands on critical superlatives than are warranted at present. Nevertheless the actors and actresses who make up the cast of “Miss Leffingwell’s Boots” can hold a candle that need not sputter into an emerald flame of envy at the recollection of bygone days. It is a well-balanced company not without its moments of brilliance and in such an offering as the latest farce comedy from the virile pen of Augustus Thomas it is at its very best. Laura Lang is a leading woman of rather large but decidedly attractive charms. She lacks the power to distinguish the lights and shades of a delicately molded character, but in the leading role of the conventional comedy her amiable beauty and her careful reading produce a decidedly pleasant effect. Miss Lang is not endowed with extraordinary histrionic gifts but she will never challenge severe criticism. Daisy Lovering is an actress for whom a brighter future may be prophesied. She is able to “see” a character part and she unhesitatingly sacrifices comfort and appearances to the varying exigencies of the week. Miss Lovering maintains the utmost cheerfulness in the presence of ugly makeups, a most encouraging trait in a young woman who joins it to the capability Miss Lovering shows of lifting a seemingly insignificant part into laugh-provoking prominence. Louise Brownell, it would appear, is still wrestling with the technical difficulties of her craft; but she seems to be conquering them womanfully and in the elementary matters of dress and carriage she is already graduated—and it must be admitted that these are elements some actresses never entirely master. Adele Belgarde and Nera Rosa occupied definite positions in Alcazar stock long before the earthquake, so they need not be characterized now. Bertram Lytell is not one of the best leading men the Alcazar has known, but he is probably one of the youngest and most seriously inclined; and to serious-minded youth too much charity cannot be extended, especially when, as in the present case, there is a gratifying lack of self-consciousness. To be a leading man without conceit is something of a feat and Mr. Lytell accomplishes it, thereby increasing the promise of histrionic qualities which are yet undeveloped. The other men—Byers, Maher and in a lesser degree Glendenning—belong to the youngest of the Alcazar memories; they played in the old theatre, a fact which seems somewhat historical already, and they are worthy to be remembered by special mention when some Dr. Doran writes those dramatic annals with which we started out. Take it all in all the present company is fully capable of continuing the splendid traditions that surround “Alcazar Stock.”

—Edward F. O’Day.

Ideas for the New Orpheum

Morris Meyerfeld, Jr., President of the Orpheum Circuit Co., is now in Germany. During his European tour he has visited the chief continental and English theatres and has booked quite a number of splendid vaudeville attractions for his Circuit. In a cablegram received from him, yesterday, from Kissingen, Germany, by Manager John Morrissey, Mr. Meyerfeld gives most positive denial to the rumor that he intends to resign the presidency of the Orpheum Circuit Co., and further states that he never at any time entertained such an idea. Mr. Meyerfeld will return in plenty of time for the opening of the Orpheum, Oakland. He will find much to engage his attention on his arrival here, and will particularly devote himself to matters pertaining to the erection of the downtown Orpheum on O’Farrell St. This place will be the most superb and complete vaudeville theatre in America, and will possess all the most modern improvements of the best European theatres.

Last Week of Maude Adams in Repertoire

Positively the final local appearances of Maude Adams will begin next Monday night at the Van Ness Theatre, when she will be seen in the most distinguished of all her stage creations, L’Aiglon. On Saturday afternoon and Saturday evening of the coming week Miss Adams will give two farewell performances of Peter Pan. These will constitute the last glimpses for a year to come of the famous little actress who braved the car strike and the telephone strike that she might keep her word with her San Francisco public and give it, as she promised on her previous visit, the greatest of her stage successes. It was Rostand’s L’Aiglon that Miss Adams principally had in mind when the idea first came to her of giving a repertoire in San Francisco. Seven years have past since she last acted the part. Then, in not any to good health, she scored the most notable achievement of her artistic career. The same scenery, costumes, and, as far as possible the same cast, employed for the New York production, have been obtained for the present L’Aiglon revival. Seven years devoted in good part to a deeper study of a role fascinating to Miss Adams, will naturally result in a finer assumption of the part. Mr. Gustav Von Seyffertitz, formerly with Conried at the Irving Place Theatre, New York, has been engaged as special stage director for this L’Aiglon performance.

Au Revoir of the Alcazar Stock Company

This coming week at the New Alcazar Theatre will be the last for some time in which the popular leading people Bertram Lytell and Miss Laura Lang will appear. Their farewell appearance will be in George H. Broadhurst's very laughable comedy entitled "A Fool and His Money." The title of the play gives an indication of the temperament of the leading character. This person is Percy Merrill, the son of a millionaire, who has been brought up by an indulgent mother to get the best out of life with the least possible effort. He is encouraged in his spending proclivities and wastes a small sized fortune every day much to the worryment of his rich father. A number of society vultures live off him and it is not until the coming of a girl named Eleanor Ashton on the scene that Percy Merrill realizes that he is making a fool of himself with his money. The girl stimulates him to some concerted effort, and brings about his reformation. Bertram Lytell plays the fool, Percy Merrill, and Miss Lang takes care of the part of Eleanor Ashton. The comedy roles are in the hands of Ernest Glendenning, Johnny Maher and Miss Lovering. Miss Adele Belgard is cast as Mrs. Curson and Miss Brownell as Celeste Faure. Following out their policy of securing the best possible productions for the summer season the management has secured the services of those eminent stock stars, Mr. Herbert Kelcey and Miss Effie Shannon, who will appear in a series of New York successes commencing July 8th. Among their offerings will be "Lord and Master," "The Moth and the Flame" and "Taps." The sale of seats for their opening production will commence on Monday July 1st.

Farce at the Novelty

From romantic drama to farce will be the lightning change of the Frawley Company at the Novelty Theatre this Sunday afternoon when "The Private Secretary," one of the funniest of stage offerings, will be inaugurated for a week's run. Caught in the web of others' deceit, meek-mannered Robert Spaulding, a bashful country curate whose most worldly thoughts never stray beyond his "goloshes" and his simple "goods and chattels," is led through three wild, wierd, bewildering days to his own great confusion and others' merriment. About him surge the plot and counterplot of Mr. Cattermole, the irascible old rounder who is determined that his nephew shall sow a goodly crop of wild oats in his youth; the studious nephew, who is making a heroic but unsuccessful effort to please his uncle; an old maid, devoted to spiritualism; a tailor with social ambitions and many other victims of their combined deceit and entanglement. H. G. Lonsdale, late of the Nat Goodwin forces, has been especially engaged for the title role, in which he achieved a great London success. Walter Craven could find no more congenial character than that of Cattermole while Henry Mortimer will be perfectly at home as the nephew. The full strength of the Frawley Company will be drawn upon for the rest of the cast and a special matinee will be given next Thursday, the fourth of July. Mr. Frawley's next offering will be "In Bondage," a powerful melodrama by Mrs. T. P. O'Connor. This will be its first stage production.

"Let's not stand on ceremony, little girl! We are going to be comrades, I take it. You just go in and announce that Jousson has arrived," replied "Reliable," chucking the young lady condescendingly under the chin.

"Mamma—Jousson—M. Jousson has come," said Louise excitedly and with some embarrassment, as she opened the door of the parlor.

Fru Bykvist had, it is true, traveled through a few large cities, where she had seen head waiters and lackeys in plenty, whose appearance fully equalled that of any judge or counselor at law. When, however, "Reliable," alias Jousson, made her a formal obeisance in her own hall, she lost her equanimity altogether, held out her plump hand, and stammered politely: "I bid you welcome, M. Jousson—I mean Jousson. I trust you will like our simple home—our home—I mean."

"Thank you, milady, thank you. When once I understand my duties, I——"

"Yes, indeed—well—that is—yes, my husband and myself are not at all hard to please. Everything will be all right, if you will begin at once by doing everything just the way it is done in a really aristocratic house. As to your room——"

Miss Louise kept pulling her mother's sleeve so persistently that Fru Bykvist at last followed her into the dining room.

"Mamma, that little closet behind the office is impossible. We must let him have the room next to papa's."

"I'm afraid you are right. I didn't expect him to be so distinguished looking. Did you hear him address me as milady? That will be the finish of your Aunt Cederlund, and of the Browall set."

It cannot be denied that Miss Emmy, as well as Bykvist, Sr., himself, also felt somewhat oppressed when they first set eyes on Jousson. The only one who was not over-awed was the son of the house. He was a child of the modern era, vice-president of several associations, and not so easily dazed.

"These barrels must be taken to the loft before noon," was his short and sharp order, when Jousson accidentally passed by the office door.

"Very well, sir," answered Jousson politely, uncovering his head.

At the end of an hour he returned. "Sir?"

"What is it?"

"The barrels have been attended to."

"All right."

"The man who has moved them wants a dollar."

Now this did overwhelm young Bykvist, great, big strong fellow though he was. He gazed in awed surprise at his father's servant, and in some embarrassment paid him a dollar and a silver quarter besides. "Many thanks, sir!"

At the approach of the dinner hour, which had been postponed from two o'clock to half past five, for the sake of appearances, the entire family happened to be assembled in the parlor adjoining the dining room.

"Go to your rooms, girls, and you, John, step into the office, so that Jousson may have a chance to announce dinner."

"But, Martha, my dear, why cannot we simply walk into the dining-room? I'm hungry as a bear," said Father Bykvist plaintively.

"John, what are you paying five hundred a year for, if you want to sit down to dinner by the clock, like a cobbler?"

When Jousson returned from the girl's rooms, he informed Fru Bykvist with a bow that the young ladies were not yet dressed.

"Were you taking a bath, girls?" asked their mother, when both promptly entered the dining room.

"No indeed—why do you ask?"

"Jousson said—hmm." The solution suddenly dawned upon Fru Bykvist. Jousson was evidently accustomed to see the ladies dressed for dinner. She almost withered with mortification.

At table, the family looked at each other, ate, chewed, and kept silence. Eleven years of baronial references crushed the small home circle, generally so bright and cheerful, with a heavy and almost annihilating weight. They were so terribly afraid of committing some dreadful mistake!

"I beg your pardon, milady, but I have not yet been entrusted with the key to the wine cellar. Perhaps the maid is to serve the wine to-day?"

Fru Bykvist rang the bell. She was ready to drop under the table. "Bring up some claret, Christina."

"Both bottles, or will one of them do?" answered the maid.

Fru Bykvist felt like crying. Meanwhile Jousson poured the wine with a pained expression in his noble features, as if the grape juice were his own life blood. "I humbly beg your pardon, milady; the temperature of this wine is all wrong. But it shall not happen again."

The table service was indeed admirable of its kind. Hardly had the cakes and preserves been discussed, when Jousson placed a lighted taper before each of the two gentlemen.

"What, is he going to do now, mamma?" whispered Emmy, brimful of respectful curiosity.

"I have no idea, child."

"Presumably, we are to smoke," Bykvist, Jr., informed his sister, for he had seen a little more of the world than the rest of his family.

This proved to be the case. Fortunately there was a box of cigarettes in Father Bykvist's room, else there would have been another source of mortification. When the family at last arose, the joys of the table were found to have consumed exactly an hour and three-quarters. The maid Christina had usually managed to supply their needs in considerably less time.

Ostentatiously, though noiselessly, Jousson threw open the folding doors to the parlor and withdrew humbly behind the sideboard, where he stationed himself like a show horse on parade. They all felt that something was expected of them, without knowing what to do. Bykvist, Sr., politely offered his arm to his wife, and solemnly led her into the parlor, fondly hoping that he was living up to Jousson's expectations.

When coffee had been served, the old man invited a few friends over the telephone to a small impromptu card party—just enough to fill two tables, for there was a dearth of "swell" gentlemen in Strandholm.

"He is going to introduce us to the new father-in-law," said the invited guests. When they arrived and entered the parlor, they did not find any father-in-law, however. What they did see, through the door leading into the room of the master of the house, was a stately old gentleman, who was arranging the card tables with serious dignity.

"The new relative is making himself at home," whispered the guests as they nudged each other. "He does look confoundedly aristocratic."

As they came into the room to draw lots for their places at the tables, the strange gentleman busied himself unconcernedly at the sideboard with a tray of punch glasses, as if the company did not interest him in the least. All the guests stopped at the door, looking reproachfully at Bykvist, and asked him in a half whisper: "Introduce us—why don't you?"

"Some more soda water, Jousson!" ordered Bykvist briskly; and as the butler walked off, and the others gazed at the host in speechless surprise, he added nonchalantly: "That's the new manservant I have engaged. Those confounded servant girls have almost killed me with their slovenliness."

Everything went off well, until the very strong and expensive cognac took its effect, and master-tanner Barkhom began to use some more forceful than elegant language over his bad luck at cards. At the uncouth words Jousson shuddered as at a serpent's bite, and looked so imploringly at his master that they all felt ashamed of themselves.

At supper the doctor waxed wroth when the attentive Jousson placed three clean forks beside him, having seen him indiscriminately thrust the same fork he was using to eat with into all the side dishes and preserve jars upon the table, in deference to a time-honored custom of the Simple Life.

Meanwhile, poor Christina sat in the kitchen shedding bitter tears, because she was no longer entrusted with waiting on the table.

Fru Bykvist's face fell when Jousson asked her for the finger bowls. And when the beer made its appearance in crystal pitchers, so that it was impossible to distinguish the brew, the railroad inspector said point-blank: "Look here, Bykvist, what do you mean by all this tomfoolery?"

None of the guests enjoyed themselves at the Bykvist's upon that occasion as they were in the habit of doing; although certainly no one could find fault with the service. On the following day, Jousson, alias "Reliable," alias Bykvist's father-in-law, took his departure by the noonday train, with a fair sum in his pocket to indemnify him for the position he had lost. In the train he happened to meet an old friend of his, who filled the position of major-domo on an estate adjacent to the baronial castle where Jousson had served for eleven years. To him the erstwhile Bykvist butler confided his recent experiences, concluding his tale with the words:

"They were good, simple-minded, generous people, although unhappily without any education whatsoever. But if I had remained, no doubt I would have gradually succeeded in teaching them manners."

The Story of California Big Trees

To those who wish to get an excellent idea of California's famous big trees, their origin, nature, characteristics and the story of the several groves, I recommend Galen Clark's little booklet just published. Few men know more about this rare old denizen of California than does this pioneer in Sierra forest life. His own career is indissolubly bound up with the history of the big trees of this state. Clark is the discoverer of the Mariposa grove and was for many years the guardian of the Yosemite Valley, from which point he frequently visited and studied all the groves in that vicinity. For more than one-half of his 94 years he has lived among them. No layman is more familiar with the Sierras, their fauna, flora and geological formation than is this sterling old mountaineer. His little booklet of 104 pages contains the very pith and fibre of all that can be said about the big trees of California. For sale by Galen Clark, publisher, Yosemite, and by all newsdealers; price, cloth $1.00; paper 50 cents.

Austin's Sexology

The quotation from Aristotle printed on the title page of Dr. Austin's "Talk with Maid, Wife and Mother: "To say what should be said, to say only what should be said, and to say it as it should be said," fairly describes the scope and contents of the publication. It is not designed for the enlightenment of morbidly curious children, and should be kept out of their hands, but matrons and those who have reached an age and development to regard marriage seriously, and as something more than an accasion for a trousseau and an endless succession of special entertainments it is doubtful if anything better is to be had. Unlike the majority of the books on sexology, Dr. Austin has not exaggerated the importance of one set of organs above all the others, nor is his volume simply a thinly disguised tout for some special course of treatment or the sale of patent medicines. Naturally, this is a book for the private library, not the parlor center table. Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

"Raymond Benson at Krampton"

As a rule, books dealing with the life of boys attending schools where they are removed from the immediate supervision of their parents are not to be commended. The tendency of writers is to make the most of lawlessness disguised as the natural exuberance of youth, entirely forgetting that boys of sixteen and upward are on the verge of manhood and quite old enough to develop at least in embryo, some of the stern virtues that good citizenship demands. In this respect Clarence B. Burleigh's "Raymond Benson at Krampton" is somewhat out of the rut. School fraternities are seen at their best in Krampton, where the Literii and Socii are about evenly divided and except the business meetings, attended by both, all are welcome to take part in debates and discussions. There was a third and very secret organization, "The Brotherhood of the Endless Chain," whose hair-raising initiation ceremonies and elaborate paraphernalia will appeal to any young lover of the mysterious, but what was its object and how the programme was carried out it is quite too good to give away here. The Krampton boys are decidedly better company than the so-called students of most of the private schools as set forth in juveniles. Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

TO THE PUBLIC: This is to certify that Dr. Wong Him has cured me of lung and stomach trouble, from which I had suffered for many years. I tried many doctors, but they failed to cure me. I consulted Dr. Wong Him, and after taking his Herb Medicine for six months am now permanently cured. I wish to recommend him to the public as an efficient and skillful physician.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 19, 1907.

TO THE PUBLIC: I had a very severe case of Throat Trouble and general breakdown. Did not sleep or eat for eight days. After trying every remedy I heard of without success, I called on Dr. Wong Him, 1268 O'Farrell street, who by feeling my pulse correctly diagnosed my case. His remedies gave me immediate relief. Cannot say too much in favor of his teas.

The Two Kinds of Labor

Every little while some learned doctor of the science of political economy, moved by a sense of the importance of keeping the paper by which he is employed in touch with workingmen, takes occasion to remind the lamentably benighted that organized labor is an established fact which must not be ignored. This reminder is usually accompanied by certain impressive platitudes respecting the dependence of capital on labor, the rights of labor and the duties of employers. Unfortunately the average learned doctor with strong convictions on the subject of the rights of organized labor is lamentably unconscious of the rights of unorganized labor. While he abounds in sneers for such men as are loath to concede the overwhelming majesty of unionism, he makes of himself a superb target for ridicule by clearly betraying the narrowness of his conceptions and hugging to himself an assumption that is one of the most curious facts in the history of human error. The rash and absurd assumption that in all differences between employers and employees the rights of labor are entirely and exclusively the rights of union labor, lies at the root of most of the popular fallacies on the subject of industrial economy. The Constitution of this country does not differentiate unorganized from organized labor. Under our laws the rights of a union man are not more precious than those of a non-union man. Nay, when a strike occurs it is usually the case that the rights of non-union men are the rights for the protection of which the operation of those laws are invoked. The Constitution is not favorable to the growth of trades-unions. Indeed the principles of our government are distinctly hostile to the sentiments that animate unionism. It is one of the chief sentiments of unionism that a man who sells his labor without first taking out a card in a union is an undesirable citizen, that it is proper to brand him as a scab and legitimate to cause him to be despised. As a matter of fact that man is a better citizen than the average union man who insists that his union card vests him with privileges and rights greater than those guaranteed by the Constitution. Organized labor is unquestionably a fact that must not be ignored, but so too, is unorganized labor. To ignore unorganized labor, or rather to treat it as though it has no rights that organized labor is bound to respect, is in our opinion unpatriotic and contemptible.

The Evils of Unionism

The relations of employer and employed have existed since civilization began, and during many centuries there have been labor unions, but it does not follow that they are inevitable or essential. It is not difficult to conceive an ideal situation in which unions would be unnecessary and entirely undesired. Nor is it unreasonable to hope that some day public sentiment will cease to tolerate the evils and abuses of labor unions and at the same time compel a satisfactory adjustment of the relations of employer and employed. Meanwhile labor unions though founded on principles the soundness of which cannot be gainsaid, are maintained for the furtherance of purposes that defy the fundamental principles of political economy. This being the case, unless they can bring into their ranks a large majority of the men who have labor to sell they cannot succeed without injustice. Theoretically the achievement of the purpose of unionism is feasible, but in practice we see that unionism must depend on force for triumph. The boycott is seldom a success when not conducted with violence. It is seldom a success because non-union labor is always available. Intimidation is the principal weapon employed to secure recognition of the claims of organized labor, and intimidation is a crime. This is a fact that should not be ignored by those who sympathize with labor unions. We could easily sympathize with labor unions if at the same time we could be zealous for the protection of the rights of unorganized labor, rights that are prejudicial to the organized. We realize that a man has a right to quit work when he does not receive sufficient pay, but we also realize that another man has a right to take the job and that he is entitled to the protection of the law while engaged in earning the price of his labor. We do not feel that the latter is undeserving of sympathy because of his disinclination to join a union. The manner in which unions are conducted by selfish and avaricious foreigners of socialistic proclivities does not render them inviting to the average intelligent American workingman. It is a matter of common knowledge that many intelligent workingmen in union ranks are not in congenial company. It is not profitable for them to have their superiority of skill rendered negligible by rules that are advantageous principally to the incompetent; nor is it pleasant for them to be subject to the whims and caprices of anarchistic leaders. It may be seriously doubted whether trades-unions are beneficial to workingmen in a country where public sentiment is intolerant of the tyranny of capital. It may be seriously doubted whether strikes on the whole have done good. It would surely require a vast amount of good to offset the losses and suffering they have caused. They may have checked some tendency to oppression on the part of capital in isolated cases, they may have taught the holder of money not to claim too much of the profits of industry, but they have destroyed the peace and prosperity of whole communities, they have caused hard times, and they have rendered many families miserable.

What Is Crime In San Francisco?

The Century Dictionary defines crime as "an offense punishable by law." Now, that definition may pass current in the effete East where the Century Dictionary was compiled, but we don't recognize any such standard of measure in this wide-awake and up-to-date metropolis of the Pacific Coast. What the law may prohibit or command may serve as a guide in the older and more slow-going communities, but not here. In San Francisco a new and more modern system has come into vogue. Here the whole question of crime is greatly simplified. In San Francisco, crime may be defined as "an act which displeases the 'Big Stick.'" Although a man may violate the law, although he may transgress all the mandates of the Penal Code, yet if he shall thereafter enlist under the banner of the "Big Stick" and yield unflinching obedience to its authority, his sins are immediately washed away and he stands purified before the world. On the other hand, though he may lead an exemplary life, as measured by the standards prevailing in older communities, although he strictly comply with all the laws prescribed for the conduct of men, and though he may carefully refrain from violating any of the penal injunctions of the state, nevertheless, if by any act he incur the displeasure of the "Big Stick," that act immediately becomes a crime. In illustration of the principle last enunciated, may be cited the cases of two young attorneys of this city recently indicted by the "Big Stick's" Grand Jury. Both of these young men stand high in the community, are of unquestioned integrity, and by dint of energy and ambition have moved forward to a leading place in the ranks of their profession. They are both exemplars of what wide-awake, industrious, intelligent, upright and ambitious young Americans can accomplish. These young men, however, incurred the displeasure of the "Big Stick" and straightway their indictments followed. One of these young men advised his client to a policy of silence. The other himself pursued a policy of silence. This is the head and front of their offending. Neither of them violated any law, neither of them violated any trust, neither of them was guilty of any immoral act. On the contrary, both of them have conducted themselves in accordance with the highest code of honor, both personally and professionally, and both of them have been punctiliously careful to conduct themselves with rectitude and to deal honorably with their fellow men. But they made the mistake of displeasing the "Big Stick." The cases of Brobeck and Abbott are by no means exclusive, but they are typical.

The "Big Stick's" Capers

On the other hand, it is common knowledge that eighteen citizens of our city, trusted by the people with the exercise of high and important municipal functions, deliberately conspired together, under the guidance of a master mind, to levy tribute upon the industry and commerce of our city and to enforce their piratical demands by means that would have put to shame the pirates of the Spanish Main. Yet these men are held guiltless and relieved of the stigma of indictment, because they had the wisdom to join the forces of the "Big Stick." Another man there was, whose fertile brain conceived and carried forward a gigantic plan for the exploitation of the industrial and commercial resources of this great city. At the zenith of his power, and while the city lay helpless at his feet, the "Big Stick," displeased with his mode of warfare, gave him a resounding whack on the head and ordered him to be good,—that is to say, to enlist under the banner of the "Big Stick." This robber baron proved for a time intractable and so the "Big Stick" was compelled to have recourse to numerous indictments before its victim was reduced to the proper state of servitude. This condition reached, however, the robber baron was forgiven and his pathway thereafter made pleasant for him. These illustrations merely serve to show how far we have advanced from the old theory that so long guided the conduct of men and molded their views respecting crimes and criminals. The new system has the advantage of simplicity. No more do we have need of the legal safeguards that have been thrown around the individual to protect his liberty, for the "Big Stick" now does it all. Moreover, it has become much easier to determine what is, and what is not, a crime. If an act please the "Big Stick," it is a worthy act and has no criminal characteristics. If it displease the "Big Stick," it is a crime and punishable as such. Thus are we emerging from the darkness of a benighted past into the brilliant sunlight of a glorious future.

Funston's Blunt Criticism

Wonderful impetus has been given to the wagging of the tongues of outsiders who happen to concern themselves about San Francisco's welfare by the extraordinary utterance of General Funston regarding the "unwhipped mob" of this city. General Funston has the characteristic martial vigor of expression and his unminced words are bound to be widely quoted and commented on throughout the country. Discretion of the verbal variety is certainly not the better part of military valor; and debate on the propriety of General Funston's remarks is sure to divide into two camps a population which was of one accord in its appreciation of his splendid services during the earthquake emergency. However the stubborn fact remains that despite their possible impropriety and aside from the more difficult question of their justification, the words attributed to the general have been actually committed to paper and have flown abroad heavily to reinforce what has already been spread to our detriment through eastern cities. Just what part of our varied population General Funston had in mind when his fervid pen inked the objectionable phrase onto the paper which carried his tremendous answer to the mild invitation of the Fourth of July committee remained for awhile a dark but fascinating mystery. The general insisted that he did not refer to our unionized workingmen and rather vaguely added that his mental vision was concentrated at that particular moment of passionate composition on "the cowards who stone street cars and insult women and children, and the bad element which sympathizes with those who do unlawful and violent acts." As it has not been the diversion of any element in this city to stone street cars except during the car strikes and as those cowards who have been lead by the impetuosity of their loyalty to the striking carmen to insult women and children have proved on police court examination to be almost invariably the striking carmen themselves or members of other labor unions, there was evidently a cryptic significance in this statement by General Funston that did not yield itself to ordinary mental effort. Is it possible that the general availed himself of a diplomatic prerogative not seldom assumed by great men, by denying the obvious import of his words when embarrassment would be the result of acknowledging it? Whatever General Funston meant—and in the presence of his emphatic if somewhat misty and unsatisfactory exegesis, speculation seemed futile—it is undeniable that the impression conveyed by his words will be mightily alarming to those unfamiliar with the local situation. Their unmistakeable intimation is that there exists in this city a dangerous element whose uncowed condition makes it inadvisable for the federal troops to parade on the Fourth of July. The California Promotion Committee and the other bodies which are conducting eastern campaigns of education anent San Francisco conditions will no doubt concentrate their efforts for some time to come on the erasure of this dark picture conjured by Funston's martial pen.

His First Explanation

That General Funston himself apprehends the inadequacy of obscure language in addressing the unlettered multitude whom his remarks principally concern is clear from his subsequent statements to the press. There were two or three of these and they showed the general in the mental process of clarifying his ideas about unionism more and more to suit the exigencies of newspaper expression. At first the Presidio warrior was insistent that he had intended no covert allusion to organized labor in his remarks about the unwhipped mob. But it is probable that this was nothing but a conventional disclaimer of the kind which nearly all men of local prominence have schooled themselves to make when their words might seem to reflect on unionism. This very real fear of offending the laboring man, no matter how justifiable the occasion of criticism, has been a disheartening characteristic of the San Franciscan merchant, capitalist, politician and journalist for many years. It is a cowardice born of the most sordid considerations of expediency and it has held this city up to the withering scorn of more free-spoken communities time and time again. It would appear that General Funston reproached himself for yielding to this state of mental compromise with truth and conviction, for he hastened to qualify his disclaimer and in the end disclaimed it altogether. General Funston began the process of setting himself right with the public by explaining that his sincere sympathy with the principle of unionism extended only to its legitimate manifestations and he cited the order of railway conductors as a labor organization of the kind which enjoyed his approval. But for certain other kinds of organized labor the general expressed the heartiest detestation. With a warrior's contempt for indirection or innuendo General Funston hastened to specify just what kind it was that he could not abide—the sort, he very frankly blurted out, which is represented in this city by “blatherskite P. H. McCarthy and ‘rivers of blood’ Tveitmoe.” Of these two leaders of the Building Trades Council General Funston signified an opinion to which only a bit of martial profanity could do justice. The frankness of our brigadier's language is as much to be admired as its force; and his opinion of McCarthy and Tveitmoe makes interesting matter for rumination. Evidently the Presidio is not so remote from the little world of intrigue and dissension in which McCarthy and Tveitmoe move that its commanding officer cannot keep a keen military eye on their actions; and evidently his study of these two giants who are never happy unless bedewed with the sweat of combat in the cause of unionism has resulted in a withering contempt for them and for their methods. It is clear too that General Funston does not attach much importance to Tveitmoe's repudiation of the “rivers of blood” speech which he was alleged to have delivered. Funston probably thinks that the sanguinary utterance was so much in character with other reported words of the imported champion of the American workingman that he must have delivered it and then denied it in cooler afterthought. No wonder McCarthy and Tveitmoe have been wrought to fury by the critical appreciation of their characters which he vouchsafed to the newspapers. No wonder they have branded him with the awful stigma of friendship for the organizer of the Citizens' Alliance. He has held the mirror up to them and they are enraged at the sight of their own features. They have for once enjoyed the privilege yearned for by the Scotch poet of seeing themselves as others see them. It will take tremendous quantities of their own printer's ink and gales of their own oratory to restore them to their own good opinion, which they value more than the estimation of all the brigadiers in the service of Uncle Sam.

Further Enlightenment

Encouraged no doubt by the gratifying storm of disapproval which this utterance of his brought about his undaunted brow General Funston proceeded still further to qualify his approval of unionism and in so doing he returned to his first theme of the unwhipped mob, finally dissipating the mists of language which hid the exact significance of that phrase from the mind's eye of the curious public. He explained that when he spoke of the uncowed rabble which might be expected to jeer at the troops of his command if they were allowed to parade on the Fourth of July he by no means excluded the turbulent element of organized labor. It was as everyone had suspected. The general had made his first denial as a diplomatic expedient under the impression that the whole crude truth about his attitude toward the labor unions should be imparted in judicious installments. He had feared, it seems, that one strong dose would overwhelm the patient instead of effecting the cure upon which he had set his heart. And when he judged that our supersensitiveness was sufficiently steeled to stand the entire shock he declared that that part of the unwhipped mob which was not composed of the turbulent element of organized labor aforesaid was made up of a young hoodlum element whose savage condition was due to the selfish restrictions of the apprentice system prac-tioned by the unions in this city. These restrictions, the general explained, kept numbers of young men and boys out of honest trades and exposed them to the corrupting influence of the shiftless and criminal dregs of our population. In the final analysis, therefore, it becomes perfectly clear that General Funston attributes the whole of San Francisco's unwhipped mob to the evils of union labor and to the methods of "blatherskites like McCarthy and 'rivers of blood' Tveitmoe." Some may think that General Funston should have said all this in the first place; that he should not have tantalized and baffled us with his satirical insistence that when he spoke of the unwhipped mob he did NOT refer to the Art Association and the Epworth League, but should have let us know straightaway that he meant the labor unions. However this is a very small matter. General Funston has quite honestly given us his full meaning and he deserves a great deal of gratitude for doing so. Plain-speaking and plaindealing have been lamentably and conspicuously lacking in all this city's relations with union labor and out of the Presidio has come an example which it is hoped will be more and more followed as the months roll by.

The Immortality of Beasts

Coincident with the coming of the silly season is the advent of the university summer school and the teachers' institute. The silly session is a well-defined period during which the mental lassitude induced by the labors of winter and spring lead college professors and others to formulate all sorts of ridiculous theories and to defend all sorts of nonsensical positions. In New York, for instance, the beginning of the silly season this year was marked by a controversy which waged in all the newspapers over the beneficial and injurious effects of having music with meals. Nearly everybody except Dr. Wiley, the national food expert, has been called upon to take sides in this profound dispute. In this part of the world it would seem that most of the phenomena of the silly season are to be supplied by the university summer school, although the short-lived teachers' institute did its share. Among the first of the so-called "savants" who arrived in Berkeley to minister to the intellectual cravings of the summer students was Professor McTaggart, heralded as a Cambridge don who has made a deep dent in the scientific consciousness of Europe. No sooner had Dr. McTaggart arrived than he summoned the newspapermen and impressively informed them that there is no God, that the soul is immortal and that the higher animals (including man) have souls. Stricken for a while to silent awe by these tremendous pronouncements, the reporters finally rallied sufficiently to question the professor about his beliefs. As atheism and the ordinary immortality of the soul have no news value, the shrewd newspapermen confined themselves to the doctor's theory of the immortality of animals. Dr. McTaggart informed them that he agreed with Professor Howison that dogs have everlasting life and that the same prerogative belonged to other quad-rupeds, although "just where the line of demarkation is drawn between the members of the animal kingdom that have souls and those that have none, it is a hard matter to decide." This immortality of beasts Professor McTaggart pronounces a certainty, although just how his certitude has been reached he has so far failed to inform the newspaper men. But no doubt before the silly season—or rather, the summer session of the university—proceeds much further, Professor McTaggart will have demonstrated to the complete satisfaction of all the Berkeley metaphysicians—though not perhaps to that of all the newspaper men—that man is to be cheered in his future life by the companionship of the dog, the cat or the horse which barked, meowed or whinnied its soulful friendship during this earthly existence.

High School Requirements

It is reported that in three western cities the requirements for admission to the high schools have been materially advanced. Hereafter pupils will be expected to be letter perfect in the words of "The Star Spangled Banner," "Hail Columbia," and "America," for the educational authorities are shocked by the exhibition of ignorance whenever the national hymns are sung in public, the performance usually coming to a dead stop at the end of the first stanza. Doubtless there will be another howl raised over this infringement on the rights of free born Americans like that which went up a year or two ago when it was proposed to demand that college freshmen should be familiar, at least with the substance, of the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the ten commandments, the Sermon on the Mount and the Biblical stories as related in the Book of Genesis. It was proclaimed far and wide that this was an attempt to introduce sectarian teachings into the schools and to this was added the argument that little boys and girls of eighteen and upwards were worked to death as it was with multifarious subjects for brain concentration. As a matter of fact, in the theory of those pedagogues it really made as little difference whether the freshmen knew what was meant by the Lord's Prayer as it seems to matter whether they conform to the old fashioned spelling and grammar once universally accepted as correct. Individuality is the fad nowadays, and if "I ben" slips more easily from the tongue than "I was" or "I have been," what possible difference can it make? One wonders sometimes what will become of the next generation, after contemplating the appalling ignorance of the average graduate of today, whether from high school or college, and remembering that these carelessly trained men and women are to be the teachers of the future. So many of them neither know nor desire to know nor comprehend that they do not know. They are defectively prepared in spelling, grammar, geography, history and mathematics. Their vocabulary is scant in everything but slang, and their capacity to express themselves in writing is woefully restricted. Despite all the boastings of the superiority of the modern methods, the fact remains that the average high school graduate of today is infinitely less well informed than the ten year old pupils of the old fashioned ungraded district schools which were often open only six months in the year, were without apparatus of any kind, and were moreover attended by old and young alike so that there was no time for special attention, fads or frills, and study was of more moment than teaching.

Historical Dueling Fields of America

By Major Ben C. Truman

Time was when the visitor to Washington, Richmond, Natchez, Vicksburg, New Orleans, St. Louis, Sacramento and San Francisco would be taken, among other places, to the old dueling fields adjacent, where many a man had been sent to his last account through a mistaken interpretation of what constituted an honorable settlement of personal difficulties—the "code duello," or so-called "field of honor."

Of all these historic fields that of Bladensburg, some five miles from Washington, may be rated first. The very name of Bladensburg, so familiar to by-gone generations, has become almost a tradition to the men and women who have grown up within the last quarter of a century.

The old town is only about five miles from Washington; and on a Sunday many years ago I strolled over. The road was a very good one; but the visitor need not confine himself to it, for there are many short-cuts through green meadows and cool-shaded by-paths. Skirting the town and gaining the summit of a little hill, I looked down upon the village and the slope of the battle-field that gently fell at my feet. In the foreground was the little sandy running creek. A hundred odd years ago this creek was a river, and ships came up bringing cargoes from Europe and carrying tobacco on their return trips. Bladensburg was then at its zenith; and Washington, Baltimore and Alexandria were far behind in the commercial race. There are people still living at Bladensburg who can remember vessels clearing from the foot of Main street for the West Indies and Liverpool. It was a port of entry and stores lined its principal thoroughfares. But gradually everything underwent a change. The soil ran off or wore in deep gullies and the river grew shallower every year till the ships could no longer get up, and this disaster rang the knell of the old town. All this occurred eighty years ago; and after a while the place reached its lowest level, and there it has stayed for more than half a century. So it is that at this day it is in almost every essential the same town it was when Decatur and Barron went out to fight on that bloody morning in March, 1820.

About half a mile distant from the town proper you come to the old dueling ground. It is very silent and uncommemorated. It would even be pleasant were it not for the deeds of blood which have been committed there in the name of "honor." There is a little unnamed brook running through the meadow and under the road. Its bed is a deep gulch, but this was not so in the olden days. Then the brook flowed through a narrow grassy valley, which still spreads out through the rolling fields by long and graceful curves. But the course of the brook was turned and the place it once trickled through might be called a place of dry marsh winding through the hills and concealed from observation except at both ends. Here it was that many of the duels were fought, but not the most famous of them all. A hundred yards further on, and you come to a little grassy dip in the meadow by the brookside. A moment later and you stand on the spot where Decatur and many as brave a man fell, pistol or rifle or sword in hand. What pictures could not one conjure up standing on that green, velvety sward! Within a hundred feet as many as fifty high-spirited and hot-blooded gentlemen have fallen, cut down in the prime of life, leaving wife and children and brilliant careers and sweet-faced, sad-eyed mothers who would never smile again. How different the spot now from what it was in those almost semi-barbaric days! The scene now presented to the eye is a peaceful and pastoral one; for the old ground is a meadow, and cattle may be seen grazing in the valley.

Besides the duel in which Commodore Decatur fell before the pistol of Commodore Barron there were a number of others almost as famous. The encounter between Representatives Graves of Kentucky and Cilley of Maine was one that attracted a good deal of attention at the time, as every one concerned was prominent in public life. The weapons were rifles and the distance ninety-two yards. Henry A. Wise of Virginia was the second of Graves. The principals both fired twice and missed; in the third volley Cilley fell, shot through the body, and died in three minutes. There were present at this affair the entire Kentucky delegation—Duncan of Ohio, Bynum of North Carolina and Jones of Wisconsin. The latter seconded Cilley, and once said to the writer that no Northern man, and only two of the Southern men, engaged in that infamous affair, was ever returned to public life. Jones died only a few years ago, in Iowa, at the age of 91.

In 1819 General Armistead F. Mason, senator from Virginia, was shot dead by John M. McCarty, his cousin, in a duel with musket and ball. They stood but ten feet apart. They first challenged each other to fight at three feet, then at three inches, and then to jump from the capitol dome, and afterward to sit on a powder-barrel and blow each other to pieces. But, finally, they agreed to less ferocious terms.

John Randolph's famous duel with Henry Clay was first arranged to take place at Bladensburg, but at almost the last moment the erratic Virginian changed his mind and declared that if he fell he wanted to die upon the soil of his native Virginia. So they went across the river by the Chain Bridge. Clay had fought before, in 1808; but Randolph was a novice at this meeting, which occurred in 1826. He often annoyed Clay, who was Secretary of State, by calling him a blackleg and charging him with diplomatic forgery. At last, during a debate in the Senate, Randolph referred to Clay as "that being so brilliant yet so corrupt, who, like a rotten mackerel by moonlight, shined and stunk." Randolph spent the night before the duel in quoting poetry and playing whist while his will was being changed. Clay's bullet passed through the skirt of the Virginian's coat. Randolph did not fire at Clay, on the ground that Clay had a wife and children while he had no family.

But the list is too long and too bloody to give in its entirety. One gladly turns his back on the little valley and goes down the road towards quaint old Bladensburg. The turnpike is really the principal street of the town. It stretches along a flat floor of sand, thirsty, like its citizens, and is at both ends stopped by a ford and bridge—for the little river that was now makes a turn round the bottom of the village and shoots off, a creek, round the top of it. The grave, hip-roofed, blackened houses which line either side of the sandy street look in the twilight like rows of wrecked hulks along a bar when the tide has gone out. There

So Seems the City

By Herman Scheffauer

To stand again in the desolated city of one's nativity after yearlong wanderings in the Old World's distant quarters, to revisit the ghost haunted glimpses of a dead metropolis and to gaze for the first time upon the tragic traces of an immense disaster is surely an experience beyond ordinary chance or adventure. So, rather unusual thoughts besieged the brain and rather strange emotions seized upon the heart of this beholder. How remote to me seemed even the immediate past, how near and, as it were, of yesterday, the days preceding the several years of my absence. On viewing again the old and well-known places, the human mind seems strangely bent on leaping over the intervening gap of interruption in time and space and connecting the obtrusive present with the dim perspective of the past.

The first sight of the charred corpse and demolished adornment of our once debonair and delectable city is not necessarily shocking—nor even surprising. Once, no doubt, the aspect was terrible. But to any one, in particular a native, equipped with a suggestive imagination and supplied during absence with photographs, personal accounts and printed descriptions, the city appeared even as such an one might have mentally pictured it. True, the facts of reality but seldom fit the fictions of the fancy and there is always the inevitable readjustment of erroneous suppositions and the correction of misconceptions when these are formed by the mind instead of the eye and ear. It was easily evident to me at the first comprehensive panoramic survey, how vast had been the havoc and horror and devastation—whereof the mute yet eloquent reminders, now a year old, were numerous enough. Yet I saw how upon this realm of destruction, this domain of doom, much of the new life had been imposed, brilliant, blatant and sensational by contrast with its setting and its background. That which one no longer saw, one did not instantly miss and it was only when memory reconstructed the old scenes and these in turn brought back the old associations that one grew sadly reminiscent and mused in the inevitable moralizing manner upon the transitoriness of all human endeavor. Ah me!—yes, the city was certainly saddening to a man with a memory.

One might easily from some commanding eminence of the city have emulated Marius as he mourned over the ruins of Carthage. The ragged walls still standing in a waste of fallen brick were to me like the graves or the ghosts of the once strong and populous edifices. The nonexistence of those buildings with whose designing and construction I had once been concerned came closely home to me with a melancholy sense of loss. The evanescence and disintegration of man's solid conceptions, their utter helplessness against the elements of Nature bent on ravin, struck me with a disquieting sense of the futility of all things. Here where there was now complete vacuity had been great structures—offices and counting-rooms filled with scribbling and computing clerks; here spacious shops and stores had buzzed with business all the day; here studios had once existed devoted to artists and their dreams; here had been restaurants and clubs filled with good-fellowship and conviviality or hoarding goodly-sweet memories of excellent dinners and charming tete-a-tetes. Yonder formerly arose the hulk of a splendid hotel, a true microcosm in each of whose innumerable chambers for many years what human comedies and tragedies had not been enacted! Now not even the shadows were left, although it seemed (such tricks does fancy play) as if deceptive mirages or pictures of fata morgana hung in the air—or as if one heard many whispers out of a quiet respectable antiquity. Houses and buildings and rooms! once materially separated and enclosed regions of cubicular space,—now, so to speak, unloosed and liberated with all their packed memories into the empty universal air, an utter death and annihilation to eyes of flesh.

Our bright staring Californian sun pours its brilliance over the old death and the new birth. The blue of the skies (almost as deep as that of the heavens I saw in Africa) sinks low into strange and unaccustomed horizon lines. The hills, denuded of their crests and crowns of houses, seem oddly blunt and flat. All this invests the wide blasted region with an air of something alien and causes even the unlanded spectator to experience a feeling of having been despoiled of substantial riches, the fertile, almost tangible soil in which fond human memories strike root and hold fast through life.

To me the gigantic ruin of the City Hall is wonderfully impressive and picturesque. That mighty heap of rotten masonry resolved at the first quivering of the earth, into its original rubbish, has the appearance of having been bombarded by great shells in some terrible siege. I suggest that its ruptured walls, collapsed towers and broken pilasters be covered with ivy. It might then become even romantic, something more ample, almost as dignified in form as the Roman Forum. As it now partly lies and partly stands, it is a fit symbol of the depraved, disorganized government it once housed and furnishes the best and bitterest moral upon its own dishonest construction. Yet there is a certain inspiration in seeing how straight and unshaken the statue of our city still lifts itself above the dome, the naked streets and the barren squares. Respecting the hard cheerlessness of our streets, even in the undestroyed sections, the desirability of planting trees was never so evident to me as now. There is no part of London in which one can stand and not see a tree or something green. The splendid plane tree that makes the streets of London so lovely in the summer would excellently serve our needs. We must have trees and trees in our New San Francisco!

One night last week when the moon was bright I wandered alone through the regions about California street and Nob Hill. To complete this nocturnal picture of death and desolation, nothing more was needed than the howling of jackals, the slinking shapes of wolves or hyenas and the flight of uncanny night-birds from ruin to ruin. On the northern heights, with the moon in the cloudless skies, scenes instinct with sublimity presented themselves. Upon the fire-swept flank of California street hill I saw rising in majesty the pointed arches and broken buttresses of Grace Church, a soft dark mass touched by the moonshine into vague relief against the luminous indigo of the heavens. Melrose Abbey or Elgin Cathedral or some shattered burg on the Rhine could scarcely be filled with more intrinsic charm and poesy than these romantic ruins of our city—a city that has, with all its vicissitudes, not yet reached the average fullness of man's years. Not far distant from the church the great hollow shell of a millionaire's palace loomed sullenly on its lofty ground—the couchant lions of marble still guarding the massive portals, the empty window-openings framing the stars that peer into the roofless interior. The dust of the day and the fogs of evening help to soften and subdue much that is repellant to the eye.

So much for the pictures of a few first impressions. Whatever the city of the future is to be or the future of the city, I know there is nothing that can now rob her of that historic nimbus of awful romance that shall ever invest her name in the sight and memory of mankind.

Perspective Impressions

The Hague conference is busy drafting "new rules for war," an excellent way to preserve the peace.

The acquittal of Judge Loving demonstrates that the unwritten law still holds good south of Mason and Dixon's line.

Professors in the locksteps don't seem to be having many pupils just now, though the Grand Jury courts be grinding.

As usual more hearts were pinked than points were scored in the bouts-at-arms of the "society fencers" at the Presidio.

Ken ye not the golden note in the toot! toot! of the autos, Napa County, that ye deny them the use of your roads? Hoot! hoot!

The Olympic Club seems to be against the hardest contest in its eventful history, but no contest ever offered the members a greater opportunity to win substantial rewards for the famous old institution.

With several of the municipal offices recognizing Schmitz as de jure mayor; others looking up to Gallagher as de facto mayor and the "Big Stick's" mayor as inevitable, all parties seem to have a representation in the government except the plain people.

Cornelius certainly is getting the double cross. He is ignored in the conference of the labor leaders striving to get recognition for another car union from Calhoun and is threatened with the loss of handling the union contributions to assist the strikers. No wonder he rises in his rage and shouts, "the strike must go on to the bitter end." Wake up, Cornelius, the strike reached its bitter end three weeks ago.

Mr. Hill's Startling Declaration

James J. Hill startled the railroad men of the world the other day when he made the astounding declaration that "the United States government ultimately will be forced to lend its credit to finance the needs of the railroads of this country, a move which may lead to the government ownership of railroads." This is a step ahead of President Roosevelt's present position and a step behind Mr. Bryan's scheme of ultimate government ownership, the exception in the latter case being that Mr. Hill, as a practical, experienced and expert railroad man, knows what he is talking about; while Mr. Bryan is a theorist, and has had nothing whatever to do with railroad management. Mr. Hill put the situation pithily and bluntly when he said, "the country is large and still growing and the railroads are a long way behind it. They require $1,100,000,000 a year for the next five years to put themselves in condition to properly handle the growing traffic. The present trouble is that the credit of the railroads has been ruined, and under present conditions it is impossible for them to finance a recovery. Meanwhile business is way ahead of the working capacity of the railroads while their equipments, under the immense wear and tear, are rapidly going to pieces. Some giant financial power must come to the help of the railroads in this emergency. The United States is the only power I can see that will ably help out in this matter and, as I said, such a step may lead to the eventual ownership of the railroads by the government."

The Lure of the Nickel Painted Siren

Sporting blood is surely a queer thing to reckon with. Within the last few years a very well known down-town merchant has become afflicted with the nickel-in-the-slot machine craze. The very scant returns he wins certainly do not attract him for his income far exceeds his big household expense. His self-possession against everything but a slot machine is perfectly normal; but once let him glimpse one of those sirens and he's a changed man. Day after day he squanders several hours in a hypnotized condition pouring nickels into a machine near his store. The other day his good wife, in hopes of weaning him from the baneful habit, prevailed on him to take a fortnight's vacation near Santa Cruz. Immediately they were settled there he quickly located the nearest machines and again spellbound set to work squandering his time and money. Put upon her mettle in the contest the good wife conceived the idea of engaging a motor boat and taking her hubby out to sea far beyond the temptation of the siren machines; ostensibly it was a fishing trip. Hubby fell into the trap, said he'd go along and casually asked the name of the boatman.

The Machine Fiend at His Worst

When the two reached the launch, early the next morning, the trusting wife was stunned to see a nickel-in-the-slot machine triumphantly ensconced next her husband's seat. "Sam—," she began. "Why not?" he smiled. You do the fishing and I'll punch the machine." She agreed but on the trip she did some hard talking and finally extracted a promise from him. She knew she'd won for Sam's word is good for anything in charge. She fitted up a room with two machines at home—to shift his luck—pasted up a list of winning hands that would win everything from ice cream cornucopias to five dollar Tuxedo suits and turned him loose. He patronizes the home machines only and now he is late for business every morning and home early every evening, rabidly eager to try his luck. As for the good wife she's laying up a bank account for the children that will give them a handsome start in life if her husband's mania doesn't wear itself out.

Plunging In the Nickel Debauch

This case is not an unusual one although it may be an extreme instance. There is a very eminent professional man in town whom I overtook one day just as he turned into a big Market street cigar stand. He laid down a five dollar piece on the counter and quietly asked for change in nickels. I laughed. "You don't mean to say that you're going to attack the machine?" I said. "Why, nobody in town is more familiar with those crooked devices." He shrugged his shoulders. "That may be true," he replied. "But I don't consider the element of crookedness. The fact is there are times when I feel like plunging—going the limit, and this thing offers me a sort of vent. Right here's where I jump off."

Back to the Normal Again

I watched him while he mechanically dropped his nickels and pumped on the machine; his eyes were intent on the flying cards, his mind oblivious of everything else. When the one hundredth nickel had been swallowed up in the voracious maw he turned around with the smile of a happy boy, and brushed his hands as though he were brushing away the last traces of the spell that had bound him to the machine. "No luck?" I ventured. "Pshaw!" he returned. "I didn't expect any. I've had my dip and I feel infinitely better. And now let's talk of little Wendy and the kids in Peter Pan."

Tenement Blight Threatened

Men and women interested in the welfare of the "great unwashed" are hoping that the immunity bath which has been given the supervisors will render them agreeable to legislating for light, air, and fit water for the tenement dwellers. The civic committee, appointed in the last convention of the Episcopal church, has taken the matter before the supervisors and it is to be hoped that the result will be more satisfactory than the legislative fiasco in regard to tenement law. If Governor Gillett's idea was to put San Francisco in worse odor before the world, he happily accomplished it by vetoing the tenement bill during the last session of the legislature. But the Governor frankly admits that his aversion of the bill was not rooted in the desire to show that we are a law unto ourselves and can very well do without such adequate and excellent tenement laws as New York and other large cities now enforce. Governor Gillett is quoted as saying that he would not sign any bills fostered by women—and the tenement law, juvenile probation, and every other bill which women interested in civic welfare helped frame, was promptly quashed by a governor who evidently believes in women "attending to their own knitting."

Felix Adler on the Local Situation

Dr. Felix Adler, whose work in the slums of New York has made his utterances on such subjects authentic, is horrified at the tenement buildings which are being erected in San Francisco. We have a golden opportunity to compel landlords to erect buildings that do not cry their shame to the heavens but under the present law, rapacious landlords may cheerfully violate every "unwritten law" of sanitation. And as Bernard Shaw says, "people must live somewhere, or else go to jail and advantage is taken of that to make them pay for houses that are not fit for dogs." The Reverend Cecil Marrack, who investigated conditions with City Engineer Woodward and architect John Bakewell, declares that he found several recently erected buildings here as bad as the fetid lodgings in White Chapel. "In one tenement in North Beach," says Rev. Marrack, "we found 600 persons huddled together in tiny rooms, the largest of which was not more than about 12 feet square and in a 'suite' of three such rooms, unplastered and uncarpeted 14 persons lived."

Among the Cave Dwellers

A woman, who not only tends to her own knitting, but brings sunshine unto the lives of others, tells me that in a building on Broadway the owner has so utilized every inch of ground space that many of the rooms depend entirely for air and light on tiny door transoms that open into a dingy hall lit only by a light well. While New York city is busily engaged pulling down buildings that so flagrantly violate right living and clear thinking San Francisco has apathetically allowed them to spring up.

Under the Iron Heel

High stomached individuals, whose lives are truffle trimmed, will argue that every man chooses his own dwelling and the poor devils may go elsewhere if they don't like transom air. As a matter of fact they can't go elsewhere for rents elsewhere are so high that the "poor devils" can't afford to pay them. Their only refuge is the screwing landlord, who by putting up a flimsy building, improperly lighted and ventilated and with no means of fire escape, manages to draw an exorbitant interest on his investment and yet charge less per capita than in a building decently habitable. The settlement workers, club women, and individuals who are interested in their fellow beings are hoping that the "Big Stick" is not so whittled down to a sliver over other affairs, that it will fail to prod the supervisors to a sense of duty in the tenement matter. The swish of petticoats has carefully been deadened in the matter, so that ears offended by women's voices raised for the public good will not turn deaf to the plea. A feature of the flexibility of our present building restrictions that should win the selfish minded over to the cause of a better law, is the danger of almost any residence block in the burned district being defaced with a tenement like the one that sprawls its unsightly length at Leavenworth and Bay streets.

Settlement Workers at Sea

The fire has so violated all established conditions that it is almost impossible to predict the future of a large part of the burned residence district. Even the settlement workers are at a loss to know just where to pitch their club houses, so scattered are the people among whom they lived and worked before the disaster. There are districts north and south of Market street that would be better for a settlement house in every block but of course that is impossible and many of the workers are waiting for neighborhoods to more clearly define themselves. Miss Wolfsohn, Miss Briggs, Miss Ashe, Miss Parker, and Sydney Peixotto of the Columbia Park boys club have plans under way for the erection of suitable club houses for carrying on their work, but in some cases the exact location of the club is not yet decided.

Oh, that I had taken that voyage on the Jolly Roger—Ruef.

Emotional Circulation Methods

The circulation department of a magazine is the last place in the world where one would expect emotionalism to abide and yet there is a monthly in New York whose circulation manager is probably the most throbful person outside of sentimental fiction. His appeal to readers whose subscriptions have expired is a triumph of insinuating tenderness that must be simply irresistible to the ordinary soft-hearted consumer of magazine literature. Here is the soulful letter which emanates from Union Square when this particular magazine sees a victim slipping from its grasp: "Dear Subscriber, You've lived with us for a twelve-month or more. You've been constantly in our thoughts, you've shared our secrets and dreamed our dreams; we hope you've applauded our efforts to 'lend a helping hand.' Now the twelvemonth is over—are you done with us? Let us help you decide. Having lived with us, you know what we have been and are. Then if you want us 'as we hope to be,' simply mail the outside of this envelope with check for $1.50, and we'll understand." It is a flintyhearted subscriber who is not dissolved in tears when he reaches the conclusion of this yearning epistle. But the author of it is wasting his talents in the circulation office; he should be writing burning romances for his magazine instead of nursing its subscription list.

Advertising Miss Tobin's Petrarch

I wonder how Miss Agnes Tobin relishes the advertising dodge to which her London publisher has resorted to push the sale of her latest volume of translations from Petrarch. An item of the sort the literary press agent most delights in has been going the rounds of the newspaper offices ever since the book was published, but I think it has not been copied here. It says that just after the publication of the Petrarch translation a press clipping bureau in this country addressed a postcard to "Mr. Petrarch," care of William Heineman, the London publisher, urging "Mr. Petrarch" to send five dollars if he wished to know "how much publicity his work is receiving." Of course this is a fiction designed to call attention to the book and it would be interesting to know how Miss Tobin who is a very seriously-inclined young poetess, likes this cheap method of advertising her verses.

At the Seaside—She: I'm afraid we shall have to break our engagement.

He: Why?

She: My husband is coming down next week.

Big Hitch in the Hunt for a Mayor

The efforts of the "Big Stick" to agree on a satisfactory man for mayor have run into a stone wall—in one word it's Hearst. Hearst has come on from the East to take a hand in this supreme question of the hour and he purposes attempting the same line of political maneuvers that failed in the Dunne fight in Chicago. He has agreed upon his own candidate, but the heavy end of the "Big Stick" objects on the ground that the appointment of his man Dwyer will hardly be throwing oil on the troubled municipal situation. Keen politics are now being done here by the active party leaders and Hearst is pensively mindful that there is no time like the present to jockey the Independence League into a better position for the forthcoming race. The graft prosecution recognizes that if Hearst or any one leader is in, the community is out, to all restful purposes, and there you are. It's a Gordian knot awaiting some enterprising Alexander.

Why "Mayor" Gallagher Laughs

The only one who sees any humor in the situation is Gallagher, big, bluff, unconscionable, get-there-any-way and take-every-thing-in-sight Gallagher. While the present hitch is on he sees nothing in the contest but a choice between Hearst's man and himself and he says "it's all Gallagher," because Hearst will never give way and the "Big Stick" will never dare accept his candidate. Wherefore Gallagher figures on unobtrusively occupying the mayor's chair and getting his undetected fingers into various municipal small pies for some time to come. All kinds of alternatives and compromises have been offered Hearst but so far without avail. Those who know his character look for lively developments.

Political Leaders Busy

But Hearst is not alone in his keenness to fish the chestnut out of the embers left by the fire of April 18th. Herrin is taking advantage of the busy moments of the leaders of the Independence League and the Labor Party to round up the Republican elements and banditti and whip them into a phalanx that shall carry one of the old style "united we stand" standards of twenty years ago. Hovering around the flanks of the marshalling parties is the little band of renegades led by Byington and D. I. Mahoney. Their hunting for political jobs has not brought surcease of sorrow and now they are said to be dickering with some of the labor leaders. Verily it is a hot time in the old political camps.

condition. By a stroke of retribution it is the brokers who are suffering this time and not their customers. For several months past a certain coterie of speculatively inclined brokers has been shorting the market persistently despite the comparative lowness of prices. They calculated that the tight money market, the labor strikes, and the usual dull summer months would naturally bear prices and forthwith they proceeded to help matters along by selling all their own stock and all the stock they could borrow. A small clique of insiders got wind of this situation and decided the moment was most auspicious to trim the shorts and thus indirectly boost the market. They selected three excellent holdings for the campaign; Goldfield Consolidated, Combination Fraction and Jumbo Extension, all good producers and all with stock held in strong hands.

Manipulators vs. Brokers

The rise in values was started gently and the brokers and other shorts precipitately sold with a view to hammering down prices. All stock offered was quietly absorbed and another gentle boost was given values. More stock was dumped by the shorts. The market apparently weakened. The shorts became jubilant and unloaded more borrowed stock with a view to submerging values. It was all absorbed and then came a boost in prices that made the shorts turn livid. Three brokerage firms in Goldfield went to the wall in one day and several local firms began to weaken. That's the story of the street at present. Values are getting stronger and the shorts are getting sicker. It's a contest between the mine owners and the bunch of brokers who have been recklessly shorting the market. The public is not in the game as is evidenced by the slack interest and the small amount of business transacted on the exchanges. Most of the old flock of lambs were thoroughly sheared in the last slump and a new lot has not yet come to hand.

Unusual Flight of Faculty Members

Berkeley people have been patting themselves on the back rather heartily since President Wheeler's decision to remain in California was announced. They flatter themselves that neither the honor of the position nor the generous salary attached to the Presidency of the Boston School of Technology could tempt him from the University of California. But when they come to glance over the announcement soon to be published for the coming college semester they will have to condole with themselves over the loss of many of the leading lights of the faculty. The faculty is sadly crippled by numerous "leaves of absences." There is hardly a department which will not have at least one vacant chair in faculty row. Professor Soule, of the Department of Civil Engineering, is already sight-seeing in Europe with his wife and will not return for some eighteen months. Professor Clapp accepted a call to fill the chair of Greek in Rome, and Professor and Mrs. Farrington are in Paris. Professor Wilezynski, the brilliant young man who brought his beautiful young Italian bride to Berkeley only a year ago, has accepted a chair of Mathematics at the University of Illinois. The students will perhaps miss most Colonel George Edwards, advisor to the undergraduate men of the University. But the general public will most regret the desertion of Professor Charles Mills Gayley, whose classes in Shakespeare and English Poetry have always overflowed with visitors. Colonel Edwards and Professor Gayley were absolutely ordered abroad by their physicians; they are expected to return in a year with new zest for discovering mathematical formulas and poetic "touch-stones." Professors Eakle, Hatfield, and Noble, all well-known among educators, are also among the absentees and the administration offices are to suffer in like manner. Mrs. Cheney, Appointment Secretary of the University, will have a year in Europe for her health, and Mr. Victor Henderson will not fill his position as Secretary to the Regents this coming year. Lusty throats will have to be swabbed after the foot-ball games by other hands than Doctor Reinhart's, for even he has found his college duties too arduous. All in all, there never before has been a year with so many prominent faculty members absent from the University at one time.

College Maids With the Hoe

Of all the Fraternal Chapters in the University the Alpha Phi maidens seem to be the most "up and doing." Just now they are raising vegetables in the back yard of their new house on Durant avenue in Berkeley to save living expenses next year. Fraternities are seldom over-burdened with house-hold funds, and while they were hesitating about signing the lease for this large new house with its large fat rent, the girls gazed at the big back yard, conceived the idea of raising vegetables, and with hazy dreams of magazine articles they had read about "widows making fortunes raising string beans," they signed the deed and bought their spades and garden seeds. Some of the older members, now married and living in the college town, have been persuaded that a little exercise in the garden each day would be just the thing for their complexions, and of course they are going to help. So if the weather gods are propitious and crops are good, the Alpha Phis can further set the fashion of sending out cards for "green peas" instead of "pink teas."

Grief Whitened His Hair

Teachers and students at the University of California will be somewhat shocked when college opens to meet Professor B. L. Newkirk, of the Department of Mathematics and Astronomy, with snow white hair. Dr. Newkirk left the University in May in the best of spirits and eager to take up his summer work in the Astronomical Department at Mt. Hamilton. Six weeks ago he received a telegram that his father was dying. He hurried East, but death was quicker than the trains. The shock was a severe one, and his friends on Mt. Hamilton hardly knew the silent white haired man who came back to them in the place of the brown-haired Professor.

Lily Langtry Playing at Married Life

The ever blooming Lily Langtry and her young husband, Sir Hugo de Bathe, are once more in restricted accord. They were seen dining together at the Savoy in London the other night and strange as it may appear the couple seemed quite absorbed in each other. Their semblance of connubial bliss awakened wide spread attention and many were the expressions of wonder as to the probable future domestic course of the good looking pair. Although they are on very good terms the two are not living under the same roof. Sir Hugo has become an enthusiastic balloonist and lives near his big toys at Wood End, the noted de Bathe place near Goodwood, while his wife occupies the largest suite in the smart apartment house connected with the Savoy Hotel.

Lillian Russel as Cupid's Nurse

Evidently love keeps the heart young and preserves that peachy complexion. By a singular coincidence Lillian Russell, the perennial American stage beauty, was likewise in the limelight for public lognetting last week. Six months ago Jessie Lewisohn, a son of the copper magnate but the one in the flock who has developed more sporting proclivities than inclinations for serious business, went abroad with a party including the much married Miss Russell. Rumor had been rife for some time that the two were to be married and the result of the trip was watched with considerable curious interest, but no marriage bells were rung among the peals that greeted the return of the jolly party. Last week however Lewisohn was called upon by his physicians to submit to a critical operation and he flatly refused to proceed until Miss Russell, who was playing in the West, should have completed arrangements to visit him before he went to the hospital. Lewisohn's brother Oscar was very recently married in London to Miss Edna May, another pearl among the American stage jewels.

Trainers and Obstreperous "Champs"

Over at Squires' training quarters, the other day, they were discussing the trouble of handling the Australian, when "Joe" Semple, an old timer, broke in with the assertion that all the new men started that way and that they all ended as did Sullivan, and forthwith he proceeded to recount how the redoubtable "champion of champs" was brought to the snubbing post. At the time the great John L. was matched to meet Slade. Little Jimmie Wakeley was his manager and Muldoon, the same Muldoon who was so well known out here, was his trainer. Muldoon selected a certain Spring, beyond easy reach of New York, and succeeded at last in inveigling the giant there to begin his training. Muldoon, though a big man and in his prime, was a bit afraid of John L. and handled him gingerly, a bad move on the part of any one who tried to manage him. As trainer he cut out a line of stiff work which John L. sniffed at in a grouchy, complaining way. Every now and then he'd protest, disgusted like, "Oh, give me just a hair cut and a rub down and I'll eat up that guy, Slade."

On a Hunt For the Champion

Training went ahead in this disgruntled fashion till some three weeks before the fight when, one day, Sullivan dropped out of sight. They hunted for him high and low but nowhere could they find the least trace of him. Finally one night a poolroom tout—everybody was looking for him by this time—located him in the bar room of a little French hotel buried deep down on the east side. Muldoon, who was on to his job by this time, promptly notified Jimmie Wakeley. Wakeley, then as now is a chunky, little taciturn runt, but all steel and snap, and if there ever lived a man that Sullivan stood in awe of, it was Wakeley. Wakeley was solemnly smoking in his office when he received the tip of Sullivan's whereabouts. As usual he didn't say a word but he walked over to the wall where a blackjack was hanging among a lot of Bowery souvenirs. He slipped it into his pocket and started for the French hotel.

any Barbary Coast pirate. John L. was well under full sail for one of his rough house carnivals. Little Wakeley, silent and solemn like, walked straight up to where Sullivan was sitting and deliberately whanged him over the head with the blackjack. Sullivan simply settled in his chair, limp and out. "Pick him up and take him up stairs to a room," ordered Wakeley. And they did. The little manager was sitting over the big fellow when he woke up. "John," said Wakeley, pulling out his watch, "Muldoon will be here in twenty minutes and you're going back to the Springs to begin training all over again. Get up and get ready." Sullivan begged for a bracer. "You get ready for breakfast." And he did, and he trained in such a conscientious fashion that Slade was made a piker in the fight. Sullivan was never such a hard man to handle after that episode. Semple's moral, as he claimed, was that if the trainer did not master the champ's spirit, training eventually would.

Shaw Defines Himself

In his last effort to define himself Bernard Shaw says, "I am an Irishman, a vegetarian, an atheist, a teetotaller, a fanatic, a humorist, a fluent liar, a social Democrat, a lecturer and debater, a lover of music, a fierce opponent of the present status of women, and an insister on the seriousness of art." Assuredly versatility is a disease with him for he has been successively a novelist, musical critic, art critic, dramatic critic, politician and playwright, and in the matter of self advertisement no man surpasses him. For a time the newspaper interviews with him attracted wide spread attention, they were so sparkling, so breezy; now the secret is out that Shaw used to write his own interviews and send them to the papers. Another method of shocking the public was his "letter to the editor," an old time Whistler device, but Shaw eclipsed his model. He perceived that abuse is the royal road to notoriety and he scientifically extracted abuse from every layer of society. His clog dance on Henry Irving's grave was almost disastrous, but as it was execrated by a German newspaper, he repeated the transaction—and repeated the offense. According to James Douglas he is a first rate crank who is a first rate comedian. He is the rage of the smart set today just as Oscar Wilde was the rage of the smart set of yesterday. He is the most anti-Irishman in London. In fact he is anti-everything even to anti-Shaw, at times.

His Reason for Not Visiting America

The other day he was asked why he did not visit America. He gave a characteristic reply: "After the Gorki and Strauss episodes it is clear that no European author of any distinction is safe in the United States, which is now infested with moral brigands who have turned the Post Office into a most Unholy Inquisition, and are apparently in supreme command of the police. How can I bring my wife to a country where she cannot obtain rooms at a hotel without producing her marriage certificate and showing it to the other guests? If the brigands there can, without any remonstrance from public opinion, seize a man of Mr. Harman's advanced age and imprison him for a year simply because he shares the opinion expressed in my 'Man and Superman,' that marriage is the most licentious of human conditions, what chance should I have of escaping? No, thank you, no trips to America for me."

His Crushing Answer to the Baconians

Shaw is said to be one of the best talkers in London. His answer to the Baconians is crushing. If you take the titles of eleven of Shakespeare's plays, arrange them in the proper order and mark the fourth letter from the end in each instance you will find that they spell Bernard Shaw. Here is the cryptogram:

MacBeth,
Julius CaEsar,
Comedy of ErRors,
Merchant of VeNice,
Anthony and CleopAtra,
Two Gentlemen of VeRona,
Merry Wives of WinDsor,

Troilus and CresSida,
Timon of AtHens,
Anthony and CleopAtra,
All's Well That Ends Well.

On the Baconian theory this would prove that Shaw wrote Shakespeare's plays.

Jingoism Rampant in Japan

If Viscount Aoki, the Japanese Ambassador, is recalled at this juncture it will be significant of one fact: that the jingo party is triumphant in Japan and that the enemies of the United States are in the ascendant. To foment the ill temper of the lower elements against this country, and against San Francisco in particular, photographs of the wrecked Japanese restaurant and barber shop were forwarded to Japan where they were not only pasted about the dead walls of the cities but published with rabid headlines in all the yellow papers. Conservative judges here are inclined to believe that all the pother is being raised in Nippon for political purposes; others think the kindling of so much fire among a nation with such inflammable impulses may lead to an uncontrollable outbreak.

Roused the Wrath of an Emperor

The situation has served to bring Viscount Aoki more prominently into the public eye. He is a man of distinguished character, strong-willed, self-reliant. He has faced crises beside which the present one is insignificant and in most of these he has had to meet storms of disapproval on the part of his countrymen. Very early in his diplomatic career he brought upon his own head a violent outburst of national condemnation by marrying a German woman, the Baroness Von Rahden, widow of a German officer of rank. His countrymen have never forgiven him that step. The present Viscountess Aoki is a Prussian by birth. The family to which she belongs is an ancient one allied to many of the great houses of German aristocracy. At the time of the marriage, twenty-five years ago, the Viscount was the Japanese Minister to Berlin, where he had spent many years. This alliance was the first instance in the history of continental Europe where a woman of rank and title married an oriental. The marriage so enraged Emperor William that he divested the Viscountess Aoki of all her privileges, barred her from the court and denied her the right of attending any official entertainment given by an official of Germany in any part of the world.

Made a Happy Marriage

But the aged Emperor William could not deny happiness to the couple and the marriage of the Aokis is said to have proved a very happy one. They have one daughter, the Countess Hatzfeldt Trachenberg, wife of a high officer in the German army. The Hatzfeldts have one son, Hissi, two years of age. The Viscountess Aoki has just sailed for Germany to visit her daughter.

Plan Splendid Dining Rooms

George A. Schastey, representing Baumgarten, the famous New York decorator who is planning the interior detail work of the Fairmont, has just received the plans of the Norman Cafe and The Crypt, two more of the striking refreshment rooms now being fitted up. Both rooms will be incomparable additions to the famous dining places of San Francisco. Nothing in their style and finishings has ever been seen here. The design of The Crypt is borrowed from the early French wine cellars. The walls are of Siberian oak logs roughly dressed; the ceiling of stone groined arches supported by short, heavy set pillars. The flooring is in Welsh quarry tile. High around the walls and pillars runs shelving on which will be displayed a rare assortment of steins, mugs, flagons, jugs and by-gone signs which betoken "a good wine needs no bush." Fixtures of grotesquely fashioned old hammered copper will offer service to illuminate the queer old place, as will the curious old candlesticks on the heavy deal tables. When completed The Crypt will look like the serving room of a merry old vintner of the picturesque day of Louis Le Grand.

Feasting With the Crusaders

In contrast the Norman Cafe, conceived on lofty, broad and noble lines, will represent a feast hall taken from a noted castle of the period of the great Crusaders. The lower half of the walls, twenty-five feet high, will be in rough hewn old English oak, with embellishments of rude wood carving; above this wainscoting and to the ceiling will reach antique blocks of stone. The ceiling itself is beamed in very heavy oak, the main girders being of stone with groined lines. These girders are supported at the ends by heraldic figures nearly life size, illustrating in graphic style the Knighthood of the fifteenth century. The woodwork will be picked out in dull heraldic hues of blues and reds in a manner to artistically emphasize the profiles and reliefs. Antique colored glass with motifs and crests of the period will be introduced in penetrations above the wood work of the east wall. The windows on the west afford a commanding panoramic sweep of the waters of the bay and the distant mountains beyond. Very striking is the lighting effect from the heavy sconces acting as corbels to the massive beams. Arms, mail and appropriate decorations of the Tudor period will embellish the walls and add to the atmosphere of moated castle and ducal luxury. Several local artists who looked over these detailed plans, this week, declared the rooms would be by far the most striking of their kind in this country.

Helping the Ina Coolbrith Fund

George Wharton James, the well-known writer and lecturer, while staying at Del Monte recently, visited Monterey and the artists' and writers' colony at Carmel-by-the-Sea. He spent a most interesting hour or two with Charles Warren Stoddard, who knows Mark Twain as few men know him, having accompanied him on a European lecture tour. Stoddard has many good stories to tell about Mark Twain but some of the best of them must remain unpublished till the grave has closed over the mortal remains of the great humorist. George Wharton James has already done a great deal of literary work and is planning to accomplish much more. He has long been accumulating data for a big, almost a colossal, work on the literature and literary men of California. In it will be included almost everything of literary value that has ever been written or published in California, whether in book, magazine or newspaper, from the earliest times of her history. On the last Sunday evening in June, Mr. James gave a talk in the drawing-room at Del Monte on the Golden Gate Trinity—Bret Harte, Charles Warren Stoddard and Ina D. Coolbrith. The object of his talk was to increase the fund that he is raising to build a home for Ina D. Coolbrith. He has received many presents of books, pictures, autographed portraits and other things, which are to be sold for the benefit of the fund.

Condemns the Ways of New Japan

A charming Englishwoman is staying at Del Monte—Mrs. A. Stuart Black. She is a dainty little brunette, full of vivacity and a most agreeable and entertaining conversationalist. She has traveled extensively, having been in Russia, Sweden, Turkey and other European countries. She came to the Pacific Coast from Japan, where she spent some time, visiting many of the remote towns and villages. Her opinion of the Japanese is anything but favorable. She says that they are tricky, untrustworthy and by no means so universally cleanly and courteous as is commonly supposed. They are rapidly picking up and eagerly adopting white men's vices, which never wear so unattractive an appearance as when caricatured and exaggerated by the little brown men. Travelers who, wandering throughout Japan fifteen or twenty years ago, were charmed by the gentleness, courtesy, simplicity and other virtues of the Japanese, untouched or at least unmarred by occidental civilization, upon revisiting the country now, are pained to see the deterioration that has set in among the subjects of the Mikado. They are imitating in the closest possible manner many of the best-known and best-selling proprietary articles of British manufacturers. The packages, bottles and labels in which they put up their base imitations of these articles are almost exact reproductions of the originals, but the goods are of very indifferent quality. The merchants palm off modern articles upon unskilled tourists as genuine antiques. The Japanese are exceedingly curious and one of the drawbacks of travel through the country is the impertinent staring to which the tourist is subjected. Cultivated travelers who remember the old Japan, are shocked at the unhappy change and say that they do not want to see the country again.

English Versus American Girls

Lady Maitland, the celebrated English miniature painter, whose talent for getting into print has made her even more famous along the Inky Way than in the studio world, has "come right out in meeting" and scored the American girl. "An English girl," says Lady Maitland, "is brought up to play and to sing and to paint while your girls in society, the daughters of the affluent, are brought up to observe rather than to do those things. An American girl says: 'Oh, I dislike amateur playing and painting; there are so many people who do these things well, and why not hear people play and sing who are professionals, and who can make music worth while?' On the other hand I contend that we have a better system of bringing up our girls, for if a girl only plays or paints indifferently well she has a better understanding of these things and is better able to judge than the girl who only hears professionals and who has no technical knowledge of these things."

Local Society Girls With "Careers"

Lady Maitland evidently comes to America with her mind made up—instead of leaving it open to air. As a matter of fact, society girls are invariably taught to play and sing and paint—but they are also taught not to inflict an average talent on a long suffering public. The American girl realizes that a clever woman is one who knows her own limitations and when her musical ability is limited to playing an indifferent accompaniment for a jolly crowd, she doesn't chop at Chopin in public. If Lady Maitland had taken excursions into provincial parlors she would have found that there are still American "Mommers" who shove Mamie to the "pianer" to play the Maiden's Prayer "for the lady." But the unhappy day of deliberate musical murder has passed in the larger cities. The San Francisco society girl could never be convicted of Melody Slaughter in G. There are several women in the smart set who are unusually gifted, and their friends pay enthusiastic tribute to their talents. Mrs. Jack Casserly, Miss Elizabeth Ames, and a dozen others, have ability that has been trained beyond the amateurish borders. Kathleen de Young and Ethel Crocker are two of the very young girls who are considered eligible to "careers" by their masters, though fate has probably too richly dowered them with gold for golden laurels.

Hair Restorers in Art

The fact that the society girl knows better than to perform in public does not carve a tombstone over her musical appreciation. English people, as a rule, suffer so keenly from the home product performance that their appetite for better things is dulled. As for painting, again we might gently lead Lady Maitland into rural districts and show her life-sized daubs of invertebrate young women, plucking sticky blossoms from impossible trees with a bilious moon trembling against a sickly sky. And Mamie "done" it herself with the aid of a piece of tracing paper, and three lessons from a peripatetic "artist" who also sells Hair Restorer on his rounds. But Lady Maitland will have to hurry for, thanks to the rural dissemination of better reading matter, that sort of art is rapidly being discouraged.

Where the Sense of Humor Saves

As for the society girl, if her talent is laid on in wide washes, she is encouraged to the uttermost but it is no longer considered necessary to use paint when one's talent is pale. There are a number of girls who use the brush cleverly, but thank the Stars and Stripes Forever, that the American sense of humor prevents them from taking themselves seriously. Mrs. Norris Davis (Therese Morgan) has painted some very good bits of old Chinatown and Mrs. Lansing Kellogg (Ethyl Hager) has done some ripping ballet girls. One of the Huntington girls, I believe Mrs. Metcalf, studied with Miss Withrow for a long time and did some very creditable work. Rose Hooper Plotner is a very successful miniature painter who did not originally intend to put her talents to commercial uses. Lady Maitland further commiserates our attitude, with this rather remarkable statement: "The English girl who plays and paints, in the event of any financial misfortune can put those accomplishments to some practical use. Your girls, instead, must go into office work, become typewriters, clerks, etc., which is so much harder and so much less pleasant a way of earning a living. So you see, with all their cleverness and natural gifts your girls have something to learn from ours."

The Woman's Exchange Route

With all her vaunted aptitude I fear that the American girl will be a long time learning that in-different music and art offer pleasanter remuneration than office work. The English girl may enjoy chasing a rainbow with a tube of paint in one hand and an etude in the other, but the American girl would just as soon hunt for the pot of gold in an office. The only avenue of employment for the amateur is that of a governess or the precarious living made by painting place cards—doing the sort of thing for which Women's Exchanges were created. The bereft English girl slips into the role of governess without a protest—a metamorphosis of which time honored custom and national tradition approves. She earns a meagre stipend, catches crumbs from a rich man's table, but is supposed to preserve her "infra dig" intact. The American girl of ability clicks away at a typewriter seven hours a day, draws down a hundred dollars a month, calls her time and body and soul her own after office hours, sees the world on her savings, and wouldn't recognize the English brand of "infra dig" if she bumped right into it.

Society Showing Its Talents and Grit

Take for example the society women who were jolted out of slippers ease on the memorable April 18, and had to button on their boots and go out into the world to earn a living. They could all play and sing and paint—a little but they didn't market their mediocre talents. Alice Hoffman went into the blue print business, Mrs. John Evelyn Page managed her brother's insurance business during his illness, and Cora Smedburg has opened an insurance office while several other girls are studying stenography.

"Do Not Be Surprised If—"

There's a deep dark secret, that so far has not escaped the borderland of the smart set, which might as well be told, in strictest confidence mind you, to Town Talk readers. If you should chance to see Mrs. Fred McNear suddenly begin to talk to herself with an accent that out-Englises the English and a manner awfully London, don't you know, pray do not be alarmed. And if you should catch a glimpse of Mrs. Spencer trying to look "real devilish," a regular "woman with a past" expression dangling in her eyes, don't jump too fast at conclusions. Mrs. McNear's "sweet, misunderstood" gaze, and broad sticky A's, and the rakish twist to Mrs. Spencer's eyebrows are not indicative of an over ardent pursuit of "personality." If you look close you will find a copy of "Lady Windermere's Fan" surreptitiously concealed in their near abouts. It is not that these young matrons are so minded as to be ashamed of reading Oscar Wilde. But, as I hinted before, the fact that society is going to give a production of "Lady Windermere's Fan" has not been announced on the social bill boards and the chief actors hiss a melodramatic "ssh!" every time any one tells the secret above a whisper.

Incriminating Witticisms

The other day going down on the train to Fair Oaks I sat behind two young chaps whose conversation was so spicy and so brilliant that I wondered where they had been taking mental massage. Somehow one does not expect people with such an expensive air to interchange epigrams as easily as they might tip a waiter. I was somewhat nettled as the sparks flew until one chap nonchalantly remarked, "Oh, wicked women are a bother, and good women are a bore. There lies the only difference between them"! It sounded reminiscent and suddenly I realized that they were merely practicing their parts!

Mrs. McNear in a Star Part

Mrs. McNear is to play the good woman, Lady Windermere, who is not a bore after all. Mrs. McNear's friends have always believed that the stage lost a great actress when Georgie Hopkins married. Two or three years ago I saw her in a little play at a society vaudeville and she acted with a spirit and ease that promises a creditable interpretation of Lady Windermere. Mrs. Spencer, who as Florence Josselyn frequently took part in amateur theatricals, will essay the role of Mrs. Erlynne and her past. Frank Mathieu is stage manager, and the play is to be presented at the little opera house in Redwood City, so it will be a sort of family affair with an audience made of the people who have summer homes in that locality. I believe the proceeds are for the benefit of a church.

Will Be a Great Society Event

In one of the popular plays last season in New York some one says, "Hell and the stage drawing room are two places where there are no stupid people." There is certainly not a stupid moment in Wilde's play and it will be most interesting to see it interpreted by society people. Lady Windermere and her set are supposed to move in the best English society and there should at least be none of the gaucheries which amateurs unaccustomed to social amenities might commit. Perhaps the fact that the blue blood of the promised cast is not a stage "prop" will cast a glamor over any other deficiencies in the production.

Flossie Hopkins on a "Visit"

The other day I saw Florence Hopkins, who is spending her school holiday out here, instead of in Europe as her family had planned. But "Flossie" had a bad case of homesickness and Europe wasn't on the map as far as she was concerned. I doubt whether the youngest member of the Hopkins family will give society the thrills which her sisters furnished when they made their debut and which they have since offered whenever things flatten out perceptibly. Flossie is by many considered the prettiest in the family but she has not the energetic animation which vivifies the others. At present she is a demure young school girl with little liking for society but of course one cannot prognosticate the future when once the social yeast gets working in the blood. At any rate Miss Hopkins does not intend to give it a chance next season. She has been counted upon as one of the important debutantes who would lend distinction to the winter but she prefers going East for another year at school. Most of her young friends made their bow last season or are practicing it for the coming whirl.

Three Suitors Come a Courting

San Rafael is alertly watching a courtship that has developed most of the situations of a pretty little comedy. The young lady has three very determined suitors and she apparently dispenses her favors with an impartial hand that keeps them all toeing the danger line. Not long ago one of the swains took up his abode at the hotel and since "presence" is nine points in the game of hearts which even presents cannot outcount the matchmakers picked this youth for

"Quality Street" and Maude Adams

"We are now accustomed," says John Addington Symonds, "to the art which appeals to educated sensibilities, by suggestions and reflections, by careful workmanship and attentive study of forms, by artistically finished epitomes of feeling, by picturesquely blended reminiscences of realism, culture and poetical idealism." The words recurred to me while I watched Maude Adams' presentation of J. M. Barrie's delicious comedy, "Quality Street." All the things which Symonds mentions Barrie is giving us and, if we may judge the future by the past, will give us more and more satisfactorily with each addition to his dramatic works. This Scotchman who seems to have become a playwright by the chance of successfully dramatizing "The Little Minister" is deserving of the most serious consideration on the part of the dramatic enthusiast. Slowly, quietly he has written his way to the first rank of dramaturgy. It was a long road he traveled from "The Little Minister" to "The Admirable Crichton"; from the latter effort to "Peter Pan" was a jump that took the breath out of criticism; and from "Peter Pan" to "Quality Street" is another mighty progress. "Quality Street" shows Barrie in process of outgrowing his fantastic tendency in favor of an increasing naturalness. There are still apparent in his work defects of technique which cannot be explained away and must be good-naturedly accepted, but the grip on situations is appreciably stronger, the dialogue of a higher literary flavor. "Quality Street" does not depend wholly on stage presentation; it may be read with enjoyment, and in the calm atmosphere of the study its wit may be compared not unfavorably with Pinero's, its tenderness with Jones' and its humor with Shaw's; the pathos is all Barrie's own. Barrie is unmistakably a child of this age; there is no suggestion of the influence of past styles on his work. He mirrors the present in all the healthy characteristics which Symonds mentions; and for those things which Symonds does not mention and which our age is wont to sum up in the overworked word "decadence," Barrie has apparently no sympathy whatever. I wonder if Barrie has ever been called "Sentimental Jamie"? It seems inevitable that he has, and the soft impeachment must be admitted. But his sentimentality is never mawkish; he never maudles his audience. Always through the mist of his tears there breaks a sunny smile and the stage brightens with rainbow hues. This is not a trick of Barrie but a marked characteristic of his art, a characteristic which he shares with all the great humorists. And withal he never forgets those keen satirical strokes which were the chief excellence of the "The Admirable Crichton" and which formed the only part of "Peter Pan" unintelligible to the youngsters.

Consideration of "Quality Street" has come before reference to Miss Adams for two sufficient reasons—because "Quality Street" is absolutely new to us while Miss Adams is an old and very dear friend and because a nice weighing of the comparative merits of the play and the star tips the balance to the side of the play. Miss Adams is not as indispensable for the success of "Quality Street" as she seems to be for "Peter Pan." Casting about for an American actress who could interpret "Peter Pan" as well as Miss Adams, one is at an absolute loss; even Miss Annie Russell must be rejected. But there are probably as many American actresses who could do justice to Phoebe Throssell as there are other American actresses who could, let us say, surpass Mrs. Fiske in Cynthia Karlake—and this does not mean more than two or three. Barrie might have fashioned "Peter Pan" with Miss Adams in mind, for she has a boy's heart from which every syllable of the part seems to throb. Phoebe Throssell is a young lady, a Cinderella without Cinderella's glimpse of wonderland and because this is a more catholic type than that of the fairy lad, it does not belong so intimately and exclusively to Miss Adams; other actresses could interpret it as well. Of course Miss Adams cannot but deeply realize the part; she is a great actress and all she does is informed with greatness. As she felt intensely the joyousness of "Peter Pan," the boy who wouldn't grow up, she now feels intensely the sadness of Phoebe who sees youth slipping from her and grey years coming after grey years gone before. There is passion in Phoebe where there was only childish instinct in Peter and Miss Adams portrays it with hysterical verisimilitude. The elusive feminine charm of Miss Adams' face which reminds one of fine transparent China would gloss many errors in her work, if many errors there were; but Miss Adams need never, in "Quality Street" or elsewhere, plead her womanly beauty in mitigation of bad acting. If she had any such intention she might play "Quality Street" and be forgiven, but she could never play "Peter Pan" or "L'Aiglon."

SCENE FROM ETHEL BARRYMORE'S PRODUCTION OF "CAPTAIN JINKS" Next week at the Van Ness Theatre.

* * * * *

For Miss Adams' "L'Aiglon" only words of the highest praise are adequate. It is a performance instinct with genius of a role that would tax the powers of any actress on earth. Again, as in "Peter Pan," one ponders that marvellous fidelity to the mysterious heart of boyhood which forms the most unusual and most satisfactory manifestation of Miss Adams' artistry. That her performance should challenge comparison with Bernhardt's is inevitable; that it should in many respects overtop that of the French actress will not be admitted by any but Miss Adams' enthusiastic countrymen, until she passes from the narrow confines of the English-speaking stage to the great theatre of continental Europe.

Ethel Barrymore at the Van Ness

Ethel Barrymore is billed to appear at the Van Ness Theatre commencing next Monday night, July 8th, in "Captain Jinks," the comedy by Clyde Fitch that is regarded as the greatest of her many triumphs, and the play that has at least held most favored distinction in her round of successes. It is in this piece, above all, in which she won her first stellar laurels, unexpectedly so to her manager, Mr. Charles Frohman, who did not aim to feature her in the announcements at all, beyond leading her name in the cast. But the genius of the young actress asserted itself and ensured her especial renown on the opening night of the original production, a few seasons since. The comedy of the lines is both charming and simple and the old-fashioned gowns worn in the play by Miss Barrymore excite much admiration and comment. The recent revival of the play by Miss Barrymore at the Empire Theatre, New York, proved a decided hit and had quite a run. Miss Barrymore comes here surrounded by a splendid company quite fitting for this young actress; than whom there is no more popular on the American stage. Ever since the days when she first appeared as the prima donna in "Captain Jinks" right up to the present, she has been coddled in the arms of a public that accepted her without hesitation. And she has been singularly fortunate in the fact that her manager has selected plays for her that have not only proven winners in every sense of the word, but admirably suited to her personal and rare ability.

Alcazar

This coming week at the New Alcazar Theatre will inaugurate the summer season and serve to introduce Mr. Herbert Kelcey and Miss Effie Shannon for the first time engaged in local stock. The vehicle chosen for their opening performance is the society drama "Her Lord and Master," a play in which both won great success in the East. "Her Lord and Master" is in four acts. The curtain rises on the shooting park of an American millionaire in the State of Indiana. It is here that these people, Mr. and Mrs. Stillwater, have lived all their lives and accumulated their wealth. So attached to their state are they, that they named their baby girl Indiana. Indiana is a grown girl just budding into womanhood when a party of English gentlemen, among them a Lord Canning, visits her home. At this stage Indiana believes that she is in love with a young American named Glen Masters. The glare of the title of lady is however too much and she marries Lord Canning and returns with him to England, to which place the scenes are shifted. At home Indiana is a willful, breezy American girl. In England she endeavors at the command of her husband to sink that peculiar individuality. She gets on at this tremendously well until her family call upon her without notice and there awakens her American spirit. Her husband forbids her joining her folks at dinner at a fashionable hotel but she does so despite his injunction. When Lord Canning discovers her disobedience he locks up his castle and forbids his servants to admit his wife when she returns. Indiana gets back after midnight and forces an entrance to the place by climbing a veranda. It is not until the next morning that Lord Canning finds his wife in the castle. As long as Indiana assumes the haughty disdain of the wronged American girl, her husband refuses to allow her to stay. He directs her to return with her people to America while he plans to go on an exploring expedition. Indiana acknowledges her willfulness, declares she will never again oppose her husband's wishes and acknowledges him the lord and master of her life. Mr. Kealey will play the role of Lord Thurston Canning and Miss Shannon will be cast as Indiana Stillwater. The role of Glen Masters will be in the hands of Ernest Glendenning, while Johnny Maher, the comedian, will take care of the role of Indiana's father. The rest of the Alcazar favorites, with the exception of Bertram Lytell, Laura Lang, H. D. Byers and Nera Rosa will be found in the cast.

End of the Frawley Season

The Frawley season at the Novelty Theatre will come to a close with Sunday night's presentation of the very laughable farce, "The Private Secretary," in the leading role of which H. G. Lonsdale has made a great hit. The production is by all odds the brightest and most attractive of any offered by the Frawley players and in consequence has been drawing good houses during the past week. Few of the modern comedies have better lines or situations than this play and when it is given a bright and intelligent interpretation it is one of the most pleasing of stage offerings.

Vaudeville at the Orpheum

The most hypercritical cannot deny the charm, novelty and variety of the Orpheum bill for the week beginning this Sunday matinee. It is headed by Anita Bartling, a recent arrival from Europe who brings with her the reputation of being a peerless and original juggler. Her performance created a sensation in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Berlin, Vienna and Paris and the big cities of the East are unanimous in praising her marvelous skill and dexterity. The Jack Wilson Company, which includes Ada Lane and Albert Green, will make their first appearance in this city. They have chosen for their introduction their cleverest and most amusing skit, "An Upheaval in Darktown." They are all clever comedians who sing, dance and keep the ball of fun rolling. Rose and Jeannette, two strikingly handsome, chic and dainty girls whose eccentric and original dancing created a furore in the chief European capitals, will be a delightful feature. They have but recently arrived from Paris where they have just concluded a five months' season at the Ambassadeurs, a fact which in itself is a flattering testimonial to their abilities. Bert and Bertha Grant, a clever colored singing and dancing team, who are well and favorably remembered will contribute to the entertainment. It will be the second week of Bernar and his Marionettes and the last one of Lalla Selbini, Armstrong and Clark, and Virginia Earl and her company in their musical hit, "A Midnight Mistake." A great novelty is promised in the way of motion pictures.

Ye Liberty Playhouse

Henry Arthur Jones' brilliant society comedy, "The Liars," is the play to be produced next week by the Bishop players at the Liberty Playhouse, Oakland. It is one of the most delightful comedies ever given to the stage, and will be remembered as having been played by Henry Miller, Margaret Anglin and Edward J. Morgan at the Columbia Theatre, in the palmy days of the Henry Miller Company. The present company at the Liberty, especially the women, are particularly well suited to this class of play. The cast will include Miss Mabel Blake, Landers Stevens, Henry Mortimer, recently leading man with Frawley's company, George Friend, Henry Shumer, George Webster, and E. L. Bennison. "The Professor's Love Story," with Frank Bacon, is announced to follow.

Operas and Sport at Idora Park

De Koven's pretty Irish opera "The Highwayman" will hold the boards for one more week at Idora Park and will make way for the charming Viennese opera "The Merry War," one of the best works of the immortal "waltz king" Johann Strauss. After the run of "The Merry War" the Japanese comic opera "The Geisha" will be given a gorgeous production. The new concession at Idora called "The Barrell of Fun" is giving lots of amusement to the patrons of the pretty park. The new "Scenic Railway" is the finest in the West, being an exact reproduction of the one at Luna Park, the leading amusement park in the East.

In the Limelight

The final performance of the Maude Adams season at the Van Ness Theatre will be given this Saturday night when "Peter Pan" is to be presented before an immense audience. It will be a fitting farewell to the charming star who has captivated all San Francisco.

Ezra Kendall will follow Ethel Barrymore at the Van Ness Theatre where he will make his appearance in "Swell Elegant Jones," a comedy presented by him with great success during the past season. Kendall is also to stage a new comedy by George Ade.

It is pleasant to note that the Van Ness Theatre management has booked a fine series of the leading New York successes and not the least attractive is Cyril Scott in the charming production called "The Prince Chap." Scott has not appeared here since he won distinction as one of the leading American stars.

ROSE and JEANETTE

The Parisian Models, direct from the Ambassadeurs, Paris, who will begin an engagement at The Orpheum this Sunday Matinee.

AUTO NOTES

Mr. Howard Davis, of East Auburn, drove his Model "A" Oldsmobile to this city on Saturday last and, in company with a party of friends, will leave for Santa Cruz within a few days, where he will remain for two weeks touring around in his machine.

Miss M. Uhrdall is now the proud possessor of a Model "A" Oldsmobile which she purchased last week from the Pioneer Automobile Company. Miss Uhrdall is very clever at the wheel and the day after purchasing her car, she drove it to San Jose and return. So delighted was she with its performance that she has planned to tour to Los Angeles and other Southern points of interest.

A most remarkable trip was made last Sunday by E. Ginley of this city, and family, in his Model "A" Oldsmobile. A run of 145 miles is reported. The party left San Francisco early Sunday morning, going to Half Moon Bay via Colma, thence to San Mateo and San Jose, and returning via Oakland.

Historical Dueling Fields of America

is no stir, no bustle—not even that of the small country town. You do not see a vehicle move down the street once an hour, and the few so-called merchants sit lolling and sleeping in their doors without even the energy to brush away a fly or a mosquito.

A short distance down the desolate street that holds so many historic memories still stands the famous duelist tavern. An old citizen said to me that in the old days the tavern was a plain frame building with a lawn in the rear, a porch in front and a barroom at the end. The barroom gave access to a stable-yard, which was open on the side next the street and had hitching-stalls set around about. But now it is but a dilapidated ruin, with paneless windows and tumbled-down doors, through which the gentle evening breeze sighed drearily. In the old dining-room many a dueling party has ate and drank and made merry before going out to the too often fatal field. A rickety old stairway still clammers to the deserted chambers where many a grievous wound has been dressed and many a brave man breathed his last.

I stood in the town as twilight faded into night. Old Bladensburg looked quaint in the dying light. The lines of the great elephant-backed houses softened, and the huge, high chimneys that buttress up the leaning gables were really picturesque.

* * * * *

Probably the next most noted old dueling ground is "The Oaks," a few miles up the Mississippi river from New Orleans, or reached by street car via Canal street and St. Charles avenue. I used occasionally, while representing the Southern Pacific Railroad at the Exposition in the Crescent City in 1884-85, take my way through this majestic court of oaks, whose green-gray plumes of long fantastic moss often overcame me with a strange funereal suggestiveness; for here, only a few yards from where the Exposition buildings glorified the incensed landscape with their assurances of peace and progress, had hundreds of the chivalry of New Orleans and ambient country perished according to the dictation of a code that was always cruel and heartrending and often ridiculous and unjust. It was a resort, too, for young masters of the sword, who had learned their tricks from Parisian experts and from the elite of Parisian life, to try conclusions sometimes in couples, and sometimes in fours and sixes, in imitation of the professional duelists in France in the time of Louis XIV and Louis XV.

Indeed, the story holds that in the early years of the Creole City six young gentlemen were strolling together to the plantation of a mutual friend. It was a heavenly night. The moonbeams were weaving their softening spell over a scene of nature soft and languid to voluptuousness. In a breeze fragrant with the kisses from the blossoms of a neighboring orange grove the six oaks gently shook their mossy pendants and made fantastic shadows on the velvet sward.

"What a place for sword-play!" exclaimed one of the party. "I echo your sentiments," replied another, lightly. "Then let us try it," said the first. "A capital idea," answered the other, and he drew his jeweled rapier. In a moment they were at it, and the weapons were quivering in and out with a gaily glittering rapidity that made a mockery of the gentle moonbeams.

"What a pity for us to stand idly by!" observed another of the party. "Let us pair off, then, said No. 4, and they all drew simultaneously. It must have been a pretty sight—those three pairs of graceful and gallant fellows at parry and thrust hard by those grand old oaks that live today. But the play waxed warm; presently the eyes of the combatants outflashed their swords, and when the sun came up over the rim of the level, lovely Louisiana plains with the same suddenness that one notes in his rise on the ocean, he looked on the six oaks, not as usual, but on six ghastly, upturned faces, for which those oaks now stand monumental. One man lingered a few hours over day to tell the story of the night, and now as the stranger steams up the muddy and moody river some aged Creole often points to those oaks with expressions of pity and pride. It is easy enough to infer that, with the descendants of such men, the duello died hard, especially in a clime where the blood burns a little faster than in the states where cotton and cane are not cultivated.

Many of the New Orleans duels of a later date were fought near Ponchartrain and Spanish Fort (reached very readily from the heart of the city via St. Charles and Canal streets.) There was also a dueling field near the United States Barracks, about six or seven miles south of the city, where William Frost, editor of the Crescent, was killed by Dr. Thomas Hunt, in 1851; and where Dr. Cohen, editor of the Staats Zeitung, was fatally wounded by Dr. Wintzel, editor of the Deutsche Zeitung, in 1853.

Perhaps "Bloody Island," opposite St. Louis, ranks next as a noted resort for the settling of affairs of honor in the days when the code duello was partially recognized as an institution. The name is suggestive of sanguinary episodes, and has not the soft-sounding syllables of Bladensburg nor the hearty prettiness of "The Oaks." The name is not inappropriate, however, as some of the most savage encounters recorded have taken place on this bloody spot. Here it was that Tom Benton fought and killed an old North Carolina comrade, an act which he deeply regretted the rest of his life—destroying all the papers concerning the duel he had in his possession, or could obtain, a short time previous to his death.

Even more savage was that encounter between Major Biddle, U. S. A., and Congressman Pettis, when both fell mortally wounded. Not so savage, however, was the duel between Thomas C. Reynolds—who committed suicide in St. Louis in 1896, after having served Missouri as lieutenant-governor and as soldier in the Confederate army—and Benjamin Gratz Brown, afterward a general in the Union army, a United States Senator and vice-presidential candidate with Greeley in 1872. They met with rifles at thirty paces, and Reynolds, who was a dead shot, hit Brown in the leg, as he said he would do.

A large sand-bar opposite Natchez, where James Bowie fought his great fight in 1827, has been a handy place for many Mississippians to settle their disturbances; and upon this sand-bar, in 1846, N. A. Crabbe, who came to California during the gold discoveries, and was beheaded in Sonora as a filibuster, killed an editor named Jenkins in a duel with rifles. It has been estimated that more men have been killed in duels on the Island opposite Vicksburg, which was a peninsula formed by the long bend of the Mississippi until cut off in 1876, than upon any other field in America. The great duelist McClung killed Menefee on this peninsula; James F. Fall, one of the editors of the Sentinel, was severely wounded by T. E. Robbins of the Whig; James Ryan, another editor of the Sentinel, was killed by R. E. Hammet of the Whig, and Henry Foote, who fought four duels in all, met one of his antagonists on this peninsula.

Weehawken, now a part of Hoboken, opposite New York, has been famous for a century as the field where Alexander Hamilton was mortally wounded by Aaron

* * * * *

The scene of many Richmond duels was on the southern branch of the James river about two hundred yards above the old cotton mills in Manchester. Here John Hampden Pleasants of the Richmond Whig was mortally wounded at the third shot by Thomas Ritchie of the Enquirer. This was one of the most sensational duels of ante bellum days, and was fought on February 25, 1846, Pleasants lingering until the 29th. Ritchie afterward married Anna Cora Mowatt, a noted actress. Belle Isle is also a famous dueling place of old.

* * * * *

Staten Island was quite famous as a dueling resort for fifty years leading up to and after the Revolution; and even as late as 1887 Carmel Farach and a countryman, both Italians, fought with swords near Stapleton and Farach was killed. If dueling were still a fashionable pastime in New York Staten Island would probably lay claim to being the favorite pinking ground, especially as so many picturesque duels had been fought in its pretty policies. In the summer of 1871, for example, a gallant Italian general, who had done good service for the Union, kissed his wife and boy and set out for the island to cross swords with a compatriot. The general received a sword-cut in the arm and the fight was over. Happily the law in New Jersey (to which commonwealth Staten Island belongs) against dueling is rigorous in the extreme, and no more swords will ever again gleam in the soft sunshine or magic twilight of that enchanting beauty-spot.

* * * * *

Hostile meetings were so numerous in California between 1850 and 1859 that there were no distinctive places of dueling, unless "The Oaks," forty miles from Sacramento, may be so designated. Here a number of combats took place, notably that between Hon. Edward Gilbert and General James W. Denver, in 1852, in which the former was killed at the second fire. Six miles from Sacramento is Oak Grove, another old dueling ground, where Dr. James P. Dickson was mortally wounded by Philip F. Thomas, in 1854, and where other encounters have taken place. The most famous dueling spot in the State is that near the Laguna de la Merced, where Broderick received his mortal wound; but even this place is not considered a dueling ground. In the earlier days it was the custom, generally, for hostile parties to meet somewhere near or on the boundary line of San Mateo and San Francisco counties, for obvious reasons. But one of the most noted duels fought in California—that between Johnston and Furgeson—took place on Angel Island; Hunt and Hubert fought at the old Pioneer Race track; Nugent and Cotter met in Alameda county; Smith and Broderick in Contra Costa county; Gatewood and Goodwin in Calaveras, Rust and Stidger and Tevis and Lippincott in Sierra, Woodlief and Kewen near Oakland, Crane and Tobey in Marin, Carter and De Courcay in Yolo, Graham and Lemon near Benicia, Gwin and McCorkle near San Francisco, Walker and Graham, Russell and McDougall, Kemble and McDougall, and some others, on the boundary line between San Mateo and San Francisco, while many meetings took place not far from the heart of the Metropolis itself.

"New Chronicles of Rebecca"

When Kate Douglas Wiggin was importuned to write a sequel to "Rebecca" many of her admirers fervently hoped that she would refuse. "Rebecca" was herself, unique and beloved, and a sequel, in which this sparkingly original child would don long skirts, do up her hair and have a lover in commonplace style, was anything but a consummation devoutly to be wished. Now that the "New Chronicles of Rebecca" are in our hands, behold, the same little girl, utterly unchanged, for with an originality all her own, Mrs. Wiggin has simply written the chapters omitted from the first volume, and the picture, instead of being spoiled, is strengthened. True, Rebecca does grow up. She graduates from the Wareham Academy, and we take leave of her as she sits under the sweet apple tree in the May twilight, watching Abijah Flagg and Emma Jane Perkins wandering down through the orchard into the romance land, but her own time is not yet. It is the little girl who is most endearing. Rebecca should never have grown up at all, and that part of her history which will be forever unforgotten comes before her fourteenth year, when she was still attending the district school, marshalling the other children into line, and taking the lead in all their enterprises, for as Alice Robinson said when the Daughters of Zion were holding their election for officers, "Who ever is elected president, you will be, Rebecca—you're that kind, so you might as well have the honor." Happy the community where there is a Rebecca to assume the leadership, for, with all her precocity and go-aheadativeness, Rebecca Randall was as innocent as Sir Walter Scott's pet, Marjorie Fleming, who died in her seventh year. The "wildness" of Sally Perry does not concern her at all, but only the pitifulness of her lonely death, and her baby with no alternative but to be sent, to the poor farm. Abijah Flagg's ancestry might have been of the purest May flower strain, and "Slippery Simpson," despite his thievish propensities, his two terms in jail and his too numerous and ill-provided for family, was so pleasant to talk to. Emma Jane Perkins still continues to be the admiring friend, in the new book, and Minnie Smellie is as objectionable as ever to the straightforward little heroine, though the open manifestation of hostility has been abandoned on both sides, owing to the strenuous authority of the elders. Poor Miss Dearborn, the beloved teacher, has her own trials, for one of the school committee has a daughter who has cast covetous eyes on her salary, and in consequence, the school is found to be deficient in composition. In order to remedy the defect, the girls are requested to keep diaries, and the boys to write a weekly letter. Rebecca, as might be expected, has no mind for anything so commonplace as Mark Twain's first journalistic efforts, which he reduced to an exact science, so that he should fill in four weeks ahead: "Got up, washed and went to bed." She institutes a "Thought Book," with an elaborate title page made up of past, present and future. There are no common thoughts recorded therein. The specific intention of these literary efforts was the production of an essay on the subject: Which has the most beneficent influence on character, punishment or reward? It is doubtful whether the most learned commentator could add another argument for or against, to those adduced by the little girl, and her conclusion: "We do not believe we can find out all about this truly great and national subject until we get to heaven, where the human race, strapped and unstrapped, if any, can meet together, and, laying down their harps, discuss how they got there," has marked the limit of human progress. But it will not do to begin to quote, because of the impossibility of leaving off. To excerpt one passage is but to pass over a hundred others and to mention one incident is like picking one daisy from a field. How the little Riververo girls adopted a baby; how they organized a missionary band, and what came of their efforts to convert the wicked; how Elijah Perkins won title to a cow, and how his father was induced to turn over a new leaf; what good fortune came to Clara Belle; how Abijah Flagg rose from his humble position as a chore boy; how Rebecca saved the flag, and how there came to be that particular flag; are all set forth in Mrs. Wiggin's own style. Aunt Miranda Sawyer's plain, blunt, common sense and caustic comments are not the worst discipline for her precocious little niece, whose feet are thus held to the earth. Those sentimentalists who deplore the tendency towards race suicide would do well to consider the weight carried on this child's shoulders, that mysterious mortgage which she must clear off her mother's farm, and the little understood disgrace that was supposed to attach to such a blight, for, in spite of her sunny disposition, the black cloud ever loomed on her horizon. It is to be hoped that other authors who make children the subject of their writings will cull a leaf from Mrs. Wiggin. It seems to be an accepted canon of the craft that whenever a child has occasion to write, the first requisite shall be to misspell every word in some fantastic fashion and never, by any accident to get one correct unless it be a, I or O, in which case pains are taken to misplace the capitals. Rebecca Randall is no rival of Noah Webster, but her errors are made when she is striving after "genteel words," in which she finds her small dictionary painfully deficient. Moreover, her writing room is in the barn loft, and her dictionary in the house, and more experienced authors than this child know only too well what becomes of ideas if one stops to search for words, much less mere details of the letters which compose the words. The late Thomas Bailey Aldrich characterized "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm" as the very nicest little girl in bookland. One can add nothing to that. Like all really good children's books it is equally enjoyable by those who have not forgotten their own childhood. The two Rebecca books should be in every house where there are girls, either of the age for present enjoyment, or growing towards it. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Gillett on Unionism

Not alone has General Funston of the "unwhipped mob" thrown down the gage of battle to the proud leaders of labor unionism in San Francisco. Funston is a servant of the United States and holds his lofty commission independent of the mightiest labor leader who ever bossed the San Francisco workingman. He may enjoy the luxury of free and untrammelled criticism with no thought of the disagreeable aftermath; with no fear of revenge or reprisal. Comes now, however, one who might not unreasonably be suspected of a politic tenderness for the feelings of those who wield the might weapon of enfranchised American manhood and of whom might not unnaturally be predicted a consequent conservatism of utterance that bears with the foibles of classes while not too greatly compromising with truth. Comes none other than Governor Gillett, chief executive of a state which includes the city most powerfully organized, from the unionistic standpoint, of all the cities in the country; comes, nevertheless, Governor Gillett with frank and unqualified criticism of union labor. Speaking at San Jose on the Fourth of July the governor, after dwelling on the evils that spring from law-breaking corporations, turned to what he regards as a kindred evil. "On the other hand," he said, "the people of America are facing another danger fully as great as that which proceeds from organized wealth. Organized labor, which was originally a great and farseeing movement designed to raise the standard of living among the working classes, has now become oppressive—as all good movements become when they gain the upper-hand. Labor unions have become arbitrary, unreasonable and overbearing—until they are in the minds of many people as great an evil as the trusts. The true solution of the present difficulties is to curb alike lawless capital and lawless unionism." Here is no new light suddenly thrown upon the system of organized labor, exposing evils that have hitherto lain in shadow. It is simply a plainly worded reiteration of what has been spoken before to the extent of wearying monotony; what everybody knows and everybody except the rabid champion of union labor readily admits. The words, however, take a factitious significance from the personality of the man who uttered them. He holds the highest public office in the state; he has had no small experience of public affairs; has given them no little careful thought; and is not wont to overcharge the measure of his thought in preparing it for public expression. More than that he has had exceptional opportunity to study the labor union situation from an unbiassed position. Governor Gillett had the good fortune to come into San Francisco during the first struggle between the United Railroads and the union carmen in the present strike. When all San Franciscans were wrought to a pitch of enthusiasm, either for or against the cause of the striking platform men, which was too high for cool judgment, the governor came to the scene of the trouble with a fresh mind, not preoccupied with prejudice but open to deliberate conviction. His first racy comments on conditions which were novel only to himself served somewhat to startle San Francisco from its complacent acceptance of the violence and murder which until then seemed inevitable in every big strike. Here was a governor who did not fear to characterize the crimes of the strikers with ugly words selected from the penal code and to denounce, not, it must be admitted, with the scrupulous personal particularity affected by General Funston, but still unmistakably, the leaders who were plainly responsible for the violations of law and order. And now, with the same impartiality, carefully balancing blame between predatory capital and predatory labor, Governor Gillett returns to the charge, apparently reckless of consequences indifferent now to the fulminations of the McCarthys, the Tveitmoes and the Corneliuses as he was formerly indifferent to the menaces of Gompers, the governor has said his say about organized labor. He finds it oppressive, arbitrary, unreasonable and overbearing and he insists that it be curbed. Reiteration by the governor of these sentiments cannot fail of definite results. It will arouse the sleeping consciousness of San Francisco and mayhap will inspire some of our timorous leading citizens to call their souls and their tongues their own when unionism is under discussion.

Some Advice Needed

A little coterie of highly intelligent labor leaders admitted, last week, after a conference with President Calhoun of the United Railroads, that the Carmen's Union was guilty of injustice in ordering the street car strike. They asserted that after a thorough investigation they had reached the unanimous conclusion that the strike was ordered in wanton violation of the general rules of the union. We cheerfully felicitate these labor leaders on their candor, but at the same time we must deplore the illogical position they have assumed. For these highly intelligent individuals to whom has been delegated the task of conserving the interests of organized labor in this city, and in whom has been vested the power of determining all questions affecting industrial peace, have not only confessed the injustice of the Carmen's Union; they have also insisted that this union shall be given the opportunity to add insult to injury. In substance they have said to Mr. Calhoun: "Yes, it is true; organized labor has been wrong from the beginning and you have been right from the beginning. You have been treated with great cruelty. We have ruined much of your property and we have caused you a loss of more than one million dollars, but the prestige of organized labor is paramount to all else in this world. You must reinstate this union which appears to have suffered defeat in consequence of its injustice and its cruelty. You must discharge the American citizens who came to your assistance when you needed assistance, and you must put to work the men who have attempted to destroy your property, and by their reinstatement make it possible for them to cause another strike whenever the caprice seizes them. If you do not comply with our demands we will endeavor to win this unjust strike; we will try to destroy your business." It should be obvious to the average intelligence that these labor leaders who insist that the recognition of a union that unjustly and wantonly destroyed the industrial peace of a community is essential to the prestige of organized labor are very much in need of a little wholesome advice. And it is to be regretted that this advice has not been given by some of the zealous representatives of the several agencies now employed in regenerating this unfortunate city. We hear a great deal these days about the importance of putting the management of the municipality in clean hands, of the many influences that are now retarding the growth of the city, and of the great civic patriotism of the reformers who are deeply concerned with the vital problems affecting the public welfare, but there is a most impressive dearth of sentiment on the subject of the tyranny of organized labor. The men and newspapers whose affection for San Francisco is most profound, according to their own testimony, are not unconscious of the fact that there is a great deal of distress in this city at present. Being in touch with the political and commercial affairs of the city they know that there are many thousands of idle men on the streets; they know that some large retail stores have had to negotiate with their creditors to avoid bankruptcy and all because of this street railroad strike, but their concern for the public welfare has not yet impelled them to give the Tveitmoes and the McCarthys and the other representatives of the unwhipped mob a little wholesome advice. So far their sympathy for the community has not proved stronger than their reluctance to offend organized labor.

A Pernicious Practice

Said Don Quixote to Sancho Panza when the latter was about to assume the role of Governor: "Him whom thou must punish with deeds, do not revile with words; for the pain of the punishment is enough for the wretch to bear without the addition of ill language." This is a precept which we cordially commend to the consideration of Judge Dunne and other pious and virtuous jurists who are addicted to the habit of moralizing sanctimoniously before pronouncing sentence on convicted transgressors. The law strictly prohibits punishment of a cruel nature; and it is unquestionably a species of cruelty to compel a man who is about to be sent to the penitentiary to stand up in a crowded court-room and listen to ponderous platitudes uttered reproachfully by a petty jurist inspired by no higher motive than that of promoting publicity. This practice of brutally lecturing miserable wretches convicted of crime is the survival of a custom which was most congenial to the infamous Jeffreys. It has no sanction in the laws of our country. It should go the way of all cruel and inhuman punishments that have been long since successfully decried by an educated public sentiment. Our judges are merely functionaries for the administration of justice, not for the execution of penalties of their own devising. When a statute provides that the maximum penalty for an infraction of the code is five years, the court has no right to assume the privilege of augmenting the punishment of the offender by rebuking him in language calculated to excite the mob to vociferous applause. The court is not vested with authority to determine whether the penalty fixed by statute is inadequate. If courts were vested with such authority then perhaps they would be justified in subjecting prisoners to poignant humiliation. But in the absence of such authority judges should be more scrupulous in their attitude toward unfortunates who come before them for sentence, especially since the question of guilt is yet to be finally determined at the time of the pronouncement of sentence. It quite often happens that a man who has been cruelly humiliated by a judge fond of implying his own virtue by deploring the viciousness of others, is subsequently vindicated and set at liberty. But we never hear of an apology being offered by one of the inflexible and garrulous moralists of the bench to the innocent and helpless victim of his exasperating verbiage. And yet the setting aside of a verdict of guilty is usually the result of errors committed by a judge disinclined to vouchsafe a fair trial to a man charged with crime. We can conceive of nothing more discreditable in a judge than a disinclination to err on the side of mercy; nor can we conceive anything more preposterously incongruous than an unmerciful, cruel judge in the role of moral lecturer reprobating men for yielding to unholy passions.

Our Musical Deficiencies

An innocent and highly idealistic foreigner, Hendrik Christian Andersen by name, has presented to San Francisco the plans of a world monument dedicated to music and incidentally to the other fine arts. Discouraged by the poor prospect of seeing his hopes realized in Rome, this bearer of a name immediately suggestive of fairies and the world of impossible things turns with fine romanticism to the western city of the future. It may be our magnificent dream of rebuilding on the Burnham plan fired his imagination. If this be so may he never visit San Francisco. He would find, it is much to be feared, that the American love for the ugly, the inharmonious and the claptrap are quite as prevalent here as they are in the eastern states where beauty and utility are ordinarily as far apart as the poles. This however is but the vagrom criticism of Herr Andersen's beneficent intention that strikes the mind on first consideration of its architectural aspect; it also contains implications regarding our musical advancement that suggest fruitful topics for meditation. Our one popular educator in music is the Golden Gate Park band which, incidentally, is the only permanent organization of its kind on the coast above the oompah order. It renders music, generally light and nearly always good, on every fair Sunday, and it keeps a not too secure grip on continued existence by the grace of the United Railroads which rings up the fares of the thousands who assemble to hear it. The serious music on which San Francisco must depend for the satisfaction of a more or less clamorous appetite fills two short seasons at the Greek Theatre in Berkeley, popularly supported it must be admitted. Its supporters may not all be sincere in their admiration of the higher forms—there is nothing intellectual for which the culturines do not profess an admiration—yet is the symphony really educating a large number of those with leisure time to spend. Aside from the park band and the Berkeley symphonies there are only to be considered, in casting up our musical accounts, the claptrap musical "conservatories." Without regard to thoroughness of training these misnamed institutes aim only at a certain facility in performing the showy. They treat music not as a high art which has developed down through the ages and never so fast as in recent times, but as a conglomeration of pleasing sounds known as "tunes." The higher forms, popularly grouped as "classical" merely, with a fine indifference to the distinction between the classical and the romantic, are by these delectable institutes treated as if apart from "natural" music; as though in fact they were a cultivated taste like limburger cheese or caviar. It would obviously be wrong to expect aught but the pestiferous noisemonger as the graduate of such institutions. It may be that the artistic courage of Herr Andersen, daunted before the musical shortcomings of Rome, will still pluck up heart of grace in the face of these acknowledged musical deficiencies. And yet would it be advisable to check the onrushing enthusiasm of an idealist with the tempered common sense of those who know how very far we have still to go along the pleasant road to perfect musical accomplishment. Instead of attempting what is obviously impossible at the present time, why may not the wealthy patrons of the art musical found on a humbler scale a high grade conservatory of music which, through lectures, recitals and concerts at a small nominal price, may implant a true conception of the grandeur of music and the scope of its art? No matter how small it may be in its beginning, public sympathy is sure to be aroused and touched and a great conservatory might arise before its founders are aware. A real feeling for the most abused of the arts has made the Berkeley symphonies successful; it would do as much for San Francisco with the proper encouragement.

Getting On In the World

Now that the schools and colleges all over the country have graduated the annual output, and the honor members of the various classes have formulated their specifics for improving mankind, the youths and maidens who have been surmounting the artificial difficulties of an easy course of study are beginning to find themselves up against the real facts of existence. Most of these tender fledglings have erroneous notions of finding work suited to their ideas, but not for them is Success waiting with outstretched arms. The triumphs of this world are won by those who, early in their career, see the wisdom of grasping the best that presents itself and adapting themselves to exigencies. The latest recruits in the ranks of fortune builders have been listening for years to sage advice on the importance of climbing to the top of the ladder, pushing to the front, and hitching their wagons to a star; all of which is very good advice when it can be translated into practicability, but many an adventurous urchin who has tied his sled to some swiftly moving vehicle and has been unable to hold on to his conveyance has lost his own toy, and got only a nasty tumble with such wisdom as he could glean from the disaster to reward him for his temerity. Pushing to the front might be easy provided that everyone else was not likewise elbowing his way and unwilling to relinquish his hard earned vantage for either polite requests or sharp elbowings. Climbing to the top round of the ladder is not exactly a gymnasium stunt. Nor does it make a great deal of difference what the average youth undertakes so long as he goes at it with sufficient determination and interest. Once in a generation or so a genius is born; and it makes little difference what his environment may be; he will find his own place in the world. The majority have not even talent, much less genius, and the best—indeed the only substitute for either is hard work. Comparatively few of the successful men of the world, even if we restrict success to its commonly accepted definition of the accumulation of wealth, have remained in the calling in which they began their careers. Just as few have found their success in the career which was their youthful ideal, but all have given their minds to the thing their hands found to do. The majority began at the beginning and worked their way to the front because they were prepared for each advance step before it was offered to them. One may arrive at a destination just as quickly by riding on the rear platform of a train as by insisting on a place in the engineer's cab.

Nature Fakers

Though the fury of the combat over the iniquities of the nature fakers has subsided a bit common sense is not yet in possession of the field. The presidential protest, we are told, was interposed in the interest of the Child. The professional educator is to the front once more impressing upon us the importance of scientific training and truth. It is fortunate that children are neither so wise nor so foolish as those set in authority over them, and that a very wise provision of Mother Nature, which furnishes the race with a forgettery equally as reliable as its memory, prevents the perpetuation of many follies. If the genus educator could be eliminated, or at least deprived by a surgical operation of the pernicious propensity to secrete a pill of wisdom in every spoonful of the jam of enjoyment, children would read their "Lives of the Hunted," their "Animal Heroes," their "Call of the Wild," and all the other animal stories with the same degree of enjoyment, and just as little perversion of their understanding as, in their nursery days, they listened with glistening eyes to the moving tale of "Little Goldenhair" without for a moment believing that there ever was or would be a family of three bruins keeping house in human style. Most of the books which have fallen under the presidential ban were written as stories, not as scientific treatises. The authors had no intention of furnishing text books and they are not to be blamed for the follies of the wise, who assume that everything they see in print is solemnly sworn to before a notary public. Most children who have not been treated to a course of predigested and peptonized "instruction" have native sense enough to know that whatever may be the truth concerning families, genera or species, the individuals differ one from another. Any boy who has owned two puppies, has learned that however many common traits they may have possessed as dogs, one had natural tricks and acquired accomplishments which the other could not master. Let two canary birds be as much alike as identical feathers and form can make them, yet their owner, be she five years old, fifteen or fifty, can differentiate them by the things one will do which the other will not do. Give a little girl a dozen dolls each duplicates of all the rest, and she will discern marked differences not apparent to any one else even after she has pointed them out. Children, who are supposed to have had their brains softened by the improbabilities related of Buck, or Lobo, or Mooswa, or White Fang, are very well able to comprehend that though dogs or wolves or bears or moose in general may not have been in the habit of acting just so in similar circumstances, there is always room for the exception. One of the most amusing phases of this whole controversy is the unanimity with which Kipling's "Jungle Books" are recommended as having passed the thirty-third degree of merit. There are some of us who remember the same kind of condemnation which was meted out to Kipling in his day, when it was confidently proclaimed that no human child ever was or could be raised as Mowgli was. Indeed the whole nature faker controversy is but the rethreshing of old straw. One wonders, now and then, how it has happened that the iniquities of "Aesop's Fables" have escaped detection all these years.

Perspective Impressions

Mayor Schmitz threatens to demand vindication at the polls once again. And there are many timid souls who hope that he is merely jesting.

Agreeing upon a man for Mayor is the toughest task that has yet been undertaken by our little band of reformers.

Though Town Talk was the first paper to advise the Washington authorities to transfer the Atlantic fleet to the Pacific we are not quite certain that the transfer was made at our suggestion.

When Senator Newlands recommended the Galveston plan for San Francisco he echoed sentiments that were expressed in this paper more than a month ago.

The War Department shows no signs of marooning General Funston for giving offense to the mighty McCarthy. If the War Department doesn't watch out Tveitmoe will begin wading through oceans of blood.

Detective Burns thinks that Mayor Schmitz is insane and that he should be committed to an asylum. We move that Judge Dunne be empowered to select a commission to ascertain the Schmitz state of mind.

Megalomania is a form of mental intoxication which is always accompanied by grandiose delusions under the influence of which a man sometimes assumes the air of a Bombastes Furioso. Sometimes it afflicts a victim with the hallucination that the liberty of all men is in his keeping.

The Coming Conflict

By Edward F. O'Day

For all its cynical affectation of detachment from theological interests ours is probably one of the most profoundly religious ages in the history of serious human thought. While professing utter disregard for the dogmatic restrictions imposed by the different churches it lends an attentive ear to every variation of belief, to every manifestation of sincere faith and to every earnest effort looking toward the reconciliation of the opposing churches and the resolution of those fundamental difficulties that seem to erect insuperable barriers between creed and creed. Its very attitude of seeming indifference is but a pose adopted to conceal a palpitating eagerness for definite theological conviction. Following a cycle in which religion was fashionably flouted this age is somewhat backward about openly avowing its intense preoccupation with doctrinal questions, but beneath the pretense of pessimistic scepticism is an underlying avidity for the mental restraint imposed by religious faith which cannot be ignored.

The undoubted prevalence of agnosticism may seem to contradict this emphatic leaning toward definite and positive belief, but there are not lacking indications that the disciples of Hume and Spencer occupy a stricken but deserted field and that the creedal battle of the future will be fought over totally different territory. Of all the gnosologic theories that of philosophic nescience seems least in sympathy with the current religious tendencies of mankind. It would seem that men are toughening their fibers for a contest which will sanction no dalliance in that luxurious middleground where the inevitable asperities of positive belief are softened to a lazy uncertainty. In this struggle it seems probable that dogma is to be boldly opposed by dogma and that rival propaganda are to assail each other in uncompromising frontal attack.

Because it alone of all the creeds of western civilization fails to exhibit those elements of disintegration that discount future availability for so tremendous a struggle as this will surely be, it would appear that Catholicism is to bear the brunt of the fighting on one side; while on the other it seems more than probable that all sympathetic elements will merge their differences under the ever-advancing banner of Socialism.

Coincident with prosperity unexampled in the world's history and a constant approach to the mastery of the forces and resources of nature, there is exhibited in the countries of Europe and America at the present time a spirit of restlessness and discontent, a dissatisfaction with social and economic conditions that must be reckoned the greatest antagonist of organized religion. This for the twofold reason that it is wreaking itself on ecclesiastical dogma (as though in resentment of the tranquillity of firm belief) and building up a diametrically opposite system (at times even boasting a ritualistic accompaniment) with socialism as the cornerstone. That this spirit does not of necessity spring from unbearable social or economic conditions but frequently co-exists with unusual material happiness gives to it most, perhaps all of its significance. Those in whom it inheres have come to believe that that betterment of society in which they see the obliteration of their discontent will come through the evolution of the altruistic and social elements in humanity and the modification or deletion of individualism; in other words through the adoption of the socialistic program.

It may seem that between socialism which, however pragmatic it may be, does not trespass on purely religious grounds, and Christianity which usually stands aloof from purely economic and political systems, there can be no real antagonism. In truth there would not be if the extremists among socialists did not obstinately insist on forcing the issue by deliberately endeavoring to beat down Christianity to make way for their own propaganda. The attitude of the scientific socialists is consistently offensive to the church as represented by orthodox Christianity and Christianity, of course, cannot afford to disregard the wage of battle thrown down by so powerful an opponent without incurring the suspicion of compromising cowardice.

However wide may seem the divergence between socialism with its sweeping appeal to types as different as the philosophic striver toward reform of current abuses and the ignorant proletariat inflamed to discontent over conditions he but vaguely understands—however wide may seem the divergence between this system and that esthetic cult which with varying bases is yet broad enough to include all whose exaggeration of the importance of individualism has led them to the extreme reaches of the humanistic theory of life, yet is it undeniable that the two systems will converge, the better to carry on their common warfare against organized religion. To both the principle of renunciation, of self-sacrifice on which Christian morality is grounded is equally abhorrent. Socialism enforces this idea with all the resources of a specious terminology peculiarly adapted to please the ear that has been attuned to the harsh clangor of labor, the piercing shriek of suffering and the low moan of poverty. Estheticism, on the other hand, makes its appeal sensuously, having enlisted much of the artistic power of the age in its behalf. It attacks deism by indirection. First belittling godhead by a mocking anthropomorphism it rejects the grotesque being its genius has thus created and puts aside the meting rod with a hypocritical humility that affects hesitation to "approve on God its science of theometry." Radically different as are the two processes, the two systems finally reach what is practically common ground. Regarding man as primarily unmoral and ethics as an artificial product of political conditions they join hands over a sort of modified Hobbism that hides grotesque inconsistencies but reconciles them sufficiently for the purpose of a united and menacing assault on the ecclesiastical idea.

That this ecclesiastical idea is coming more and more to mean, in the eyes of its most determined enemies, the Christian religion as embodied in

Mr. Heney and the Press

That distinguished apostle of public spirit, the Hon. Francis Joseph Heney, has developed an intense and inextinguishable hatred of the press. He has become a press baiter of the most virulent type. Whether in the role of star performer at a prandial symposium or in his more congenial occupation of platform swaggerer, this garrulous little professional reformer is never so vehement as when hurling the shafts of his congenital spite at the joints in the harness of the Fourth Estate. His passionate pounding of the press has excited much surprise, since it is generally known that in him we have an excellent illustration of the wizardry of the press in transmuting mediocrity into the semblance of precious worth. The Hon. Francis Joseph is distinctly a press made lawyer. He began the cultivation of newspaper boosting long before Attorney General Knox, at the instigation of Don Cameron of Pennsylvania, took him up and enabled him to pick up a little practice on the strength of his pull at Washington with the lobbyists of the Trusts. In those days Mr. Heney was not a reformer. Those were the days when his pull at Washington saved Judge Humphrey of Honolulu from removal despite the petition of the united Hawaiian bar. But now Mr. Heney is so zealous as a reformer one might imagine that he has always been open to a divine illumination and that in his daily walk he has been elevated by intercourse with the spiritual world. And the press which has nourished in him an egoistic complacency and pretension, a hard and condemnatory spirit toward his fellow-men, he reviles with such well simulated antipathy as almost to compel the inference that the sins of journalism torment his virtuous soul.

Heney Supported By Philosophers

Far be it from me to suggest that Mr. Heney is hypocritical in his pose as a reformer. The charge of hypocrisy is one that I would make against no man; for I conceive it to be the ugliest charge that can be made against a human creature. Critics of human conduct are too reckless with charges of hypocrisy; as they cannot read the soul they cannot very well reach conviction respecting sincerity. Mr. Heney's sentiments I prefer to regard as the natural crop of a mind where the soil is chiefly made up of egoistic passions. He is in all probability sincere in his strictures on the conduct of the press. He realizes that to the press is due most of the credit for his triumphs and this realization does not inspire pleasing emotions. He would like to persuade himself as well as the general that he did it all with his own little wit. Perhaps he has convinced himself of this and is now intent on convincing the public. It was Aristotle, I believe, who said there is nothing that expires so soon as gratitude. But I would not be understood as intimating that Mr. Heney is ungrateful. If, as I have heard, in his great zeal as a hired special prosecutor he has been most assiduous in his efforts to indict men to whom he owed a debt of gratitude, that circumstance would not in my opinion be conclusive of the mean spirit which hostile critics have sought to impute. There have been philosophers who have argued that a man's first duty is to the State and that one should have the reins of friendship as loose as possible, so that they can be tightened or let go at pleasure; for, in their opinion, ease is the chief essential to happy living, and this the mind cannot enjoy if it bears, as it were, the pains of travail in behalf of friends. To this same school belong those learned philosophers who endorsed the policy of Philus, the devil's advocate, which recognized the morally wrong as the politically right. This allusion is not insignificant since it shows that Judge Dunne is not without some authority for those rulings in the Schmitz case which seem to be in defiance of law.

The Fruit of His Censure

Whatsoever be Mr. Heney's motives in attacking his ally, the press, there should be no doubt respecting the effect on the public mind: Mr. Heney's attacks greatly increase the respect of the reverent groundlings. These attacks are proof of his courage and his independence. I have no doubt that in fulminating against that press, which has become the main element of unreason and stupidity in the judgment of an undiscerning public, Mr. Heney believes that he is standing on a moral elevation to which the objects of his censure are compelled reluctantly to look up; also, that his conduct in its loftiness and its purity is a perpetual rebuke to low and vicious desires. For with such zeal has Mr. Heney devoted himself to the task of earning the big fee which he is to be paid for rescuing the city from loathsome hands and turning it over to the tender mercies of Mr. Spreckels of the Sugar Trust and the ineffable Mr. Phelan who gave us the charter, he has come to regard himself as a reformer at heart as well as at purse. The power of self-hypnotism is well developed in the patriotic Mr. Heney. If it were not for that subtlety of self-presentation by which a man gives us a fairly correct impression of his character not by what he means to convey but by what he inadvertently enables us to discern, I should probably find it somewhat difficult to trace the labyrinthine self-delusions of the voluble and vehement little barrister. Far be it from me, as I have suggested, to intimate that Mr. Heney is not convinced of his own superior virtue. I would not suggest that Heney is entirely sensible of his own transfiguration; that, for instance, he has the slightest recollection of ever having received a fee from the Spring Valley Water Company, a corporation whose principles are notoriously as pure as its water, and which never having bribed a supervisor was not in need of investigation at the hands of the Oliver grand jury. I am prepared to believe that Heney has forgotten that he defended Judge Noyes of Nome. It would not be hard to persuade me that he believes he has been prosecuting crooks all his life and never fingered a cent of tainted money. Therefore I am not inclined to scoff when this pompous little personage indulges in a riot of gratuitous accusations against my daily contemporaries. If there is any incongruity in the circumstance of his sitting in judgment on the press and affecting a virtuous prejudice against people afflicted with the weaknesses of human nature the probability is he is as ignorant of it as a blind man is of his image in a glass.

Opportunities He Has Enjoyed

In one sense Mr. Heney is eminently fitted for the role of press critic. He is perhaps more familiar with the ways of the local dailies than any other member of the local bar. Through a remarkable and unprecedented co-ordination of circumstances the interests of the daily press have been made to dovetail with the interests of the Prosecution, and Mr. Heney has had opportunities never before enjoyed by a lawyer for observing the ways that are peculiar to the modern newspaper. He has seen the proprietors of our dailies go the distance in the achievement of their ends, which ends we should all be willing to believe are the ends of public justice and civic purity were it not for the white light reflected upon their civic patriotism by their servile attitude toward the carmen's union during the recent strike. Mr. Heney has learned something of the power of the press. He has learned something of its ingenious methods for inciting public clamor, for persuading timid judges, for adding to the size of small lawyers on the right side and reducing the stature of big lawyers on the wrong side. Indeed the circumstance that is most conducive to doubt in my mind respecting the sincerity of Mr. Heney is that after engaging the amiable offices of the daily press and conniving at many of the things that have been done in his behalf to enable him to accomplish some of the results which I know that he knows could never have been accomplished without those offices, he pretends to believe that the morals of the newspapers to which he is indebted are worse than those of the sworn officer of the law who has been a party to the transactions by which it has been sought to promote civic purity in this demoralized metropolis.

How Courts Are Intimidated

By way of illustration of the advantages Mr. Heney enjoys from the co-operation of the press I will point to the deft allusions that have been made by each of the dailies to the Court of Appeals, since the conviction of Eugene Schmitz. Nearly every time that a newspaper has referred to the appeal to be taken from Judge Dunne's rulings it has been said that the defense hopes to bring political pressure to bear upon the jurists of that tribunal. After that assertion had been repeated several times in the public prints then the dailies told us there was a wicked rumor in circulation to the effect that the court had been reached. Most surprising would it be if something in the nature of a rumor had not sprung from the oft-reiterated assertion by the organs of the Prosecution that political pressure was to be brought to bear on the court. It is perhaps needless to inform my readers that this suggestion of political pressure was in furtherance of the designs of the pious and zealous attorneys for the Prosecution, one of whom is the virtuous Francis Joseph Heney a voluble retail talker, who, when discussing the morals of his co-adjutors of the press indulges in wholesale assertion and vague declamation, but never has any criticism to offer respecting practices designed to intimidate judges. Mr. Heney knows that a statement to the effect that a court is about to be subjected to political pressure is likely to give that court the impression that its integrity will be impugned if it does not decide against the interests which are to receive the benefit of such pressure. Mr. Heney knows that such a statement is not conducive to justice, but I have not heard him protest against the sinister aids employed by the newspapers to quicken the political regeneration of the city in the interest of several distinguished civic patriots. Mr. Heney, it is my opinion, knows that the Court of Appeals is composed of judges who are much more deserving of public esteem than some of those with whom he has been dealing. Moreover he knows that it is not safe to have any honest court review the entire history of the graft prosecution.

His Potentialities for Good

It is too bad that the thrasonical little lawyer, while he has his hand in, doesn't smash the dailies for their real delinquencies. It is too bad that he conceives the support of the labor unions essential to the main triumph for which the Prosecution is striving; for otherwise he could hammer the dailies to some purpose on their affected indignation at the truth spoken by General Funston, on their persistent coddling of the unions while affirming their devotion to the moral and financial interests of the city, on a thousand and one things that justify the inference that their rage against the rich victims of Abe Ruef's extortion is as empty of conviction as that of a pantomime king. It is to be regretted that Mr. Heney doesn't find it consistent with the interests of his employers to let his personal partialities inspire his moral theorizing. The newspapers have made such a big man out of him that his words carry considerable weight, and he could do some good with sincere criticism. And there will never be another time so propitious as the present for effective preachments against the frail and fickle press. In the course of a few months the newspapers will begin the work of exposing the Heney feet of clay, and a little later the current eidolon will be in ruins. The fragments of Heney's prototypes strew our daily pathway. We have but to look about us to see outcasts who once were horsed on an idea, appealing to an ephemeral prejudice, disseminating distrust and hatred, scoring the triumphs of momentary enthusiasms. Heney is bound to go the way of the rest. He shall learn that in the human breast the sentiment of kindness transcends the spirit of hatred. So, I say, there is no time so propitious as the present, for Mr. Heney's star is at its apogee. The press will run on long after the Heney star returns to its nebular state, and then will come the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune. That Mr. Heney might persuade the newspapers to behave themselves I am inclined to believe. He tells us himself, that he has whipped the Chronicle into line. The Chronicle, he says, is the enemy of the Prosecution, but he has brought the big stick to bear on Mr. De Young. In other words he has found it expedient for the furtherance of his beneficent purposes to put restraint on the liberty of the press. The story of this whipping into line as related by the attorneys for the prosecution has been so widely disseminated that I am surprised the Chronicle doesn't assert its independence and defy Mr. Heney to do his worst. It is pretty tough to be whipped into line by Mr. Heney, but much tougher to have Mr. Heney boast about it.

Otis and Heney

As a whipper-in of the press this Miles Gloriosus of the bar has not been entirely a success in Los Angeles, a city which he recently honored with his pompous presence. There he received some attention from General Harrison Gray Otis, Editor of the Times, the most successful and influential daily newspaper in the West. Readers of the San Francisco dailies have not been supplied with all the news of the Otis-Heney mix-up. It is against the policy of the local dailies to give all the news relating to the personality of the chief graft prosecutor. So when Otis throws a little light on that sacrosanct personality, mum is the word in San Francisco newspaper offices. But when Heney sputters one of his characteristic bombastic retorts it is exploited hereabouts in screeching headlines. Hardly had the Hon. Francis Joseph arrived in Los Angeles when we were informed that he accused Otis of being subsidized by Patrick Calhoun. He based this charge on the fact that Calhoun purchased thousands of copies of the Times containing an editorial roast on the graft prosecution. Of course Mr. Heney doesn't believe that Otis roasted the graft prosecution for hire. He didn't say that Otis roasted the graft prosecution for hire. He preferred as usual to insinuate base motives. But it should hardly be necessary to state that insinuations against the integrity of General Otis are kindly received in Los Angeles only by the sansculottes of well whipped labor unionism.

An Arizona Jury Scandal

When Heney eructated his invectives against Otis it was because the militant editor had rasped him on the raw. From deftly expurgated news columns we learn that Heney replied in forceful language to the false charge that he had been convicted of the crime of killing an old man in Arizona. But no such charge was made against him. This is the language of the Times in its reply to the insinuations of the Sugar Trust's attorney: "It is as absurd to charge that the position of the Times, taken seventeen years ago and sustained with many hard blows against all comers, ever since, was influenced by the sale of a few papers last year to Mr. Calhoun, as it would be to hold the Times morally responsible for the killing of an old man in Arizona by Heney, or for the conviction and punishment of the same Heney by an Arizona court for having had improper relations with a jury before whom he was trying a case."

The Artful Dodger

To the foregoing the Hon. Francis Joseph Heney who hates corruption in all its moods and tenses and who has no fear of being righteous overmuch made prompt reply. But in this prompt reply there was no reference to the jury scandal. Heney preferred to misinterpret the Times. He preferred to discuss the murder case. He denied that he had ever been indicted for murder. Thereupon the Times pronounced Mr. Heney a dodger. "Why did you dodge and twist and squirm, Mr. Heney?" asked General Otis. "The offense for which you were convicted and punished was not the killing of Dr. Handy, but professional misconduct as an attorney in having had improper relations with a jury before whom you were trying a case. The Times so stated. It printed the actual court record. Why did you misquote the Times, Mr. Heney? Why did you wiggle away from that jury-mixing case?" To these questions Mr. Heney made prompt and vigorous reply. "I'll send General Otis to jail," said the Hon. Miles Gloriosus Heney. The thrill imparted by these words is due to Mr. Heney's reputation for "making good." In "making good" as a prosecutor Mr. Heney is wonderfully felicitous. And it is no disparagement of his achievements to condemn his methods. He said he would send Ruef to jail and Ruef is in jail. The day after he said he would send Ruef to jail he went into sequestered retreat and said gloomily to a friend that he had made an ass of himself, but lo! and behold! along came Claus and Rudolph with money to burn, and like the hero of a melodrama the Hon. Francis Joseph was enabled to "make good." And now the Hon. Francis Joseph, feeling that he is something of a wiz, talks of sending men to jail after the manner of a witch of other days pronouncing fatal imprecations on the heads of unfortunates.

The Charge Against Otis

Upon what charge the Hon. Francis Heney is to send General Harrison Gray Otis to jail it would be interesting to know. With Judge Dunne to preside and ready to appoint an Elisor selected by the Prosecution to handle the jury, it probably doesn't matter much what charge is preferred against the Los Angeles editor, but still as a friend of General Otis I am curious to know the character of the offense of which he is to be accused. Libel is the charge usually made against editors, but Mr. Heney is too wise to give an editor the opportunity to prove the truth of offensive matter. When Attorney Moore adjudged him a rascal he was content with the retort that the old gentleman was a liar, thus preferring to join issue and let the matter drop. I am confident that General Otis is not to be jailed for libel. I believe that Mr. Heney realizes that while strictures on personal character should never enliven a polite controversy, it is eminently fit and proper that the calcium should be turned on his personality since he has made it an element of the graft prosecution. I would censure General Otis severely for raking up the ashes of Mr. Heney's dead past in Arizona were it not for the pretension on Mr. Heney's part of being inspired not by the jingle of the Spreckels coin but solely by his hatred of corruption and all forms of dishonesty. While a comprehensive review of the Heney past cannot illuminate the question of the degree of a bribe-giver's turpitude, yet if Mr. Heney is to have the ear of the court, of the Grand Jury, of the elisor and of all the other functionaries of justice upon the theory that his personal character is above reproach and that he is acting as the arm of a spiritual power for the regeneration of a city it might be of some importance to ascertain whether his virtue is congenial or merely an ornament assumed for a gala occasion. In his capacity as public prosecutor Mr. Heney has been smudging character with a very free hand, and his words have had considerable weight because, owing to his aggressiveness in the role of civic patriot, the lawyer, the enthusiastic advocate, has been differentiated in the public mind from the sincere and virtuous reformer. In the circumstances it is well that the public should know whether Mr. Heney is a really-truly reformer or only a make-believe. As for General Otis, by the way, his patriotism has been put to the test. Long before Mr. Heney was dry behind the ears General Otis was fighting for his country. And many years later when Mr. Heney and I were both able to go to the front for our country and General Otis might well have been resting on his laurels, Mr. Heney and I were taking our ease and comfort in little old San Francisco while General Otis was enduring hardships and risking his life in the hot jungles of the Philippines. This Otis is the man that the flippant Mr. Heney airily talks about sending to jail as though it were a matter of as little moment as the state of Abe Ruef's health.

The Handy Case

Since writing the foregoing I have received a copy of the Los Angeles Times of July 5th containing a despatch from Tucson, Arizona. If this despatch does not recite facts then Mr. Heney should have no difficulty in sending General Otis to jail for libel. In this despatch is recited the history of the killing of Dr. Handy. The Times correspondent also gives a lot of very interesting data respecting the career of Mr. Heney in Arizona, and quotes from the court record in the murder case to prove that Heney's version of the shooting which he recently gave in Los Angeles conflicts materially with his sworn statement made on his preliminary examination. It is a very interesting story as published by the Times, but as I am merely the historian of the Heney-Otis controversy, and unable to verify the assertions of the Times' correspondent, I refrain from printing the sensational recital. Suffice it that the story presents Mr. Heney in a most unfavorable light.

A Humorous Situation

It is unfortunate that the gentlemen behind the Graft Prosecution are such sober-minded individuals. While they are conscious of many of the needs of the city they have no appreciation of the wholesomeness of unrestrained gayety. It is within their power to contribute to the gayety of this community on a most elaborate scale, but they have not the disposition to mitigate the miseries of existence in the slightest degree. The humor of the situation into which they have maneuvered themselves is of an exceptionally fine quality. If the lid were taken off the whole town

JUDGE DUNNE

Whose "lecture" to that most miserable of culprits, Eugene Schmitz, was characterized by Attorney Wm. Metson, in open court, as cruel and inhuman punishment. The above excellent likeness of the learned jurist was sketched by a Chronicle artist during the Schmitz trial. It is one of several sketches that were published by the Chronicle and that gave rise to the suspicion that the great daily was not friendly to the Prosecution.

would guffaw till its sides ached. But the distinguished strategists are sitting tight. To be candid with the community is not in line with their policy. After trying for more than three weeks to come to an agreement in the matter of the selection of a mayor they substituted the shameless Boxton for the moral idiot, Gallagher, and then announced that as they would not do politics they were resolved to call a convention of laborites and capitalists for the purpose of accomplishing the task which had been given up as a bad job.

Playing Politics

Soberly and without the suggestion of a smile the public is informed that Mr. Spreckels will not play politics with the situation he controls. The frank and veracious Mr. Heney imparts the information that the convention is to be called to convince the people that the Prosecution is adhering to its promise to keep out of partisan politics. The humor of these affectations of disinterestedness is not difficult of discernment. If Mr. Spreckels believes that it would be playing politics to select a mayor, then why have he and his associates been trying for three weeks to agree upon a mayor? Would it not be less like playing politics to select a mayor openly and above board than to call a convention which the gentlemen behind the Prosecution know that they will control absolutely? They know that through Furuseth and Macarthur they will control the eight delegates from the Labor Council and that they will dictate the appointment of the delegates from the Merchants' Association, and that finally Mr. E. J. Le Breton, or some other gentleman of high standing having implicit confidence in the integrity and ability of Mr. James D. Phelan and willing to be guided by that distinguished publicist, will be elected Mayor.

A Lemon For Hearst

There need be no fear that the Prosecution will select a bad man for Mayor. Mr. Spreckels and his associates are intent upon giving the city a Mayor who will reflect the highest credit on the Prosecution and who will win prestige for the Prosecution's political machine. But in calling a convention and representing the motive to be that of avoiding the political game the Prosecution is disingenuous. That course was taken because Mr. Spreckels and Mr. Heney were afraid to incur the enmity of the Examiner. The gentlemen behind the Prosecution who are incensed at everybody that does not give them enthusiastic support, have not the most unbounded confidence in one another. Though disinclined, as they say, to do politics, it is politics pure and simple that divided them on the mayoralty question. Langdon wanted a Hearst man for Mayor and Spreckels wanted a Phelan man, and it now looks to me as though they are about to hand Hearst a lemon. If the convention were held tomorrow Mr. Le Breton would be elected Mayor, and Mr. Le Breton was one of the leading, dominant figures in the Non-Partisan Convention which took orders from James D. Phelan.

Ruef Is Still the Boss

The report that Ruef is to do politics for the "reformers" from his Fillmore street near-jail is true. Several of his old followers, who have since been promoted by the newspapers from the indignity of "henchmen" to the dignity of "lieutenants," privately inform me that they have been summoned. They say Ruef frankly admits that he will remain undisturbed in his present elegant quarters until election is over. Elisor Biggy, who once denied Ruef communication with the members of his own family, now very graciously bows in the politicians.

Maestretti and His Sovereigns

"Sovereigns of America" is the modest title given by Frank Maestretti to an organization unobtrusively active in the 39th and 40th assembly districts. Maestretti was the first of the graft administration to supply useful information to Detective Burns. He procured the services of G. M. Roy, who later served to trap Boxton and Lonergan. Maestretti's object for some months previously had been to supercede Ruef, who was getting rich at a somewhat more rapid rate than himself. In part with this plan, he founded the "Sovereigns of America" into which he intended to force all of the city's six thousand employes. Ruef, becoming suspicious, blocked the activity of the Sovereigns for the time. Maestretti retaliated by fighting Ruef in the primary election, the Republican convention and again at the general election. During the graft exposures the immune Maestretti was lost sight of. Nevertheless, though a recluse from the public gaze, he is now the most active machine organizer in the city. His "Sovereigns" are quietly feeling into neighboring assembly districts with a view to enrolling the job hunters and municipal contractors under one banner. What makes them the more formidable, I hear, is their ritual, which is a travesty on masonry as full of bloodcurdling oaths and penalties as a Chinese tong. The "Sovereigns" make a great outward pretense at good citizenship and clean politics. Their real intent can only be surmised from the character of the promoter. Patriotism is a shrewd issue, as it enables the "Sovereigns" to stand by and observe which way the "trap falls" before committing themselves.

Thronging the Yosemite

With a standard gauge steam railroad winding along the banks of the Merced River to a point within eighteen miles of Bridal Veil Falls the Yosemite Valley no longer seems remote from civilization. The heart of California's fairy land is now so easy of access that no Californian can ever again afford to confess familiarity with the scenic wonders of Europe and ignorance of those that abound in the Sierras. And Californians are availing themselves of the new facilities for reaching the Yosemite. They have been pouring into the Valley so numerously that the Sentinel Hotel and Camp Curry have more than once been crowded to capacity. The Concessionaires of the Valley are doing a tremendous business and the artists who have their studios therein are selling their pictures at vertiginous prices. Chris Jorgensen who recently returned from Mexico with a large collection of fine sketches is again at work on Valley scenes and

Their Boots Were Too Short

The Sierra Club is well represented in the Valley this season. The ladies of the club have been perspiring along the trails to Vernal Falls and Glacier Point proudly scorning the burros of Concessionaire Kinney. Several of the ladies discovered after donning their trail costumes that there was a great hiatus between the tops of their boots and the bottom of their skirts, and there was much grieving over the circumstance until somebody suggested that the harness maker of the 14th Cavalry might be able to lengthen the boots. Quickly the ladies consulted the harness maker and he filled their hearts with gladness by affirming his ability to abate the hiatus. Of course it became necessary for him to take the measurement of several fair and shapely limbs. This he was permitted to do and with such little show of diffidence that he was astonished. The story of the patching of the Sierra Club ladies' boots has been told at many a camp fire of late.

The Commandant

The boys of Troops M and I of the 14th Cavalry are enjoying life in the Valley and they contribute in no small measure to the gayety of the season. Major Benson, the commandant and special representative of the War Department, is a very strict disciplinarian, but he enjoys the esteem of his men. Some of the Concessionaires who have a keen and pleasant recollection of the lax discipline that prevailed in the days when the Valley was under State control are not ardent admirers of the Major. They think he is something of a crank. And he probably is, but he loves the Valley and he has some very good ideas respecting the manner in which it should be managed; and he may be depended upon for a sympathetic and zealous administration. He has the cordial support of all his subordinates, and as a consequence the army camp in the heart of the Yosemite is a model one. One of the most active officers in the camp, by the way, is Dr. Ernest Johnson of the Bohemian and Family Clubs who has a hospital on the banks of the Merced that might almost cause a man to yearn to be ill.

A Call For Volunteers

One night recently there was much excitement at the Sentinel Hotel. Two young women, members of the Camera Club, who, early in the day, started on a jaunt to Vernal Falls, had not been heard from. As they were not accompanied by guides their friends and relatives feared that some dreadful accident had befallen them or that they were lost in the woods. As nothing short of an untoward happening could be conjectured as the cause of their failure to return before sundown, there was justification for the most harrowing misgivings. To expect a guide to go in quest of the missing women was unreasonable, for the guides in the Yosemite prefer to travel the narrow, precipitous trails in daylight. About ten o'clock that night Major Benson heard the report of the excitement and alarm at the Sentinel, and he aroused his sleeping troopers and called for volunteers. Instantly there was response from nearly every tent in the camp. The Major accepted the services of Corporal Conway, Corporal Frew and Private Young, and this trio started on the hazardous journey up the steep grade of the narrow trail that winds along the mountain side in the direction of Cloud's Rest. They were mounted on their big troop horses, and as they climbed the grade they caused a panic among the denizens of the forest. The echo of their horns could be heard from Happy Isles to Glacier Point.

Corporal Conway Injured

It was long after midnight when they reached Vernal Falls. They had found no trace of the missing ones. They started up the trail to the top of Nevada Falls, and on that trail Corporal Conway's horse stumbled and fell. The Corporal's companions were quick to render him assistance. Fortunately he was not seriously injured, but one of his knees was badly bruised and his horse received several wounds. He remounted however, and on the trio pressed, up over Nevada Falls and along the mountain ridge to Glacier Point where they arrived just before dawn. Everybody in the hotel on the summit had been aroused by the soldiers' trumpets, and the lantern lights of the men in khaki were watched with consuming curiosity as they grew more and more distinct throwing their faint radiance over the eternal snows of the Sierras.

A Curious Reception

When the soldiers made known the object of their visit they were greeted with smiles. The missing young women were among those present. It was explained that after starting for Vernal Falls, they met friends bound for Glacier Point and decided to accompany them. It had not occurred to them that their failure to return would cause alarm. However, since their friends were so anxious, the soldiers, they suggested, should immediately return and assuage anxiety. But the brave, gallant volunteers were in no mood for further risks and discomforts. They preferred to have something to eat and to wait until daylight before descending the precipitous trail. That the heroic conduct of these men was not unappreciated by those in whose behalf it was exhibited I am quite sure, for I was informed that before leaving the Valley the Camera Club ladies presented the soldiers with a box of candy. The heroic troopers now regard the whole matter as a joke, but their comrades are somewhat resentful. They have a very lively appreciation of the dangers braved by the three volunteers, and they feel that such conduct merits at least words of commendation and expressions of gratitude.

Heroic Judge Graham

The hero of the Yosemite this year is Judge Thomas Graham of San Francisco. The judge spent a few weeks in the Valley with his family, and he had some very thrilling adventures. Indeed the judge had a most exciting and strenuous vacation, and by the time he started on his homeward journey the whole valley was talking of his amazing activities and his wonderful nerve. The judge is something of a camera artist and like Seton Thomas or Thomas Seton or whatever be the name of that great animal student, he loves the pleasures of the pathless woods and the raptures of intercourse with the monarchs and other fauna of the forest. One day he encountered a bear near Happy Isles and took a snap shot of the brute. The next day he was at Inspiration Point and there encountered a venomous rattler which he also snapped and afterwards killed. These were not his only thrilling adventures. He rescued a four year old youngster from the icy embrace of the treacherous Merced. The little fellow fell off a bridge in deep water. Judge Graham threw off his khaki coat and plunged in. He quickly seized the lad, but both were swept down the stream by the swift tide. Fortunately the judge is a strong swimmer and managed to reach shore with his unconscious burden. The story of the judge's heroism quickly spread from camp to camp, and on the Fourth of July a delegation of campers waited on him with a petition to deliver an oration, which he did. Further proof of his versatility was given on the following Sunday when he "served mass" for Father Fitzgerald in the little chapel in the Valley.

The City Chap and the Driver

The stage drivers of the Sierras are no longer the picturesque characters that Bret Harte was fond of introducing to his readers. The Yuba Bills of Calaveras and Tuolumne have passed into tradition, but their successors are conscious of the romantic memories that cluster about the box seat of the stage coach, and one or two of them make feeble efforts to display those quaint characteristics which are popularly believed to distinguish the cynical philosophers of the mountain roads. Perhaps the most interesting of Yosemite Valley drivers in this degenerate day is Al. Sleeper, a white bearded, pot-bellied individual who handles the ribbons on one of the stages that carry passengers from the terminus of the Yosemite Valley railroad to the Sentinel Hotel. He has all the traditional pride of the four-horse teamster, and he views the tenderfoot from the city with something in the nature of contemptuous forbearance. On a recent morning shortly after the hold-up of the Wawona stage, a fashionably attired individual, of athletic build and unobtrusive demeanor, swung himself onto the front seat just before the stage driven by Sleeper pulled out of the El Portal camp. He bowed to the driver, and the latter coldly acknowledged the salute, cracked his whip and started up the grade. The passenger on the front seat seemed to be preoccupied with the scenery as they jolted along over the narrow mountain road. He asked no questions. The experience was a novel one for Al. Sleeper. He is accustomed to being plied with questions of so familiar a character that he has a large stock of witticisms on hand which serve to enliven the monotony of the journey and improve his reputation as a humorist. On this particular morning the passenger on the front seat seemed to be entirely devoid of curiosity, and Al. Sleeper talked exclusively to the horses for more than two miles. The strain was growing unbearable and presently he wondered audibly when Black Pete would hold up another stage.

"Is that the fellow's name?" asked the stranger.

"Yes, Pete's been holding 'em up."

"I'm surprised that somebody doesn't take a shot at him," said the stranger.

Al. Sleeper laughed a mocking laugh. "You don't suppose," he said, "that any of these city chaps that come into this valley would dare to take a shot at Pete, do you?"

"Yes," said the stranger, "I think there are city chaps that wouldn't be afraid to take a shot at him."

At this moment the driver had trouble with his horses and began to whip one of the wheelers unmercifully.

"Stop beating that horse!" commanded the passenger.

Al. Sleeper almost fell off the seat in surprise; but he quickly pulled himself together and roughly advised the stranger to attend to his own business. "I'm attending to my own business," said the city chap, "when I tell you to quit beating that horse. I'm a horseman, and I know that horse doesn't deserve the treatment you've been giving him, and I'm going to make it my business to see that you don't maltreat him any more."

The manner and tone of the city chap made a deep impression on Al. Sleeper. He put his whip aside and drove on. The stranger again preoccupied himself with the scenery, and the conversation was not resumed.

The stranger was "Strikebreaker" Farley, who spent a few very pleasant days in the Valley.

After the Tehuantepec Business

San Francisco business men, engaged in traffic with the south, would do well to keep their eyes on the new Tehuantepec transcontinental railroad built by Mexico. That government endeavored to have the Pacific Mail give its transcontinental traffic exclusively to this new route instead of dividing it with the Panama route. The offer was declined. Now an agent of the Vanderbilt lines is in Tehuantepec with a view to ascertaining whether it will pay to sign the concession for a Vanderbilt line of steamers from New York to the Atlantic port of the railroad and another line between Salinas Cruz, the Pacific terminus, and California and Oriental ports. Are San Francisco firms too small to handle the business at their own doors? There are those in the commercial world who believe that this Tehuantepec route is destined to become a sharp rival for business with the Panama canal.

Return of a Wandering Artist

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Peixotto are being warmly welcomed in San Francisco. While Mr. Peixotto avers that his heart is in California, he has confessed that this is only a visit to his native city and that he feels that his work calls him East. In the last few years Mr. Peixotto's work with the brush has shared honors with his studies in black and white, particularly his French and Italian gardens. The Italian gardens were the first work of this character which the artist attempted, and they so delighted him, and the general public as well, that he has determined to make this his special line of painting. The Peixottos are at present staying in Berkeley. Mr. Peixotto has retained a studio in New York and his home in France. Many delightful affairs are being planned in his honor.

Mulcreavy's Record

It is popularly supposed that every department of the city government under the Schmitz dispensation has been conducted in a manner conclusive either of dishonesty or incompetency. This supposition is unjust to one official whose record is in most praiseworthy contrast with that of the chiefs of all other departments. I refer to County Clerk Harry Mulcreavy who has kept his department free from scandal and applied therein business methods through which he has achieved fine results. Elected on the Labor Union ticket, he was loyal to his party in the selection of his deputies, a circumstance that excited derision in political circles as it was thought that the staff would prove absolutely incompetent. But the men soon demonstrated their ability, and they have won for Mulcreavy the commendation of the bench and bar. Hitherto it has been the ambition of county clerks to make the department self supporting, but Mulcreavy has eclipsed all records by placing it on a paying basis and contributing some $50,000 a year to the city treasury.

The Winton Company isn't afraid of "skidoo." In selecting space for the fall show in New York, Vice-President Henderson of the Winton Company, ignored superstition and chose space 23, so that Winton cars will again be exhibited directly opposite the main entrance of Madison Square Garden.

William Letts Oliver, the Oakland banker, with his wife and family, went to Del Monte in his White steamer for the week end. Most of the driving was done by Leslie Oliver, an athlete of Lick.

This famous Cordial, now made at Tarragona, Spain, was for centuries distilled by the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) at the monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, France, and known throughout the world as Chartreuse. The above cut represents the bottle and label employed in the putting up of the article since the Monks' expulsion from France, and it is now known as LIQUEUR PERES CHARTREUX (the Monks, however, still retain the right to use the old bottle and label as well), distilled by the same order of Monks who have securely guarded the secret of its manufacture for hundreds of years and who alone possess a knowledge of the elements of this delicious nectar.

Mrs. Alexander May Soon Wed

I hear from good authority that Mrs. C. O. Alexander is having the time of her life in Paris and that she has but to choose between three eligible men,—a rich American, an Englishman of good family and a titled Frenchman. The loyal friends of Mrs. Alexander will be delighted to hear this for she has long had the sympathy of those who sincerely liked her. Her best friend is Mrs. Gus Spreckels who has never lost an opportunity to further Mrs. Alexander's interests. Mrs. Alexander's married life was not all a bed of roses, and since her husband's death she has had a hard battle to fight. Through all her difficulties she maintained an air of serenity.

Mrs. Mumford-Grant Heard From

Ethel Watts Mumford-Grant so well known here continues to get into the public eye now and then. She is still the merry, ebullient Ethel as of yore. She was one of the guests at a kimono party given a few weeks ago by Edmond Russell an apostle of the aesthetic cult in New York and created a sensation by executing a pas seul that everyone declared to be worthy of a professional danseuse. Edmond Russell it will be remembered gave readings in San Francisco several years ago on the subject of "Aesthetics." He wore a long white robe during the lectures.

"Addie" Mizner's Vicissitudes

One of Mrs. Mumford-Grant's most loyal friends is Addison Mizner who collaborated with her and Olive Herford in the "Cynic's Calendar." Addison, I hear, is almost entirely identified with the Bohemian set of New York nowadays and is no longer the chief ornament of Tessie Oelrich's drawing-room. At one time it was thought that he would step into the shoes of Harry Lehr but since Wilson Mizner's escapades became the main feature of the dailies, Addison's star waned so far as the 400 was concerned. Addie I imagine doesn't mind very much as he is of the happy-go-lucky temperament and New York is big enough for him to find all the divertisement he wants. I hear that Edgar Mizner amused a group of his friends very much not long ago. Picking up a daily paper he read the head lines, "Fiend Sets Large Building on Fire"; no that can't be Wilson. "Murdered in Street Brawl"; I don't find brother's name here. "Embezzler Caught"; not Will! "Shoots Woman on Crowded Street"; is that Wilson? No I don't see his name! "Well" (with a sigh) "I guess we are not in the papers this morning!"

Mrs. Carolan's Protege

One of the most picturesque personages to be found in the drawing-rooms of San Francisco ex-patriates in Paris is Mary Garden who today is the idol of Paris. She is more popular than was our own Sibyl Sanderson, and is considered to be a greater artist. She was sent to Europe by Mrs. George Pullman, mother of Mrs. Francis Carolan, to study, but I hear Mrs. Pullman no longer is enthusiastic over her young protege—why no one knows although there were many surmises. Mrs. Carolan though, I hear is generous enough to declare "la petite Garden" to be the greatest artist on the stage today.

Made Papa Pullman Cry

The story of how the Pullmans became interested in Mary Garden will soon become the property of the press-agents before she makes her debut with Hammerstein this autumn. As the Garden family were in rather straitened circumstances Mary was obliged to do drawing-room singing. She sang Scotch songs inimitably. The Pullmans heard of her and asked her to sing at one of their evening soirees. Mr. Pullman was so affected by her rendition of "Annie Laurie" that he broke down and cried. After that Miss Garden was a frequent visitor to the Pullmans house where she was paid generously for her songs.

The Newhalls Are Coming

Mrs. Mayo Newhall with her trio of pretty daughters will return from Paris this autumn after a visit of two years in the French capital. All three of the girls have been studying vocal music and French and are always ready to do stunts for drawing-rooms whenever they are asked. Margaret is said to have made up with her fiance so that her marriage will probably take place some time before the summer flies. Like so many of our San Francisco society people the Newhalls go in for the ultra-Bohemian set when they are abroad. At home these people are painfully conventional and stiff necked as far as Bohemia is concerned, so that they welcome the relaxation once they are able to escape.

Russian Princess, he was much courted by the "400." And now Professor Henry Morse Stevens is being feted and feasted in the homes, country homes just now, of the San Francisco society matrons. Perhaps it should not be said that he succeeds "Jerry" Landfield, because Professor Stevens certainly is not in the "pink tea" lion class. He is a most welcome guest in many of the beautiful homes of our prominent families, Mrs. Hearst and the Charles Stetson Wheelers counting themselves fortunate to number him among their summer guests. Thus far this season he has been quite a knight of the road, spending a few days here and a few there. His unusual and charming personality and his ready wit have made him hosts of real friends who openly rejoice when he admits that his heart has become wedded to California, and that he will be content to pass the rest of his days near our city which in his own words is simply "teeming with atmosphere."

Enter, "Fussing": Exit, "Queening"

It must be a curious experience for staid oldsters, who do not take their English irreverently, to try to translate the speech of some young relative who is toying with a college education. In the East the latest coinage for a flirtation is "fussing." I heard a youth who is just home from Harvard telling his father, a well known banker, that he didn't "fuss" much last year. "One should never fuss: it is undignified," approvingly nodded Papa. "Oh, but you know some of the girls are the real Delaware peach and a fellow has to look the other way not to get fussed up," sagely responded the youth, and every one promptly asked for a translation. The crude western college man is still "queening" but no doubt before long he will be "fussing."

Her Heartfelt Appreciation

The distinguished ladiewriter who makes social prestige for ambitious unknowns in the columns of the Examiner has discovered the summer school at Berkeley; and she gives it her cordial endorsement. It is to be hoped that she will also vindicate her faith in it by condescending to avail herself of its advantages. She wrote something about the school for last Sunday's paper, and after reading what she wrote I realized that her appreciation was heartfelt. For this is what she wrote: "We hardly appreciate the wonderful advantages afforded us by the brainiest men in the country, for if we did, in some way, to take advantage of the lectures given by the most brilliant men from the best colleges in the United States and we'd join those classes in the college town. It is a rare chance that the Berkeley faculty has offered us and our society people are just beginning to realize the great good that is being bestowed on us by having the six weeks of summer schooling."

"Golf Week" at Del Monte

In spite of the counter-attractions of the automobile gymkhana, "golf week" at Del Monte passed off quite successfully. There were nine entries for the Del Monte Cup for men, eight of whom qualified. These were Douglas Grant of the Burlingame Country Club,

A Letter From the Prince

There is a dearth of social news these days due in a measure to the absence from town of many of the formerly active participants in the social whirl and in a measure to the friction engendered by the Graft Prosecution. Not in many years will the entente cordiale be revived in San Francisco society. And during the next few years we shall hear frequent reports of snubbings and function frosts the cause of which will be easily traced to the ruptures resulting from the ruthlessness of the vindictive spirits that have sought to gratify envy and spite. Apropos existing dissensions a story is going the rounds of a letter recently received from Prince Poniatowski, formerly of Burlingame now in San Francisco. "I suppose," he said, "that of late some of you have had occasion to recall that I once declared that no gentleman would receive a certain rich citizen of San Francisco in his home."

To a Therapeutic Thespian

By Louis A. Robertson

I'm a Master, not a mummer, I'm a Maker, not a mime,
While you're mouthing melodrama I am writing rhymes sublime;

While you're strutting like a peacock on an amateurish stage,
I am penning pure poetics that shall live from age to age.

You're a thespian physician, but your therapeutics turn Into ranting, raucous phrases which the cognoscenti spurn;

You're a sot like old Silenus, but your betters you asperse
With maudlin mouth and tyro tongue and a costermonger curse.

I'm a priest of Dionysus, oft the rich ripe grapes I crush,
Then I drink the purple vintage till its raptures through me rush;

I hear the hymns sung by the stars and I dream the dreams divine,
Till a mystic murmur woos me in the whisper of the wine.

Many of the peerless poets drained the brimming bacchic bowl,
While they voiced the vibrant verses which through endless ages roll.

What a bright erotic glamour 'round the Teian's brow doth glow!
How he loved the rose-wreathed chalice! How he often made it flow!

Villon, Bobbie Burns and Byron, Edgar Poe and Paul Verlaine
Heard the anthems of the angels when the booze burned in the brain.

As all liquor-loving poets wear Fame's fair and laurel crown,
So all drunken actor-doctors deep in Lethe's waters drown.

Ethel Barrymore in "Captain Jinks"

By Edward F. O'Day

When the announcement was made that Ethel Barrymore would open her engagement here in Clyde Fitch's "Captain Jinks" the first question which occurred to those who saw the impossible Elizabeth Kennedy in this wretched play was—why has it been revived? No doubt the same question bothered those who saw the play for the first time at the Van Ness Theatre with the charming young woman of the house of Drew-Barrymore in the leading role. Why has "Captain Jinks" been revived? Only the gentlemen who formulate the plans of the theatrical syndicate and whose ways are usually clouded with mystery can return a satisfactory answer to the question; and as these gentlemen are wont to preserve a sphinxlike silence in such matters, we can only speculate on the probable causes. If memory serves aright Ethel Barrymore appeared in at least two plays during the past New York season. One of them was "Alice-Sit-By-The-Fire," J. M. Barrie's satire on the problem drama; the other was a socialistic play called "The Silver Box." Neither was a brilliant success, perhaps because New York did not appreciate the delicate Barrie satire and preferred to take its socialism from Upton Sinclair. It may be that the failure of these two ventures accounts for the revival of "Captain Jinks"; in that case it would seem to illustrate a favorite dictum of the gentlemen of the theatrical syndicate to the effect that the public prefers an innocuous, vapid drama of love and prettiness to the more serious offerings of the intellectual playwrights. Certainly there can be no gainsaying the fact that the success of "Captain Jinks" with Ethel Barrymore in the principal part is immediate and overwhelming. Enlightened criticism may throw up its hands in disgust, but public opinion, sitting in the loges, the orchestra and the gallery, beats its palms together in rapturous applause. All of which, nevertheless, still falls short of satisfactorily accounting for the revival of this inane Fitchism while Ethel Barrymore has so many good plays in her repertoire. "Captain Jinks" is like all the Clyde Fitch plays—a painstaking, uninspired dramatization of one or two hackneyed ideas bolstered up with a number of time-worn stage properties. In "The Girl With the Green Eyes" Fitch gave us jealousy and a Cook's tour; in "Barbara Frietchie," insanity and the American flag; in "Captain Jinks," he serves love and crinoline. Just enough of the first dish to tickle the youngsters and sufficient of the second to please the oldsters, and the trick is done. It is a trick Clyde Fitch has played over and over again and played so well, with such a workmanlike knowledge of stagecraft, that he induces extreme irritation in those who suspect him of talent sufficient for bigger things. It must be admitted, however, that Fitch has been singularly successful. Ida Conquest cast the spell of her magnetism and charm over "The Girl With the Green Eyes" and made carping an ungrateful task. Ethel Barrymore works a like magic with "Captain Jinks." She carries the three acts—bell-boy humor, puppy love, deaf-mute comedy relief, salad pathos, and all—right through to a triumphant issue. All Fitch's elaborate brushing-in of local color would not save the play from utter damnation without Miss Barrymore's soft voice, her demure, bobbing gestures and her arch smile. What a commentary on Clyde Fitch! and what a compliment for Ethel Barrymore! Only once does Miss Barrymore fall short of her author—at the climax of the second act when the soaring Fitch emotionalism leaves her far behind. In that scene alone "Captain Jinks" makes too great a demand on Miss Barrymore and she fails to invest her part with plausibility; but as the climax referred to is stilted, bathetic and unnatural, it is no great aspersion of her powers to admit that she does not rise to the occasion. At all other times during the play Fitch is obligated to his fair and fascinating interpreter. It is to be hoped that some day he will cancel the heavy debt he owes the savior of "Captain Jinks" by writing for her the real drama of which he occasionally seems capable.

Stage

"The Moth and The Flame"

Following their artistic success at the Alcazar this week in "Her Lord and Master," Mr. Herbert Kelcey and Miss Effie Shannon will appear Monday evening in an elaborate production of Clyde Fitch's society drama, "The Moth and The Flame." In this play the support of the leading roles will be a great deal stronger than in "Her Lord and Master" and a well balanced performance is assured. "The Moth and the Flame" was written by Mr. Fitch for Mr. Kelcey and Miss Shannon, and was a great success when produced by them in New York.

Orpheum Vaudeville

Benjamin Chapin in his own one act play, "In The White House," in which he impersonates Abraham Lincoln, is to be the principal feature of the Orpheum bill for this week beginning this Sunday matinee. Mr. Chapin has made the physique and manners of Lincoln a profound study and it is said that the imitation of the Martyred President's outward characteristics is little short of marvelous. Mr. Chapin will be supported by his own company. Willard Simms, one of the most popular comedians the Tivoli ever had and now a successful vaudeville star will, with the assistance of Edith Conrad, a handsome and accomplished young actress present the diverting sketch "In Flinders' Furnished Flat." A novel act will be given by Muller, Chunn and Muller, hoop rollers. It will be the last week of the Jack Wilson Co., Rose and Jeanette, Bert and Bertha Grant, Bernar and his Marionettes, and Anita Bartling, the famous European Juggler. There will be new Orpheum motion pictures.

At the Van Ness

Ethel Barrymore has created quite a stir with her production of "Captain Jinks" at the Van Ness Theatre. The house has been crowded to the doors at every performance of the fantastic comedy. On Sunday night the 21st, Ezra Kendall begins his engagement in the new comedy, "Swell Elegant Jones" which was written especially for him by the author of his other success, "The Vinegar Buyer." Mr. Kendall has one of those typical Kendall roles which he has so individualized and the result is that the humorist-comedian appears in his best moods. "Swell Elegant Jones" is said to be one of the biggest hits of the past season and the best play in which Kendall has yet appeared.

Idora Park

"The Merry War," one of the prettiest of the many pretty operettas by Johann Strauss, will be produced in splendid style by the excellent opera company at Idora Park. The beautiful Viennese waltz movements with which this work abounds are simply irresistible and the book is an exceptionally clever one. The full strength of the organization will be utilized in this offering and Paul Steindorff's complete operatic orchestra will have fine opportunities for displaying its skill. The next offering will be "The Geisha" and Wallace Brownlow, one of the finest baritones on the light opera stage will make his debut as a member of the Idora company. Brownlow was last heard here with the Mme. Butterfly Co. at the opening of the New Van Ness Theatre.

Ye Liberty Playhouse

J. M. Barrie's comedy, "The Professor's Love Story," will be the offering next week at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, and in the role of the old professor, Frank Bacon will make his re-appearance with the company after an absence of nearly a year. Bacon has always been a prime favorite with Oakland audiences and he is sure to receive a warm welcome on his appearance Monday evening. Justina Wayne, a California girl who has met with considerable success in the East, particularly in "The Prince Chap," will make her first Oakland appearance in "The Professor's Love Story" as Lucy White, and the supporting company will include Blanche Douglas, Georgie Cooper, Mabel Blake, Madelaine Maxwell, Henry C. Mortimer, George Friend, Henry Shumer, George Webster, and E. L. Bennison.

In the Limelight

Ethel Barrymore is doing an immense business at the Van Ness Theatre. "Captain Jinks" will be the bill throughout her engagement of two weeks. There will be Wednesday and Saturday matinees.

It is announced that the special season of melodrama at 25c and 50c will be inaugurated at the Novelty Theatre on the 22nd with a big production of one of the most noted successes of the past decade.

Cyril Scott makes his appearance at the Van Ness Theatre a few weeks hence in the charming comedy success, "The Prince Chap," a play which has been a success in all parts of the world and has yet to receive unfavorable criticism.

Ezra Kendall's new play, "Swell Elegant Jones," in which he is to appear at the Van Ness Theatre, is from the pen of Herbert Hall Winslow, who will be remembered as the author of Kendall's other comedy hit, "The Vinegar Buyer."

Will L. Greenbaum announces that the dates for the concerts by the world's greatest woman pianist, Mme. There Carreno, have been arranged for February. Greenbaum expects to conclude negotiations for a fine auditorium for his big musical events during the coming season. That is what this city has long needed and it is to be hoped that he will meet with success in his endeavors to provide us with a hall suitable for conventions, lectures, popular meetings and big musical events.

GLENBROOK, NEVADA

One of Lake Tahoe's new resorts.

"The Man of the Hour," said to be the greatest of modern political dramas will be seen for the first time on the Pacific Coast directly after its present prosperous run at Chicago. Orrin Johnson is playing the leading role.

Denis O'Sullivan, who has just returned home after a most successful season in London, has been secured by Manager Bishop for a special season of three weeks at the Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, commencing Monday evening, July 22d. The opening play will be "Arrah Na Pogue," which will be followed by "Peggy Machree," in which O'Sullivan is to be starred next fall, and "The Shaughraun." In each of the productions he will introduce many of the old Irish folk-songs, which in themselves are more than an ordinary attraction.

Sousa and his great band intended to tour the Antipodes this year but the withdrawal of the line of steamers from this port has made it necessary for him to change his plans entirely. He will again make a trans-continental tour with the strongest organization he has ever carried and will play for us in the latter part of October. He will also appear at the Greek Theatre in a special program. Will Greenbaum will represent the Sousa interests.

Mr. Reginald Travers after a most successful season in the East with the new theatre at Chicago and the Frawley Company in Minneapolis will come to the coast for a short season in vaudeville with Mr. and Mrs. James Neill. The Neills and Mr. Travers open at the Orpheum July 21st, in "The Lady Across the Hall." Next season Mr. Travers will have a sketch of his own written expressly for him by a well known author.

Damrosch is Coming

If Mr. Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra are heard here next May, as now seems very likely, local music-lovers will enjoy a fine treat. In New York, the symphony series given at Carnegie Hall are looked upon as among the most important of the winter's musical attractions. Mr. Damrosch, whose tours are under Loudon Charlton's direction, has won a place altogether unique among American conductors. Under his leadership, the New York Symphony has been developed from a comparatively obscure organization to an orchestra of the very first rank. The western tour now being booked will extend to the Pacific Coast, including only the principal cities, and it will fill the entire months of May and June. In recent years the orchestra has limited its tours to the south and middle west, the spring tour as a rule being devoted mainly to festival appearances.

The Coming Conflict

Catholicism there are abundant proofs. More than any other Christian system Catholicism is conspicuous for a careful integrity of doctrine and an unflinching adherence to a definite moral code. Its variations have been superficial, never touching the essence of its teaching or disturbing the tenor of its progress toward a known and unchanging goal. On this account it is increasingly recognized as the strongest barrier that can be opposed to the forward march of the allied forces that band beneath the sinister standard of Socialism. Already consciously arrayed against Socialism in Germany with full imperial sanction and credited there with no inconsiderable headway in its appointed struggle, there are not lacking indications, dim, perhaps, to all but the acutest vision, that this same Catholicism is to be entrusted with the fight in other countries. It may be a coincidence that the progress of Socialism in England seems to keep no speedier pace than the enhancing cordiality of that kingdom toward Rome; and yet many profound British thinkers have found a subtler explanation of the phenomenon. And in France where Socialism goes hand in hand with a ritualism as elaborate almost as that of the Catholic church itself and where it would seem that Catholicism is in its most desperate condition, there are unmistakable signs of a healthy preparation for a future struggle mightier than that now waging, a future struggle which shall find unimagined resources placed at the command of the religious organization. There cannot be hopeless weakening of a nation's hold on a creed which gripped the mature minds of two such masters of universal culture as Ferdinand Brunetiere and Joris Karl Huysmans, both of whom clung to their faith when advancement and the favor of the Clemenceaus, the Briands and the rest of the radicals lay the contrary way. The names of these two men are used because they died since the present anti-Christian agitation in France began; because their disingenuous enemies have distorted the incidents of their last hours to make out an unscrupulous case against the sincerity of their convictions; and because they represent a French type ignored just now but to be seriously reckoned with before the policy innocently inaugurated by Waldeck-Rousseau is terminated.

Here in America the issue is perhaps not yet clearly defined and yet the time is surely coming when it must be joined. Fostered by a vicious demagogism that rails in season and out against wealth without regard to the legitimacy or illegitimacy of its origin, Socialism is spreading steadily, especially in the larger, more congested communities and here, as elsewhere, is making its mistaken fight against Christianity. Not to go beyond the limits of our own city we find one of the highest officials of the Socialistic party in this country writing unrebuked in the "Advance," an organ of Socialism published in San Francisco, as follows:

"Every appeal to men to become Socialists in the name of Christianity will result in the corruption and betrayal of socialism in the end. People cannot separate Christ from Christianity. And Christianity stands today for what is lowest and basest in life. The church of today sounds the lowest note in human life. It is the most degrading of all our institutions, and the most brutalizing in its effects on common life.

The church is simply organized Christianity; for Socialism to make use of it, to make terms with it, or to let it make approaches to the Socialistic movement is for Socialism to take Judas to its bosom."

Here is a crudely frank exposition of the plan of campaign outlined long ago and prosecuted wherever the socialistic propaganda has penetrated. It is true that the so-called pure socialists repudiate the philosophic system on which scientific socialism is built and halt a long way this side of aggressive designs on organized religion, but their benevolence is more to be commended than their logic; what they good-naturedly dodge is simply the inevitable conclusion to be drawn from premises whose far reaching significance they are unable or unwilling to apprehend.

It is inevitable, in a struggle of the sort here outlined, that sincere attempts at a compromise solution should be made and there are already at work forces directed to the harmonizing of the opposing systems. But it is certain that their well-intentioned offices lack the authorization of the governing bodies of either Socialism or Catholicism. There is on both sides a well-defined conviction that no partial surrender or mutual concessions will avert the conflict. What the result will be belongs to the domain of speculation. Even if it could be foreseen in a general way, yet will it be so colored by the unknown circumstances of that distant time when the struggle shall have been terminated, that a bald statement of the conditions of victory would be wholly unsatisfactory. This much, however, may be said without pessimistic intention—that the confidence born of pre-assured success will strengthen neither party to this tremendous conflict.

The Place to Spend a Delightful Vacation

The Santa Cruz mountains are famous the country over for their inviting summer resorts but one of the most attractive spots in all that glorious region is the Villa Fontenay, located near Glenwood, in the very heart of the most magnificent mountain scenery. The place is an ideal one for those requiring rest and gentle recreations as well as for those who wish to enjoy nature in all her quiet allurements. The bracing mountain air is filled with the odors of the balsams and the pines, there is an abundance of good pure running water and a table sure to whet the most jaded appetite.

The holding comprises 250 acres, all laid out with a view to the entertainment and comfort of the guests. There are all sorts of out door sports and games, good fishing and hunting, and a building which has all the air and distinction of a well kept country residence. The rates range from ten to fourteen dollars a week.

A City's Pathetic Plight

At this writing Boxtton is still Mayor of San Francisco, but another and better man is to be appointed before Town Talk's next publication day. Unfortunately it is not highly probable that the man selected by the Prosecution will be elected by the people in November. And now optimism halts at the prospect confronting San Francisco. The city appears to be destined to fall once more into the clutches of organized labor. With an appetite for glory not to be appeased by the mere routing of the grafters and the inculcation of a moral lesson such as receives its most effective illustration from the infliction of punishment on the obviously guilty, our enthusiastic redeemers indulged the vain hope of ingratiating themselves, for the most laudable political purposes, into the confidence and affection of organized labor. They fondly dreamed of an alliance that would make them masters of municipal politics, and in the furtherance of their schemes adopted a policy with wisdom the exception and arrogance the rule of action. They became extremely jealous of the situation they had created. Nobody outside their immediate circle was to be permitted to break in. All suggestions from outside sources respecting the rehabilitation of the municipal government and offers of assistance were rejected with scorn; nay, with epithets of revilement. The good Mr. Spreckels, the pious Mr. Phelan and the rancorous Mr. Heney were not to embarrass or imperil a situation of their creation by suffering it to be handled even at the edges by common, unanointed mortals. With this spirit of frantic vanity and universal suspicion prevailing it was natural that there should be, in the councils that engendered it, rebellion against common sense. Never at any time had these men the slightest chance of winning the support of organized labor. But they never awakened to the futility of their enterprise until, in their frenzied effort to escape from a dilemma, they called on the unions to assist in the selection of a mayor. Then it was, when organized labor ill requited their passionate devotion and abandoned their affection, that they realized how inept was that conduct by which they had diffused distrust throughout the community and rendered conditions most propitious for the calamity most dreaded. That organized labor will capture the municipal government at the next election is now the belief of the shrewdest politicians in town. Indeed so hopeless does the situation appear to some of them that they will not waste effort to avert the calamity. The reformers will now be given free rein. Whether by their activities we shall obtain a more satisfactory social order than that which has prevailed the sceptics are justified in doubting. It is no part of our purpose to moralize on this unhappy condition. The situation is more alarming than ever. Not a single encouraging ray penetrates the gloom of it. We have escaped from the grafters of Egypt, but the red sea of unionism shows no signs of dividing for us.

Patriots At Outs

Town Talk begs leave to present its obeisance and its assurances of profound consideration to its daily contemporaries whose symphony of civic virtue has been impaired by a jangling note of discord, and who have inadvertently invited the dear, deluded pee-pul to observe how sordid and vulgarizing is the effect of politics on common natures. It was with an emotion of poignant regret that we became sensible of the heartburnings with which the distinguished graft prosecutors were afflicted the other day in consequence of their failure to come to an agreement over the division of the spoils. The pathetic situation was one that could not fail to awaken the commiseration of honest men. Thousands of eyes moistened at the spectacle of the aggressively virtuous press at the parting of the ways. Sobs shook the bosom of the community when it awoke to find that the distinguished patriots of newspaperdom, who, after months of disinterested endeavor in the cause of civic righteousness, were no longer able to conceal the fact that the adhesive quality of their beneficent zeal had been put to too severe a test. It is no business of ours to meddle in these copartnership quarrels. It is only for us to say, not in triumphant tone, but with the vibrato of heartfelt sorrow, We told you so; for we long ago predicted that this rift in the lute would come, that there would be surcease of the soft murmuring of the doves in the Temple of Peace, that the amiable crusaders would in time be challenging the sincerity of one another and thus lend additional merriment to an already screaming bagatelle.

As We Now See It

Some months ago when the graft prosecutors turned on the faucets of their immunity bath and at the same time disclosed a policy under which we could not perceive the smallest assurance of that orderly and tranquil dispensation through which the community might be enabled to resume its mental composure and encouraged to redouble its fructiferous activity, we no longer felt inclined to give our cordial support to all that was being done in the name of civic purity. Without at all intending to challenge the sincerity of the prosecutors whose springs of beneficent intention appeared at that time to be bubbling over, we insisted that the scheme proposed, of government by blackmail was not one that should commend itself to public applause. The pretense of expedience was hardly plausible. Not even in the extraordinary situation that presented itself could we conceive that the end could be made to justify the means. We were told that it was a case of making virtue of necessity, but of that we were not convinced. On the contrary, we were certain that if the prosecutors were in possession of all the evidence which they claimed to have they could have made short work of the removal of every boodler in public office. Their failure to institute removal proceedings and their solicitude for the future of municipal politics gave color to suspicion that the vindication of decency was a purpose not more vital if not subordinate in their scheme of things to the desire to fabricate a political machine. And when shortly thereafter they began to coddle the labor unions; when they sought to prove their sympathy for unionism by training all their guns on Patrick Calhoun; when, conscious of having captured the imagination of the public, they inveighed in the public prints against Calhoun not only on the score of his alleged infractions of the penal code but for his hostility to the down-trodden workingman, it required no superior power of discernment to perceive the dominating animus of the holy alliance. And now, it should be needless to remark, there should no longer be any doubt that the beneficent intentions of some of the prosecutors were not entirely unaccompanied by political ambition. While it may still be urged that this political ambition is inspired by the worthy desire of substituting honest for corrupt government, yet we submit that it is now clear that our early misgivings were well founded, and that it would have been better for all concerned, not to mention the morals of the city which have always been the main object of the profound solicitude of our civic patriots, if a righteous disgust had overwhelmed the unspeakable Gallagher and his nauseating pals as soon as they confessed, and an aroused public sentiment had been permitted to deal out his deserts to the infamous Schmitz.

Premature Praise

In its animadversions on the big stick wielders of the Prosecution the Examiner takes occasion to compliment Langdon and Heney on their success as prosecutors. The Examiner's praise is somewhat premature. As prosecutors those gentlemen have not yet accomplished anything worthy of note. The work of the prosecution has not yet received the endorsement of the courts. A verdict rendered in Judge Dunne's court is not final. Even in many cases in which public clamor has played no part Judge Dunne has failed to preside to the satisfaction of the tribunal which reviews records to ascertain whether the trial court presided in accordance with law. We believe that the records of the supreme court show that the miscarriage of justice in Judge Dunne's court has been more abundant than in any of the other criminal departments. And as public clamor played a very important part in the trial of Eugene Schmitz we shall not be astonished to learn that the record reveals at least one fatal error. It may reveal innumerable fatal errors, and in that event considerable discredit will be reflected on the eminent district attorney and his learned special assistant. For if the court has been guilty of fatal errors those attorneys are in a large measure responsible since they insisted upon the rulings. And if it can be shown that they evoked the erroneous rulings fatally prejudicial to the rights of the defendant then we shall be justified in assuming either that they are ignorant of the law or that in spite of all the resources at their command they failed to secure sufficient evidence to convict, and to offset the delinquency availed themselves of unfair advantages. So the verdict in the Schmitz case may not yet be counted as a triumph. As for the confessions of Ruef and the supervisors, they were procured by Detective Burns through agencies for which he is indebted to newspaper influence. Consequently the genius of Langdon and Heney is yet to be vindicated.

Union Labor's Gratitude

From authoritative sources it has been learned that when the proposition to send delegates to a convention called by the district attorney for the purpose of selecting a mayor was put to a vote in the San Francisco Labor Council, the ballots of the delegates from the Carmen's Union were cast solidly against it. From sources equally trustworthy it has come to our knowledge that the delegates from the Carmen's Union were persuaded into this opposition by the fearsome president of the Building Trades Council who threatened the striking carmen with the withdrawal of the fat strike benefits contributed by the thousands of union men in McCarthy's organization. Here is an indication, as striking as any ever given, of the fine quality of union labor gratitude. Caught between two powerful impulses—between the generous impulse to show their appreciation to District Attorney Langdon of the invaluable service he has done them and the selfish impulse to safeguard one of their principal financial resources—the canny delegates of the Carmen's Union chose the gilded horn of the dilemma and as a consequence have skewered themselves into an unenviable position. All the district attorney's coddling of them for political purposes has been in vain. The money consideration has triumphed and once more unionistic practice has heavily discounted the high sounding theories which the labor leaders are never weary of enunciating. There can be no argument, from the viewpoint of union labor, as to the magnitude of the obligation which the Carmen's Union is under to the demagogic district attorney. The greatest enemy of the Carmen's Union has been subjected to the heaviest batteries of the district attorney's office. The Carmen's Union is engaged in a life and death struggle with Patrick Calhoun whom the district attorney is bent on destroying. While the Carmen's Union was exerting every effort to bring Patrick Calhoun to its terms the district attorney was trying to minimize his powers of resistance by attacking him upon the other flank. The president of the United Railroads was therefore confronted by two foes with either of whom singly he would easily be able to wage more effective battle. Clearly therefore the Carmen's Union ought to regard the district attorney as a powerful ally for whose assistance in the fight for unionism the liveliest gratitude is owing. And yet, at the first opportunity of displaying this grateful appreciation, behold the spectacle of the Carmen's Union repudiating the district attorney from purely mercenary motives, refusing absolutely to support him in a proposition highly advantageous to organized labor. The district attorney is naturally indignant. And his indignation is proof of what has been said in Town Talk: that the bitterness of his hostility to Calhoun was partly inspired by a desire to propitiate unionism. It is of course no new revelation, this ingratitude of union labor toward those who befriend it; it has been demonstrated again and again and with such amplitude of illustration that only the most optimistic in our midst hope for aught else. The selfishness of capital has been exploited by labor demagogues with such loud-mouthed insistence that those who in the forthright simplicity of their hearts readily attach importance to mere protestations, are apt to credit those who embody the dignity of labor with a broadminded generosity that verges on destructive self-sacrifice. This misconception of the character of organized labor is corrected by such manifestations of selfishness as that given by the Carmen's Union when the opportunity came to wipe out part of its indebtedness to the district attorney. Principle gives way before filthy lucre even in the deliberations of the San Francisco Labor Council and the Carmen's Union.

Railroad Legislation

With the publication of the Interstate Commerce Commission's findings in the Harriman case, it is inevitable that the prophets of hard times should make themselves heard once more in gloomy prognostication of the country's future. Their investigation of the methods pursued by the head of the "Pacifics" in the perfection of his monumental scheme of railroad merging has led the interstate body to make charges against Harriman which may result in criminal or civil proceedings. The community of interests between the various railroad men of this country causes them to resent unanimously any approach, however remote, to the prosecution of one of their number and they invariably resort in such emergencies to the threat of the industrial depression which, they insist, will follow any attack upon the railroads. As this country is peculiarly sensitive on the subject of hard times this method of warding off interference with the railroads has been wonderfully successful. It is one of the favorite subterfuges of James J. Hill who has received more unwelcome attentions from the federal authorities than most other railroad men, and that Harriman will not disdain its use seems more than likely. Ever since President Roosevelt delivered his famous railroad speech at Indianapolis on Memorial Day it has been subtly insinuated by the heads of the big roads and by the men whose interests are identified with them that any governmental assault on the conditions now obtaining in railroad affairs will disturb the delicate balance of business and precipitate a panic with terrifying results to the whole country. Perhaps these interests found particular menace in the conservative tone of criticism affected by the president in that address, arguing, in all probability, that a temperate measure of reform such as Roosevelt recommended stands a better chance of being carried through than would more radical plans. There can be no doubt that this reasoning is correct. The president's more recent speech at Jamestown and the action of Governor Hughes of New York in vetoing the bill making two cents per mile the maximum rate of passenger fare manifest a policy of perfect fairness to the railroads, a scrupulous intention of refraining from working injury to them in their legitimate business. Of course perfect fairness on the part of legislators has never exactly satisfied the big railway chiefs who have always considered themselves entitled to a little the best of it in legislation, to put the case as mildly as possible. Now that they seem assured of just and equitable treatment, the railroads show a disposition to accept this in so far as it benefits them and to reject it when just and equitable treatment implies the possibility of adverse legal proceedings. Consequently they decried "legislation based upon political advantage," throw up their hands in horror at "socialistic theories which will amount to the confiscation of property rights" and speak in denunciation of "reprisal for past wrongs no matter how real." In consequence, too, of these very well justified fears they start the hue and cry against the ghost of hard times, a horrid ghost easily conjured but a ghost which, in the opinion of the men capable of judging and disposed to judge impartially, need fill no citizen of this country with fright for years to come.

Our Slender Military Showing

Nothing seems to lend itself more readily to ridicule than the militia. An ordinary rusty and ill set-up regular is unnoted and unnoticed on the streets, but the poor militiaman even if quite soldierly is at once an object of pity or derision. Heaven help the loutish country youth with CAL. on his collar as he appears on our thoroughfares, his head swallowed in a bell-cap balanced on his distended ears—he might as well be garbed in the motley of the clown. Yet these same inland guardsmen, with N. G. C. written in every movement and in every line of the unsmart uniforms, are the recipients of the most flattering commendation from the officers and men of the Presidio post. In two weeks they have got the hang of the big guns, mastered the range finder and learned the allowances to make for wind and other deflections. Even now, say the regulars, they could, unassisted, well hold off a hostile fleet. But what part is San Francisco playing in the maneuvers. There are three regiments from various parts of the state—and San Francisco has to offer but one lone company of signal corps. This comprises the only militant citizenry of which she can boast. The rest, including what was once proudly termed the "war regiment," did not even go through the formality of being mustered out, but simply died out. That public opinion toward the militia in the eastern states is quite different may be seen from a recent issue of Harper's Weekly, which devotes a page of sketches to an encampment of the "famous Seventh," which seems to have successfully overcome its not very enviable war record. From all accounts there are military organizations in plenty in the East which it is considered a privilege and a distinction to serve. The feeling to the contrary direction in San Francisco is attributable to a number of causes and conditions, which may be well summed in "lack of interest." Numberless volunteers were out their welcome in war times; all is quiet in the Philippines; and the present turmoil serves to distract our fighting propensities—some may say. But this is not true unless in part, may be answered. Clubs, athletics, theatres, skating rinks and the like were never more popular, and military exercises should be a welcome diversion. A real cause—and a marked one—lies in the superciliousness of our fashionable or semi-fashionable young men, who share the bigoted prejudices, not of the army man, but of the army snob. Yet the decline of the local militia to a mere company, a loyal company too, is due to the unpatriotism of the trades unions. Imagine such a labor body as the bakers', which has a "German secretary" to translate all English communications, incorporating an anti-militia plank in its constitution. Yet the unionists are readiest of all to plunge the country into war. Of course, it may be urged that much is lacking in the militia; for instance there is its inherent looseness of discipline. But the spirit is there, and every world power should be able to make a showing in reserves. It is a national necessity. Moreover San Francisco, filled with discharged soldiers and officers of active service, should afford a superior kind of militia, which with a nominal amount of drill might be able to take complete charge of the local artillery district at a moment's notice. No American city affords such opportunities for big gun practise, while every Podunk can muster a company of infantry. Then, too, the coast defenses are so inadequately manned at the present time that the regular artillery could not be spared in a national emergency. It is not jingoism—such being the case—to call attention to San Francisco's poor part in these maneuvers. It is humiliating even in play warfare to turn over our defenses to the freckled lads from the pie belt.

Perspective Impressions

Our city government appears to be in the predicament of the man who didn't know where he was at.

Perhaps if an investigation were instituted of the handling of the money contributed for strike benefits, there would soon be an abatement of the zeal behind the car strike.

While the city government is in safe and sane hands wouldn't it be well to try our luck with a charter amendment providing for a new method of selecting police commissioners?

The sex of the American eagle has become the subject of inquiry. This is a question that should engage the attention of President Roosevelt.

Mr. D. M. Delmas appears to be affording Mr. Francis Heney a liberal education in the subtleties of legal practice.

Now it is Mr. Crocker and Mr. Scott who are to be sent to jail by Mr. Heney. Isn't it about time to begin the work of enlarging the penitentiary for the accommodation of the culprits who have incurred the disapprobation of this implacable nemesis of the wicked?

It is evident that the artist of the Los Angeles Times finds much that is inspiring in the misfortunes of this city.

The Return of Shan

By W. M. Letts

Shan had been dead for twenty years. But far from extinguishing his personality, the quarter of a century during which he had slept under the pine trees gave him a romance, which had he lived till the days of baldness and embonpoint might have deserted him. But as it was he retained immortal youth, and slept with his feet towards the sunrise, where the pines soughed above him, and the squirrels chattered and scampered over him. The mountains he loved were behind him, and the world of town was very far away. Only his mother and his cousin ever visited his grave, for the abbey grounds were closed and disused, and the merry company of squirrels and rabbits and birds possessed the spot.

The spirit of Shan haunted his native place, haunted it in a cheerful morning sense which connected his name with all things young and adventurous. His practical jokes still moved the old gardener to wheezy merriment; and his proverbial philosophy passed into current use, for Shan had made men love him whilst he forfeited their respect.

The facts about him were not of a romantic character. He was no knight-errant, there was nothing of a young Lochinvar about him, though something perhaps of the charm and ineptitude of a bonnie Prince Charlie. He had been daring, and therefore popular; he possessed the whole equipment of the village idol, whose moral cowardice masquerades as courage.

In the lives of such heroes there is generally a day of reckoning and disaster. Shan's came at the summit of a cheap success. Only Mrs. Massereen, his mother, knew what had happened that day, and she nourished the memory sombrely alone in the grim house with her grand-niece and her elderly servants.

Every evening as she sat by the lamp turning over the pages of a religious book, she went through the details of that day. Every evening she saw Shan in the dusky corners of the room, an imaginary Shan who tortured her memory.

On that day Shan had quarrelled with his father. This was an occurrence so common that its absence alone would have been remarkable. Both disputants had forgotten the cause before the quarrel was ended. For the real source of dispute was, as it so often is, the unreconcilable differences of temperament. Mr. Massereen was an Irishman whose Protestantism had entirely dispelled any hereditary sense of humor. He could not and he would not understand his son. He accounted it a sin to understand another man's failings. He spent his life in sinning that he might not sin, a paradoxical state of affairs not too uncommon. The quarrel passed through many stages and digressions, routs and rallies. Precision of diction characterised Mr. Massereen's tactics, wild exaggeration Shan's. When the father gave his judgment on the son, it amounted very simply to the decision that Shan was a liar. For once the boy had no answer.

The next morning when the sun sparkled on the arbutus leaves, and the blackbirds bathed in the puddles, Shan left home "forever" he told his mother in the note which he left for her. Time and earth are unbearable limits in youth. Shan's eternity of resentment lasted for just five years. During that time he married. The wife found him intolerable, and with her one son she settled apart from him. So Shan came home; Shan, disconsolate, disillusioned, and mortally ill, went home to the stern old widowed mother at the Red House, and died in her arms.

Twenty years after his death these facts about him were well-nigh forgotten, but the atmosphere of his personality remained. There were photographs of him; a daguerreotype in which he boasted a remarkable velvet attire and a shocking simper. In another he was a pleasant-faced boy in a baggy suit. The snows of time threatened him, but the pleasantness of his weak joyous face prevailed against the snows and the antiquated fashion of his garments.

To his cousin Fiona he was immortalized in this baggy suit and with this pleasant smile. But to her he was a hero, someone eternally younger, more vital, more interesting than those who surrounded her in the land of the living. His personality had overshadowed her own, for the girl was one of those people who are called "quiet"; an adjective of approbation really synonymous with spiritless and dull.

Fiona, who was supposed to have finished her education, spent a life in small duties and endless reveries. On the Autumn day that unknown to her was bringing great events, one of these small duties consisted in leaving a book at the Rectory. She did this, and instead of returning pursued the road which led towards the ruined abbey in whose grounds Shan slept. It was a day of grey clouds and buffeting southwest wind, which swayed the trees and hunted the dead leaves before it down the road. It was a day for the fairies, not for the fine weather faires, but for that banished mighty race, the people of the Sidhe, the Tuatha da Danaan, the great elemental beings.

Had you followed the Glenroy road, which has its goal at Bray, on that shadowy afternoon you would have been wonder-swayed by the wind and wetness of the world. You would have heard the horsehoofs of the galloping sheehogues, or the baying of the hounds of Oisín; you would have fancied that Finn and his mighty companions were abroad, or looked, as Fiona did, for Eevin, the great banshee queen, at the turn of the road.

The wind blew Fiona's shabby skirt about her ankles, and buffeted Father M'Comus as he came towards her. He was a kindly old man, and he smiled at the girl as he passed her, and spoke in spite of the wind. She gave him back his greeting with the shy eagerness with which she treated those who showed her kindness. The old priest felt a great pity for her. He realized something of the monotonous life she led in the old house among old people and old memories. But then he scarcely reckoned how dear Fiona counted the memories. That was the only link between her and her stern old grand-aunt. She knew that among

The Barbarism of Japan

By Louis Ribault

Persistent rumors of war between this country and Japan continue to make the Japanese an object of great interest to the people of this country and especially to the people of San Francisco who have come to believe that they all know all about the despised Japs. A very widespread notion respecting the Japanese is that European civilization is to Japan only a weapon for war, an instrument for developing her wealth and an outward veneer. With that notion I have no sympathy. After many years residence in Japan I have come to the conclusion that the Japanese are exceedingly proud of the progress they have made in cultivating European civilization. At the same time I realize that they have far from succeeded in rendering their nature receptive to Christian ideals. They have many ugly traits of character, which are peculiar to them as a people, and which cannot be eradicated in one or two generations.

One of the most familiar charges brought against the Japanese is that they are a barbarous people. Those who assert that Japan is barbarian at heart point to the pitiless war of extermination which was waged against Christianity in Japan, during which several hundred thousand native converts were killed on account of their religion, and not a few of the missionaries were tortured; they recall the time when Japan was closed to the world, and when those who landed on the Japanese Coast were punished with death; they dwell on the number of inoffensive foreigners who in the 'sixties were hacked to pieces by those terrible two-handed swords; they recall the fact that death used to be the punishment for most crimes in feudal Japan; they speak with horror of the frequency and the ghastliness of the national form of suicide by cutting the belly open, the celebrated Hara-Kiri, and they mention the killing of the Chinese at the storming of Port Arthur in 1894. These charges of barbarity which are preferred against Japan are numerous and grave.

It is quite true that during the sixteenth century almost 300,000 native and foreign Christians were massacred in Japan, and that from that time onward the country was closed against all foreigners, excepting the Dutch, who were allowed to reside for trading purposes on a small isolated spot, the artificial island of Deshima in the harbor of Nagasaki, where they were kept as prisoners. This enormous massacre of 300,000 men seems to sully for ever the fair fame of Japan.

The first Christian missionaries who landed in Japan were exceedingly well received by the Japanese, who eagerly sought to benefit from the newcomers in science, industry, and art. Besides, Christianity itself appealed to the Japanese, and among an intelligent and well-disposed population numerous converts were quickly made by the zealous missionaries. As a matter of fact, Christians were not only well treated in Japan, but they were shown the greatest trust and were treated with distinction. But in the sixteenth century Christian missionaries ill-requited the hospitality of the Japanese. They sold Japanese subjects into slavery. They destroyed native temples and united the converted populace into violence against the non-Christian community. As a consequence the following edict was issued by Hideyoshi on July 25, 1587:

"We have learned from our faithful councillors that foreign clergy have come into our estates, where they preach a law contrary to that of Japan, and that they have even had the audacity to destroy temples dedicated to our Kami and Hotoke. Although this outrage merits the most extreme punishment, we nevertheless wish to show them mercy. Therefore we order them to quit Japan within twenty days under pain of death. During that space of time no harm or hurt will be done to them. But we order that if any of them be found in our states at the expiration of that term they shall be seized and punished as the greatest criminals. As for the Portuguese merchants, we permit them to enter our ports and to continue there their accustomed trade, and to remain in our estates provided our affairs need this. But we forbid them to bring any foreign clergy into the country, under the penalty of the confiscation of their ships and goods."

Unfortunately the Christian missionaries tried in every way to elude Hideyoshi's law. Missionaries who could no longer openly land in Japan were smuggled in under various disguises and their aggressive agitation, of which Hideyoshi had complained, continued in an accentuated fashion. Nevertheless, Hideyoshi endeavored to avoid employing the utmost rigour of the law against the rebellious and dangerous intruders and their misguided native adherents. However, generosity failed to affect the trend of the missionaries' action in the slightest degree.

It cannot be doubted that the missionaries considered themselves the political agents of their country. In 1617 a ship was captured at Sakai which brought letters from the Portuguese, by which orders were given that the Japanese Christians should be stirred up into a revolt. The despatch of men-of-war was promised as soon as the news of a successful rising should come in. Unfortunately the information contained in this letter was confirmed by the reports which Japan had received from independent sources. Various Japanese rulers had, with that thirst for knowledge that has always been characteristic of Japan, sent emissaries to Europe in order to study the countries of the West. Their reports describing the terrible persecutions which in the name of religion took place in Europe and in the Spanish colonies through men like Cortes and Pizarro made, no doubt, a deep impression on the rulers of Japan. They were terrified when they learned of the religious fanaticism of Spain and Portugal, which more often than not was a cloak for their lust of conquest and of gold, which dictated their merciless treatment of Holland, Mexico, and Peru.

In the year 1637, occurred the bloody Shimbara revolt which devastated Japan. According to Japanese chroniclers, this revolt was a purely Christian upheaval, in which about 100,000 people lost their lives. These experiences of the action of Christians in Japan, together with the reports which the Japanese princes received from the emissaries abroad as to the destructive action of Christianity in various non-Catholic countries, naturally made Christianity appear, not as a power of light but as one of darkness, favoring and causing revolt, destruction and desolation. So when in 1640, fifty-three years after the proclamation of Hideyoshi, the Portuguese again tried to insinuate themselves into Japan by sending, in contravention of the repeated and most stringent edicts, a ship to Japan, the whole ship's company was sentenced to death in order to give peace to the country.

From all that I have read of the records of those stirring periods I am satisfied that the Christian missionaries brought about the persecution of the native Christians and the exclusion of foreigners by their misplaced zeal and their political intrigues.

After the persecution of the Christians and the closing of the country against the foreigner who had proved so meddlesome, quarrelsome, and dangerous, peace reigned in Japan during two centuries. Art, literature, and learning were assiduously cultivated, and the classic period of Japan of the sixth and seventh centuries found a glorious renaissance in the revival of all the arts. Peace and happiness reigned in the secluded islands of Japan, but suddenly the Russians appeared on the scene, and brought the spectre of war in the midst of the happy people.

In 1806-1807 and following years the Russians attacked and raided Japanese islands in order to frighten them into subjection, and such was their brutality that, though all foreigners were hated and despised, the Russians were most feared and most hated by the Japanese. Unprovoked murderous attacks on peaceful Japanese, and the bombardment and conflagration of many villages on the coast, were committed in order "to open Japan to trade and to introduce civilization," and in a famous declaration the Russians promised that they would return and ravage the coast of Japan year by year until the country was opened to trade. The brutality of the intruders exasperated the Japanese Government to such an extent that it issued in 1825 the following order, which evidently sprang from despair:

"In case there be any foreign ship approaching the coast of Japan, the officer in charge need not ask the reason why they have come, but should fire at once on such ships."

The isolated instances in which foreigners have been attacked by ultra-patriotic and irresponsible free-lances were revenged by the European Powers upon the Japanese nation with incredible and unpardonable severity. For instance, a Mr. Richardson, who for many years had been a merchant at Shanghai, rode on September 14, 1862, with a party on horseback from Kanayawa towards Yedo, and met on the road the cortege of the great prince of Satsuma. The etiquette of the road in Japan was that all people meeting a prince's procession had to dismount and stand at the side of the road in order not to "look down" upon a daimio, and the punishment for offering to a prince the grave insult of looking down on him was death, according to the custom of the country.

Mr. Richardson and his friends nonchalantly rode through his procession, little heeding the irritation which was clearly visible on the faces of the prince's armed retainers, and approached the prince himself. Seeing from the infuriated faces of the Japanese that a collision was to be feared, and, dreading the consequences, one of his friends, according to the evidence, implored Mr. Richardson. "Don't go on, we can turn into a side road," whilst another entreated him, "For God's sake, let us not have a row." But Mr. Richardson answered, "Let me alone. I have lived fourteen years in China, and know how to manage these people," thinking the Japanese would as meekly submit to insult and ill-treatment at the hands of Europeans as the Chinese at Shanghai. However, Mr. Richardson misunderstood the temper of the Japanese, and he had to pay dearly for his stupid and willful provocation. At the moment when he had passed the prince, a retainer sprang towards him and cut him down. Thus Mr. Richardson brought the punishment on himself by his own folly, notwithstanding the warnings of his alarmed friends.

For the killing of Richardson the British Government exacted from Japan the staggering indemnity of $500,000, burned three valuable new steamers and burned a town of 180,000 inhabitants.

The Japanese are thought by some to be barbarous on account of their method of self-destruction. But in Japan suicide is not as in this country merely an act of self-destruction. It has a deep ethical foundation. If by the suicide of a subject a ruler could be turned from an evil purpose, the memory of the man who committed suicide would be honored for all time. This was, perhaps, the most frequent cause of suicide in Japan. Suicide was also often committed for expiation. A typical and touching case of suicide for expiation occurred when an obscure young girl committed suicide in a grove for her country's sake after a murderous attempt had been made by one of her countrymen on the present Czar when, as Czarewitch, he traveled in Japan. By her death she hoped to expiate the crime and to save her country from the wrath of the gods and of Russia, as she said in a letter which she left behind her.

Suicide by ripping up the belly is, no doubt, the most horrible form of suicide existing, because it is by far the most painful one. Whilst any coward can take poison or shoot himself, it requires the nerve and spirit of a hero to commit hara-kiri deliberately, slowly, and without flinching, as it had to be performed in accordance with the established rule. Thus hara-kiri became the favorite mode of suicide of the samurai who had disgraced himself, who had fallen out of favor with his lord, who did not wish to fall alive into the hands of the enemy, or who wished to sacrifice his life for ideal purposes, such as changing the mind of his master or the policy of his country. By committing the most gruesome and the most painful form of suicide, a soldier could show his fearlessness at the supreme moment and die like a man. By a final act in which he could show bravery and contempt of death, he would live in the memory of his people, who would glory in his memory. In a country where ancestor-worship is practised as in Japan, such an opportunity for improving one's reputation is naturally often made use of. But surely the national institution of hara-kiri is rather a proof of the spirit of heroism, than of barbarism.

From Fiddler to Poet

Sometimes public office so comes in a man's way that he cannot choose but salute it. That, I presume, is what happened in the case of Dr. Edward Taylor, the poet, who was recently reclaimed from congenial obscurity, lured, as it were, from the sequestered cloister of his Muse and plunged precipitately into the turmoil of active public life. It was not an easy thing to elude, this mayoralty job, for District Attorney Langdon peddled it into the remotest corners with a desperate insistency that exhausted the powers of more than one automobile, and must have excited the compassion of so tender and noble hearted a man as our gentle poet. But when it was offered to him he probably felt like exclaiming in the words of another poet:

Upon the slippery tops of human state,
The gilded pinnacles of fate,
Let others proudly stand, and, for awhile
The giddy danger to beguile,
With joy and with disdain look down on all,
Till their heads turn and down they fall.

Me, O ye gods, on earth, or else so near
That I no fall to earth may fear,
And, O ye gods, at a good distance seat
From the long ruins of the great.
Here wrapt in th' quiet arms of quiet let me lie;
Quiet companion of obscurity.

The Patriotism of Him

Dr. Taylor's acceptance of the office bespeaks a fine quality of patriotism. A man possessing something of the divine madness of Apollo, and about to round out the three score year and ten period in the blissful companionship of his Muse, must have been very reluctant to withdraw from the ethereal depths of the heaven of poetic contemplation especially if he recalled the words of still another poet:

Ambition is a vulture vile,
That feedeth on the heart of pride
And finds no rest when all is tried;
For worlds cannot confine the one
The other lists and bounds hath none
And both subvert the mind, the state,
Procure destruction, envy, hate.

But Dr. Taylor felt that his city needed his services and he gallantly responded to the call of duty. His appearance in the role of chief magistrate of the city is very much in the nature of a grand revival, since he has lived so long in retirement that his very existence had ceased to be a matter of general knowledge. Dr. Taylor was a man of excellent parts in his day, and even at this late day he is capable of imparting dignity to his office. But he has been so long out of touch with this generation that he will have to rely on the sage counsels of the distinguished publicists who are now shaping the destiny of the city. Nevertheless the Prosecution should be felicitated on having persuaded so excellent a man to take up the work of civic regeneration. It is unfortunate they did not think of him long ago, immediately after beginning their own work and before arousing distrust. For now there is small likelihood of their being able to elect him in November, and meanwhile, with confusion worse confounded, the very government itself the subject of litigation, it is difficult to see how Dr. Taylor can do more than revivify the fading prestige of the men by whom he was selected.

Hearst's Sensational Flop

The Hon. William Randolph Hearst, in whom there is illimitable capacity for violent flops to the other side, gave his contemporaries gooseflesh last week when he wrenched himself free from the powerful combination which has long been holding dark conclaves for the regeneration of San Francisco. And how illuminating was the violent disjunction! Mr. Hearst no sooner kicked over the traces when he began poking holes in the screen behind which our glorious benefactors have been mysteriously operating. The position of all the parties to this mix-up is most amusing to those who are in possession of the key to the right understanding of it. The situation is one that abounds in material most palatable to the sombre misanthrope whom long experience of the world has brought to the temper of fixed and contemptuous disregard for man as a species. It is a situation conducive to the reflection that the operation of good intentions is often frustrated by the activities of selfish interests. If the graft prosecutors had stuck to the business of sending to jail the ruthless and insatiable banditti of public office instead of appealing to the imagination of organized labor by vindicating their hostility to capital; if they had differentiated the bribe-giver from the victim of extortion instead of trying to compass private revenges, they could now afford to be blissfully indifferent to the attitude of the Hon. William Randolph Hearst.

Now For the Uncolored News

When honest newspapers fall out after a protracted season of armed neutrality, and resume their most congenial occupation of disemboweling one another, in a Pickwickian sense, then their credulous readers stand a fair chance of enlightenment. So keen is my news instinct that I was inclined to turn handsprings eloquent of elation when Mr. Hearst resolved to play no longer in Mr. Spreckels's yard. For I must confess that there is nothing so repugnant to me as a daily newspaper hindered in the performance of its legitimate functions. I can conceive of no condition of things in which the ends of public justice might best be subserved by an agreement among all newspapers to color the news. That there has been a combination of the daily newspapers of this city entered into for the purpose ostensibly of redeeming it from a corrupt Administration, is a fact so well established that it may be asserted without fear of contradiction. That under this extraordinary and unprecedented dispensation much good has been accomplished no one will deny; but also, that much injustice has been done, is a fact easily susceptible of proof. And with equal facility might it be shown that purely selfish motives have inspired much that has been done. Unquestionably there is much sincerity behind the Prosecution. I believe that the Bulletin started the crusade against graft with the best of intentions. For the routing of the grafters the Bulletin is deserving of the highest commendation, but one may with absolute consistency in this matter vouchsafe credit where credit is due and at the same time unhesitatingly deplore and censure the prostitution of justice by the sworn officers of the law and ridicule the chicanery and shallow pretensions of some of the unctuously rectitudinous protagonists of the moving and somewhat sordid drama.

Sincerity of the Press

The great hullabaloo raised over the defection of the most pregnant and provocative of journals, the one which usually leads all the others in the fashions of journalism, is proof of one thing: of the impression among the Prosecution combine that a united newspaper front, not only in matters pertaining to the prosecution of the hoodlums but also in the paramount matter of politics, is essential to successful achievement. Else, why the ululations of the Examiner's contemporaries? The Examiner has offered no criticism of the legal work of the prosecution. It is as hot as ever on the trail of the hoodlums, and still indicates a spirit of co-operation in the matter of enforcing the laws against bribery. Yet its contemporaries, while disavowing political designs, are very much disgruntled and very abusive. If we study the situation in the light of these recent developments we may find much that is conducive to laughter respecting the pretensions to civic patriotism on the part of certain great dailies.

Some Characteristics

It is a study of peculiar interest and gratification to me since these self-righteous journals have been so industriously engaged in poisoning the wells of controversy by diffusing a sentiment prejudicial to the reputation for honesty of every dissenting commentation. In view of the frightful irregularities of spasmodic energy to which their own virtue is subject, it is amazing that they do not reserve their sneers for one another. There is one broad fact about them so important that nobody forgets it. This one broad fact is a permanent disadvantage under which they must labor as moral critics. It is the recollection in the public mind that each has proved the other a mountebank. Naturally it must require the expenditure of an immense amount of ingenuity to convince the ordinary person that sincerity is predicable of such papers, and hence their perpetual state of temporary honesty and their conjectural suspicions of sinister influences, despite their servility to organized labor for the obvious purpose of getting the coin of the merchant who advertises to reach workingmen. It is no wonder that these distinguished journalists never exchange the kiss of peace without searching one another for knives.

Examiner Revelations

So far as the readers of Town Talk are concerned there was nothing of fresh interest in the revelations made in the columns of the Examiner; but those revelations were gratifying to me since they served to corroborate much that I had already recorded. Weeks ago I commented on the failure of the Prosecution to pursue the Home Telephone investigation. The Examiner says that investigation was abandoned as soon as the prosecutors found it expedient to do politics. This is an explanation that persuades me of the error of the rumor that it was abandoned to hold Justice Sloss of the supreme court in line, it being known that he was related by marriage to Mark Gerstle. This is one of the relationships conceived to be favorable to the Prosecution, but of course this conception is ill founded. Justice Sloss, in my opinion, is a jurist of some independence of character, and it would, I am sure, be as unjust for the Prosecution to suspect him of being amenable to the appeal of blood as for the defense to rely on Judge Cooper's impending relationship to Downey Harvey. It is an unfortunate habit of lawyers of a certain peculiar mental fabric to speculate not upon the law of a case but rather upon the subtle influences that might affect the complexion of the court. This habit is the source of many scandals in the legal profession. It is as abominable as the conduct of a certain lawyer of whom I heard not long ago, that he was instrumental in securing the appointment of a Federal judge in a distant city, and then solicited clients on the strength of his pull.

the Prosecution he learned a great deal of the inside of things. Perhaps he knows why the investigation of the milk graft, the graft that involved the poisoning of babies, was abandoned. But we should not expect him to give undue prominence to the fact that what he now animadverts upon he was quite willing to connive at up to the time that his associates passed him the convention lemon. For of course the Examiner's withdrawal from the sainted combination was not the result of enlarged knowledge, nor of a conviction that its original position was a mistake. No emotion of repugnance was excited in Mr. Hearst by the conduct of these righteous gentlemen who have schooled themselves against that intense consciousness of kinship with all the frailties and vices, which is prejudicial to that active heroism essential to aggressive opposition to wrongdoing. Nor did Mr. Hearst make any serious objection to the doing of politics until his choice for mayor was rejected. But it is not fair to Mr. Hearst to represent that he alone had political designs. Mr. Spreckels and Mr. Phelan had candidates for mayor, too, and their objection to Hearst's choice was not that he wouldn't make a good mayor but that he wouldn't be their mayor.

The Glorification of Burns

Surely Mr. Hearst was as much entitled to the proud privilege of running the city government by proxy as were Spreckels and Phelan. They started the graft prosecution but they could have made no progress had Hearst not persuaded Langdon to appoint Heney. Not that Heney was indispensable but that they thought so at the time. Since then it has been learned that Heney and Burns would have made an awful mess of the whole thing had it not been for the newspapers and for Roy the stool-pigeon, who trapped the supervisors. All these interesting details will probably be supplied the readers of the Examiner in the course of time. So the position of that newspaper from the strictly news standpoint is now to be envied by its contemporaries, especially by those whose policy is inspired from without. One of its first tips to the public was that the astute Mr. Burns did not track Schmitz through Europe. It appears that the Examiner found Schmitz for Burns. We shall probably learn later on that the story that Ruef's chauffeur was a Burns's detective was also pure fake. But nothing will be more interesting than veracious reports of court proceedings. Perhaps on the next trial before Judge Dunne it will not appear that the attorneys entered into a combination to insult the court, but rather that the Judge made it impossible for the Attorneys to entertain any sentiment toward the court other than that of contempt. The importance to the Prosecution of having the news colored is illustrated by the newspaper reports of the proceedings before the Court of Appeals last Saturday. According to those reports it was clearly shown that Judge Dunne had not refused to settle the bill of exceptions in the Schmitz case, and that the attorneys for the defense had been guilty of deception. The facts are that the record was produced showing that the attorneys for the defense had uttered the truth, and that no writ of mandamus was issued simply because Judge Dunne had abated his obduracy. The attorneys for the Prosecution tried by tricks of verbal legerdemain, by fantastic snares for puzzling the understanding, equivocalities that lurk in language, that Judge Dunne had in no way obstructed the due course of justice, but in this enterprise they miserably failed.

As It Occurred

By way of illustration of how false impressions are created let us consider the matter of the colloquy between Judge Dunne and Attorney Fairall on the occasion of the court's remark that the attorney belonged in jail. As reported by some of the newspapers it appeared that the attorney used improper and insulting language for which he was properly rebuked. What actually occurred was quite different from what was reported in the newspapers. Here follows a full report of the proceedings from which it is possible to derive a very accurate impression of the distinguished gentleman on the bench.

Mr. Fairall: This is an application for bail, pending an appeal. The affidavit upon which it is based recites that the defendant is the Mayor of the City and County of San Francisco and that a Mr. Gallagher pretends to have been appointed to that office and consequently a conflict of authority has arisen, which we think justifies the exercise of the court's discretion, as a matter of public policy in releasing the defendant on bail. Now the District Attorney stated yesterday that he was not prepared to file any affidavit, yet the affidavit which he filed this morning was dated yesterday and contained the name of Gallagher as Mayor, which has been erased and the date is made of today and Boxton's name has been substituted for Gallagher's. He alleges that Boxton is the Mayor of San Francisco and therefore, denied in his affidavit that Schmitz is Mayor and that any conflict of authority can arise. I noticed that the order of the Board, which attempted to remove Mayor Schmitz from office was based upon a letter which Your Honor sent to the Board of Supervisors informing them that Mayor Schmitz had been convicted of felony. Your Honor knew that that judgment had been appealed from and that you had issued a certificate of probable cause for such appeal and you knew when you wrote the letter that the effect of the appeal and the certificate of probable cause was to suspend the judgment and render it inadmissible in evidence for any purpose. Now, if the judgment was not admissible how could your Honor's letter be admissible for the purpose of proving a conviction?

The Court: I do not think that the question of who is Mayor is of any importance here. Your application, in my opinion, has no merit.

Mr. Fairall: Then your Honor denies our application?

The Court: Look here, Mr. Fairall, the court will send you to jail where you belong.

Mr. Fairall: I do not belong in jail any more than your Honor belongs there. I take exception to such remarks. You, as a judge, have no right to cast aspersions upon the character of an attorney and when you do so, I will treat you as any other man.

The Court: I shall treat you as you deserve. When you act respectfully the court will hear you.

Mr. Fairall: I know the duty of the court and I understand the rights and duties of an attorney. Attorneys do not have to submit to insults at the hands of the court and when a judge descends to such conduct he puts himself outside of the protection with which the law clothes the court. I will say again that you have no right to say I belong in jail, and I shall not submit to it either on or off the bench.

The Court: Mr. Langdon, I want you to follow this matter and see whether an application for bail is made in the Court of Appeal. The last time an application was made here, there was subsequently an application made in the Court of Appeal, in which it was alleged that the defendant was suffering from an incurable disease. That application was dismissed. I regard this as species of fraud.

Mr. Fairall: Do you mean to infer that the dismissal of the application was fraudulent?

The Court: If what I say reflects upon you, you may take it that way.

Mr. Fairall: Nothing I have done has reflected upon me or shall reflect upon me.

Langdon's Sorry Plight

Aside from the effect of the Hearst flop on the graft prosecution there is in the incident much of vital significance of a purely political character. When Hearst flopped his Independence League (Leg?) flopped with him. In other words he folded up his party and put it away with moth balls. It is not to participate in the coming municipal campaign. For Mr. Langdon there is in this incident galling provocation to poignant rumination. He is now without a party. This is the same Langdon, who, but a short time ago, was scattering for the Examiner a glorious message of truth and wisdom, informing, instructing and enheartening his fellow-men. He now stands accused by the Examiner of "evil alliances." I hate to spoil this by comment. The words of Mercury are harsh after the songs of Apollo. Mr. Langdon will probably have to run as an Independent, and at this stage of the game with his old pals of the Labor Party against him on the score of treachery, and the Examiner disgusted with him for being unfaithful to his patron and benefactor, the Hon. William Randolph Hearst, from my viewpoint he doesn't bear the aspect of a winner. He will probably get a lot of boosting from the Prosecution's organs, but this is by no means certain. He is not beloved by his associates. They have tolerated him because they had to. They needed him to keep Heney in his job, but they have regarded him as a joke on account of the transparency of his pretensions to legal ability, and now that he is without affirmative support they must surely feel inclined to pull the last prop from under. But he really controls the situation, for if he were deserted he would remove Heney. And yet since the Examiner deserted him even Heney has become irreverent. As witness the indignant protest of Heney in the Glass trial when Mr. Delmas assumed that he had a hand in the election of Bostton. There sat Langdon, who, according to the testimony, had Bostton as his guest at dinner one night last week, and he was obliged to swallow the painful implication contained in the protest of his assistant, who with clamorous indignation resented the imputation of his responsibility for the elevation of Bostton. He spoke as though he were a man of such exalted ideals and extraordinary sensitiveness in the matter of decency and the higher moralities that he revolted at the idea of clothing the confessed grafter with the sacred robes of authority. And there, as I have remarked sat Langdon. But enough of Langdon. It is far more agreeable to raise a man unjustly deprecated than to undertake an office so ungracious as that of eradicating favorable but false impressions.

Gallagher the Early Bird

Acting-Mayor Jim Gallagher's last official act is one that does full credit to his astuteness. He beat Mayor Bostton out of $300 of the city's money by beating him to it. The salary of the mayor is $500 a month. In addition there is a contingent fund for which no accounting may be made. The monthly apportionment of this fund is $300. Now while the regular salary cannot be drawn until the end of the month, the $300—allotted for entertaining and the like—may be drawn in advance. Gallagher skillfully protracted his term of mayorship into July and therefore had first chance at the $300. Gallagher and Boxtton, it may be recalled, once nearly caused a split among the labor supervisors because of their mutual jealousies and mutual ambition to lead. But all this was forgotten when the dove of peace appeared in the form of mysterious, fat envelopes. I am assured that in the present instance Gallagher is still amicably disposed toward Boxtton. The $300 was a mere business matter.

Ruef's Hospitality Accepted by His Prosecutors

The friends of Mayor Schmitz have been aggrieved by the order of Judge Dunne forbidding the chief executive from lunching at his home. When he is in attendance upon court it has been the practice of the sheriff to take him home for the midday meal. This custom was established while Judge Dunne was absent in the country but as soon as he returned and it became necessary for Schmitz to apply to him the privilege was promptly curtailed. While it is admitted that Judge Dunne's authority is absolute, it is at the same time contended that his arbitrary ruling works a hardship as well as a discrimination. It is very well for Schmitz to be munching hard tack and sipping bad coffee, but what about Ruef, his accomplice and co-conspirator. Ruef is still kept in the Fillmore street prison house, where he fills out the weak places in the comfortable menu provided by the city by purchases from his own pocket book. Moreover, he is permitted to entertain his friends, give dinners and suppers, in fact to do about as he pleases. An incident of a week ago has done much to rile the friends of the imprisoned mayor. Ruef, whose friendship for Burns, the prosecution's chief detective, dates from the subjugation of the wily boss, his confession and plea for mercy, celebrated the entente cordiale with a dinner at which were present many of those identified with the prosecution. The dinner was one of the best that has been served in the prison house. The oldest wines, the finest herbs and the richest meats were unspared in the making. An echo of the dinner reached the friends of Schmitz and on top of it came the order forbidding Schmitz to lunch at home. These discriminations are causing no end of bitterness but Schmitz is down and out while Ruef has earned the gratitude, if not the respect, of the prosecutors.

Boxton the Brazenest

According to a friendly supervisor, whose confidence I hope I am not betraying, District Attorney Langdon had a strenuous time in finding even a boodler to succeed Gallagher. The reason why Gallagher was not retained as mayor was this: Gallagher was needed, being the only supervisorial boodler of brains and ability, to look after the expenditure of the city's funds as chairman of the finance committee. He could not do both. But before Boxtton was chosen, every boodler was interviewed—and each refused, in some instances with tears. They would NOT be mayor. And a mayor against his will might disturb the reformers' programme. Daniel G. Coleman, popularly believed to be made of brass and rhinoceros hide, threatened to kill himself. "Of course he wouldn't," commented my informer. Jack Furey clasped his big though not honest hands and begged to be spared. McGushin, Lonergan, Kelly, Mamlock and Coffey, the most pitiable nonentities on the board, were approached in vain. Even Rea declined—Rea, who when his honesty was impeached, used publicly to apostrophize his son Louy. "Louy," he would say, gazing through his extended arms, "ven I looka into your eye, I can say to you, 'Louy, your father ees an honest man.'" But Boxtton was persuaded without any noticeable difficulty. Perhaps he feels he has reached the depth of misery and degradation, and with a sort of morbid instinct, glories in it.

A Letter from Bierce

From Ambrose Bierce come a few pertinent remarks anent the humiliations and sufferings of San Francisco. That great master of epithet and light-winged satire has resided for several years in Washington, D. C., the atmosphere of which he rates superior to that of San Francisco principally for the reason that it is not subject to the caprices of organized labor. The absolute freedom of Washington from the pestiferous influences of unionism and the arrogance of the insufferable demagogic champions of labor, was really the paramount consideration in the shaping of Bierce's choice of the nation's capital as a place of residence. San Francisco holds for him many fine and stirring memories, for the State he has a deep and sentimental attachment, but nothing could be more repugnant to him than the thought of living in a city in which the principles of personal liberty have lost their significance. But I wish to quote the remarks to which I referred. They are contained in a letter written to his friend Herman Scheffauer. "What a San Francisco!" wrote Bierce. Where are the courageous men of the Vigilance Committee of the old days. Where those who broke the head of the mob with pick-handles in the time of Dennis Kearney? I mean, where are those like them? It is clear that the business men and the professional men of today are no better than the labor unions and not half so brave." Indeed it is quite clear. And it strikes me that Bierce might find much pleasant diversion in San Francisco at this time, since there are so many men of the type to which he alludes. Indeed the city never was so rich in targets of the kind that are most easy of access to the arrows of his inexhaustible quiver.

A Vision of Doom

In the days agoe Bierce exerted his power of luminous mockery to very good effect upon just such provocation as recent events developed. It was when civic pride as now was dead and disorder encouraged by demagogues prevailed that Bierce put some of the bitterness of his feelings in a poem that throbs with his radiant force of expression. This poem is not to be found among his printed works. It is entitled "A Vision of Doom"; of which the following is an extract:

As I stood, a voice,
But whence it came I knew not, cried aloud
Some words to me in a forgotten tongue,
Yet straight I knew me for a ghost forlorn,
Returned from the illimited inane.
Again, but in a language that I knew,
As in reply to something which in me
Had shaped itself a thought, but found no words,
It spake from the dread mystery about:
"Immortal shadow of a mortal soul
That perished with eternity, attend.

What thou beholdest is as void as thou:
The shadow of a poet's dream—himself
As thou, his soul as thine, long dead,
But not like thine outlasted by its shade.
His dreams alone survive eternity
As pictures in the unsubstantial void.
Excepting thee and me (and we because The poet wove us in his thought) remains
Of nature and the universe no part
Or vestige but the poet's dreams. This dread,
Unspeakable land about thy feet, with all
Its desolation and its terrors—lo!
'Tis but a phantom world. So long ago
That God and all the angels since have died
That poet lived—yourself long dead—his mind
Filled with the light of a prophetic fire,
And standing by the Western sea, above
The youngest, fairest city in the world,
Named in another tongue than his for one
Ensainted, saw its populous domain
Plague-smitten with a nameless shame.

For there
Red-handed murder rioted; and there
The people gathered gold, nor cared to loose
The assassin's fingers from the victim's throat,
But said, each in his vile pursuit engrossed:
"Am I my brother's keeper? 'Let the Law
Look to the matter.' But the Law did not.
And there, O pitiful! the babe was slain
Within its mother's breast and the same grave
Held babe and mother; and the people smiled,
Still gathering gold, and said: 'The Law, the Law.'
Then the great poet, touched upon the lips
With a live coal from Truth's high altar, raised

Resolution in Nevada Politics

Just now the State of Nevada is in the throes of deep speculation regarding the political changes which even the caloused alkali dusted sage brush settlers recognize is taking place. Signs of the change went singing through the air during the late meeting of the State legislature in Carson. The railroad lobby appeared there as debonair and confident as usual, pinned to the hour to kill the railroad rate bill when, mirabili dictu, the rate bill went through with an enthusiastic whoop, the discomfited lobby was irretrievably worsted and the old political machine was given such a shaking up by "those whoopers from Goldfield, Bullfrog and them other camps" that there's no possible chance of even patching it up.

End of the Comstock "Sack"

The fact is that during the session of the last Carson legislature the "Comstock crowd," which has been running Nevada politically since the early seventies, woke up to find their political stronghold stampeded by the new Southern Nevada mining camps. These hustling enthusiasts carted off the county seat from Hawthorne to Goldfield after a desperate fight to a finish, passed a lot of anti-railroad legislation that is still making the corporations sizzle and gave notice that there will be henceforth an end to Colonel Mazuma electing the future U. S. Senators from Nevada. Henceforth the Comstock is not to exercise the exclusive privilege of fitting out its bonanza kings with the purple toga. The young and aggressive new mining camps in the south are eager to make their influence felt. When the Reno Journal changed hands recently and the rumor went out that the new management was friendly to Larry Sullivan and had a campaign mapped out to advance his interests for U. S. Senator a roar of protest went up from the new mining centers. At once the Journal came out with a flat and decisive denial of having any such plan. Whereat the young lion layed down once more and licked his chops apparently pacified but all the same he is on guard vigilantly watching lest any of the old Comstock raiders rise to snatch the political thunder. The old days when the Comstock ruled Nevada and half a dozen San Francisco millionaires ruled the Comstock and the political destiny of the Sage Brush State are gone forever.

Some Sly Jurists

This is the season of the year when it is customary for our judges of the Superior Court to take their vacation. It is the theory of the Superior Court that Bench and Bar should have a brief season of rest, and that for this purpose the machinery of justice should be stopped. But this theory, I have been told, by a delegation of indignant lawyers, is never realized inasmuch as the judges are never of one mind respecting the time suitable for a rest. One or two like to hold court in the vacation period agreed upon, for by doing so they give the pee-pul the impression that they are indefatigable and too conscientious to take a rest. But when the vacation period is at an end they slip quietly away to New York or elsewhere, and with all the other judges holding court, the absence of the sly ones attracts no attention. And thus it is that the lawyers are cheated out of a vacation. Some of them manage to make brief trips into the country, but they never enjoy a real vacation because of the selfishness of the gallery players of the Bench.

Jack London's Deterioration

There is very good reason to suspect that Jack London has degenerated, that he may no longer pose with success as an exponent of the strenuous elemental life. This disconcerting suspicion comes from reading in the public prints a story published on the all-sufficient authority of Mrs. Jack London that the author of "The Sea Wolf" and "Tales of the Fish Patrol" suffered the pangs of sea-sickness during the voyage of the Snark from this port to Honolulu. Imagine this persistent glorifier of the ocean, this champion of many waters who has buffeted the billows of divers seas in Arctic canoes, Japanese sampans and other strange craft, imagine him, if you can, tossing in his bunk on the summer Pacific, the victim of inglorious mal de mer! Truly the enervating influence of a landlubber's soft existence has wrought wonderfully with the London physique that it so quickly succumbs to this unheroic malady of the deep. Time was when London saw himself the very incarnation of Nietzsche's blond beast. He says so himself in "The War of the Classes": "I could only see myself raging through life without end like one of Nietzsche's blond beasts, lustfully roving and conquering by sheer superiority and strength. Further, the optimism bred of a stomach which could digest scrap iron and a body which flourished on hardships did not permit me to consider accidents as even remotely related to my glorious personality." Alas, the optimism of that circus digestion has given way to the pessimism of sea-sickness and the most undignified of marine accidents has attacked that glorious personality. Henceforth our much advertised man of letters must be characterized by an expression borrowed from that great authority who has already characterized the London animal stories as the "sublimity of absurdity in nature faking." Exit Jack London, the blond beast of Nietzsche; enter Jack London, the mollycoddle of President Roosevelt.

Millionaires Evanish

A few months ago a horde of Goldfield millionaires was threatening our local tenderloin with a wine famine. There is nothing on this earth so inductive to thirst as the alkali breezes of Nevada, and no place in the world where the concomitants of a thirst slaking fest are more inviting than right here in the electric lighted district dedicated to the joys of the night life. So hither trooped the parched throated fortune builders from the sagebrush, and as every mother's son that owned a hole in the ground sufficiently deep to be listed on the Exchange for the allurements of easy-marks, was heralded as a Goldfield millionaire, this new tribe of plutocrats was becoming as numerous as the Colonels of Kentucky. Goldfield millionaires infused new enthusiasms into the tenderloin. They inspired new emotions, imparted new thrills, and started new romances. But alas! the Goldfield millionaire spender did not come to stay. He was an ephemeral plutocrat. His wine thirst has been abated. He no longer contributes to the gayety of the tenderloin. His subsidence was coincident with the dropping of the bottom out of the Goldfield stock market. According to a recent arrival from Goldfield, business in that mining town has become very dull. It is the opinion of the principal operators that the wild-cat schemes have petered out for good and that the stock of none of the undeveloped properties will ever again be carried up in sympathy with the stock of the big

Shortridge the Suburbanite

Samuel Shortridge, the Henry Clay of the California Bar, is assiduously engaged these days in broadening the scope of his knowledge. Mr. Shortridge is a man of versatile talents, possessed of a large fund of information in many departments of knowledge, but amidst all the fascinating furniture of his mind, won from study and enlightened companionship, he is painfully deficient in some of the activities that engage the attention of men. With chicken raising, for example, he has but a slender acquaintance. With that industry he now meditates an intimacy; also with the pleasures of the garden, and the raptures of the dairy, for the eloquent attorney has become a suburbanite and he purposes living between sessions of the court after the manner of the true country gentleman, inhaling the breath of the dawn and the smell of the night, cultivating his own fig tree and vine, developing a passion for the sad Columbine, the mauve Gentian and the blue Verbena, taking root perhaps, in the midst of his tulips, and hearkening anon to the music of the lowing solitary "bossy" winding slowly o'er the lea. Mr. Shortridge's new home is in Menlo Park, forty minutes from the heart of San Francisco by the S. P. over the new cut-off.

Local Newspaper Men Decorated

The Emperor of Japan has just decorated several American newspaper correspondents who achieved more or less fame and big expense bills during the late war. The medals are golden bronze, about the size of a $20 gold piece and bear on the obverse crossed Japanese standards, surmounted by the rising sun. On the reverse is a monumental shaft of conventional form, flanked by branches of palm and laurel. The title conveyed is the Imperial Order of the Crown. San Francisco carries off three of the honors, a handsome percentage of the number bestowed. The Bulletin is represented by Grant Wallace and Richard Barry and the Examiner by Jack London. The Call-Herald is represented by Oscar King Davis and William Lewis but that newspaper combination can hardly be regarded as exclusively Californian, though in a fine weighing of the merits it might be claimed that Jack London also represented the Eastern Hearst papers. The balance of the decorations were bestowed as follows: George Kennan, Outing; Richmond Smith, Associated Press; W. G. Morgan, New York Tribune; Richard Harding Davis, Frederick Palmer and J. H. Hare, of Collier's Weekly.

A Great Test Case

According to several of the leading lights of the local bar all the labor cases now confronting us are as nothing to the great one which will be put up to the United States Supreme Court next October—the question of the liability of a labor union to punishment under the anti-trust law. It will be the first time this important point has been raised. The issue is advanced in the suit of a Connecticut hat manufacturer named Lowe who charges that some two hundred members of the American Federation of Labor sent out circulars all over the country to his customers warning them to cut off trade with him or they would be put on the "unfair" list and would lose the patronage of the labor unions and their friends. Lowe brought suit for $240,000 damages under the anti-trust law, which provides that any violation shall be punished with a fine amounting to three times the damages suffered. The case is attracting more attention in conservative union circles than is the Haywood case.

"Silent" Barrie

James Matthew Barrie, according to an English writer, is the most silent man in London. He says absolutely nothing, and some of his contemporaries affect to believe that he is keeping silent for a wager. When he is spoken to at literary gatherings he looks sad and puzzled, sad that people will do such a stupid thing as talk, and puzzled as to how to treat the peculiarity. However, his silence is a good investment, for his returns from books and plays net him a quarter of a million a year. In this connection the wife of one of his cousins thus makes moan. Barrie was visiting his relative and the lady did her best to be agreeable according to her lights. "It was downright hard work. To think that I, a poor, stupid woman, should be forced to grind out talk of an unresponsive brain, while the great J. M., with his mill full of grist, sat silent. At last, wearied out with my efforts, I left the room. In about an hour I returned. Still those fond cousins sat gazing into a dying fire while they worshipped My Lady Nicotine. 'You're having a lovely time,' I exclaimed. 'Fine,' answered J. M. 'We've not spoken since you left the room.'"

The Peter Martins

Writes a correspondent from New York:

The Peter Martins came home from Europe very unexpectedly. Mrs. Peter had planned to spend the summer in Europe, but pressing domestic affairs urged upon her the necessity for a summer in America. As the Martins had leased Colonel Morrell's house on the Newport cliffs, made sacred by having been occupied by the Pemmy Jones' one season, they stayed over in New York one night only. Mrs. Martin is as radiantly beautiful as ever, her manner and air of supreme hauteur rouses envy in the breasts of all the clerks in the Boston store, who always fall all over themselves to wait on her. They all agree that Lily of money. Not at all. Mrs. Carolan has not greatly reduced her size of the Pullman fortune. She is selling her Chicago property because she wishes to forget that she came from Chicago.

Bad Blood in Burlingame

The breach in Burlingame will be wider than ever now that Francis Heney accuses Mr. Henry T. Scott of tale-bearing and expecting to propitiate the prosecution by injuring Mr. Will Crocker and Mr. Glass. If developments should continue along this line Mrs. Will Crocker will find it impossible before long to recognize anybody in Burlingame except the servants. Mrs. Crocker has never taken Burlingame society seriously. But she is likely to now that she sees so much reason for despising it. As she is one of the few women of any consequence mentally in San Francisco society it has always been possible for her to dominate it, but she never cared to. Now, however, she may take pity on it and reorganize it.

The Longworths

By the time this goes to press the whereabouts of the Nicholas Longworths will be as firmly established as the society reporters' determination to make capital out of the visit of this distinguished couple. The press wardens of the smart set, whose duty it is to ink all over every pink tea that comes their way, are at present poised, pen in hand, for definite news of Mrs. Eleanor Martin's intentions. "Will the dowager empress of San Francisco society again have the privilege of entertaining the president's daughter" is the interrogation that disturbs the society reporters. Mrs. Martin is pictured as restlessly walking the floor while her minions breathlessly answer the telephone and postman's ring for news of Lady Alice's acceptance. As a matter of fact, so an intimate friend of the family tells me, Mrs. Martin has never thought of asking Mrs. Longworth to accept her hospitality on this brief visit to the city. People are so scattered that it would be

The Eddy-Beveridge Engagement

A friend in Berlin writes me that there is no doubt about the engagement of Spencer Eddy's sister, Katherine, to Senator Beveridge. Katherine Eddy spent the winter in Berlin and while Lurline Eddy was in retirement she acted as hostess of the menage. She is a pretty foil to the dark beauty of her sister-in-law and they are more devoted than the mere proprieties of in-laws demand. Senator Beveridge is considered distinctly eligible even for a niece of Mrs. Marshall Field. My informant further tells me that Lurline Eddy is not considered a great beauty in Berlin. In Paris, as Lurline Spreckels, she was considered by many the most beautiful girl in the American colony. She is well liked by the Germans but her type is not the sort before which the Teutonic beauty worshippers prostrate themselves. Spencer Eddy is frequently spoken of as the best dressed man in Berlin and I understand that he prides himself in his sartorial fitness and takes great pleasure in the fact that all the young foreign attaches pattern their wardrobes after his.

The Lady and the Iron

"A Quart of Juice or the Washerwoman's Electric Revenge" might aptly be the title of a serio-comedy which has recently been played in the most fashionable apartment house in the city. The leading role was taken by a young society matron whose vivacious charm makes her conspicuous at smart gatherings. She wears her clothes with such distinction that it would be rather difficult for her friends to visualize her in the role of a washerwoman. As a matter of fact it is not necessary to drape the lady in bedraggled calicoes for the part. She did not make up as realistically for the Lady of the Suds as Ethel Barrymore does. Instead she probably wore a cunning little tea gown for you see her washing consisted of dainty little things like lingerie blouses, fetching neckwear and delicate accessories that make the French laundrymen wax prosperous. Since the lady did not paste them up in the front windows to dry it was really rather meddlesome of the house-maid to gossip about the clotheslines that were strung across the apartment on sunny days when Madame was out at fashionable teas. The management remained blissfully ignorant of the whole affair until the people in the next apartment complained that their sleep was parted in the middle by the bzz! whirr! of an electric iron. They declared it was like trying to sleep with a telephone receiver at one's ear and a nickel-in-the-slot subscriber banging at the hook.

Didn't Mean to Violate Rules

So Mine Host sent around notices that guests unlawfully attaching electric irons to the fixtures made him liable to a fine for not having a laundry license. The lady whose nocturnal energy was expended on an electric iron in an effort to subdue her laundry bills was very indignant at first, but she now laughingly declares that the electric iron never hissed above a whisper and that the complaint was really a piece of spite work because she had refused to give a social lift to the complainants. She says she didn't know it was against all rules and regulations and she isn't a bit ashamed of doing an amateur laundress stunt in these hold-up days.

They All Do It

Since hearing the above story I have learned that almost all society women who are not cousin-germane to Croesus travel with a small electric iron in their suit cases. Of course its against the law to use them in hotels, but that's a small matter to most women compared to the convenience of being able to press the creases out of travel mused finery. In a great many country homes where a laundry is not provided for the convenience of the guests the electric iron is all that stands between a girl and wrinkles. There are a number of society girls who pride themselves on their dexterity and proudly announce that they do up all their own French blouses.

A Society Vocalist on the Stage

Another San Franciscan has taken to the stage. This time it is Edward Montgomery, well known in society. He is one of the members of the talented Montgomery family whose coon song and cake walks used to be a feature of the Doctors Daughters' benefit performances. Dennis O'Sullivan and Blanche Bates urged the talented trio to go on the stage, but Owen and Edna preferred married life. Edward Montgomery and his friend Sherril Schell started on a European trip a year ago, and in Paris the former began his vocal studies. I hear that it was on the advice of Bessie Abbott, the opera singer, that he decided to enter the profession. He has met with considerable success in "Captain Jinks," "Old Heidelberg" and "Brother Officers." In Paris he sang in the salons of Lady Lange and the Duchess de la Rochefoucauld, who was Mattie Mitchell of Portland. He used to sing in this city for Mrs. Horace Hill and Mrs. J. E. Tucker.

For the Coolbrith Fund

George Wharton James, writer and lecturer returned to Del Monte on Friday of last week and on Sunday evening gave a talk at Carmel-by-the-Sea, in aid of the Coolbrith fund. Mr. James has with him several handsome autographed photographs of Mark Twain, which are to be sold for the benefit of the fund. Many authors of note have presented copies of their works in which they have written inscriptions, which add greatly to their value. Copies of Miss Coolbrith's poems have been exquisitely bound in full or three-quarter crushed Levant with inlaid flowers and gilt ornaments in the highest style of book-binder's art. Every binding is in an original design and no two are alike. All of these are to be sold for the benefit of the fund that is being raised to provide the Californian poetess with a home, in lieu of the one that she lost last year in the San Francisco disaster.

On The Clock Green

The Ladies' Putting Contest on the Del Monte Clock Green last week brought out five competitors in pretty summer dresses. The winner was Miss E. A. W. Morgan with a score of 22-24; total 46 for two rounds of the clock. Mrs. R. M. Loeser and Mrs. H. R. Warner tied for second place with scores of 24-24; total 48 each. Miss Bourne's score was 29-30; total 59. Miss Morgan won a Ladies' Putter as a prize.

Broncho-Busting Into Literature

It certainly seems as though the "college woman" is outstripping even the actress in her race for notoriety. Hardly a week goes by now-a-days without a full-cut portrait in the papers with glaring headlines of some "College Girl Who Works Her Way Around the World," "College Woman Marries Her Oriental Pupil," "Co-ed Turns Foot-Pad," or other thrilling tale. The latest college girl to leave the beaten path is preparing to startle the world by means of the pen. This fact in itself is not so unusual but the manner of doing dips into the wildly weird territory where gasps go off like steam geysers. Miss Sophie Treadwell, who graduated from the University of California a few years ago found teaching in a district school in the mountains quite too tame for her college bred fancy. So, according to reports, she is to break bronchos on a Modoc County Ranch, and if the broncho-breaking does not prove neck-breaking, she will write of her experiences for Eastern magazines. It is true that Eleanor Gates did not follow the plow before writing "The Plowwoman," but there are ways and ways. The literary field offers a new excursion for Miss Treadwell, and surely throwing the lasso is more exhilarating than wielding the rod in a country school-room. Some time ago it was whispered that Miss Treadwell and Miss Isabel McReynolds, who was recently divorced from her society in Berkeley for reasons unknown to the college world, were collaborating on a story. The subject matter was kept a deep and dark mystery, but thus far the public has seen no evidence of the combined efforts. Those who knew Miss Treadwell in college, remember her, however, as cut after a somewhat different pattern from the majority of her college mates. For some years she registered for all jurisprudence courses, and only a short time before her graduation, did she give up her intention of becoming a lawyer.

Adele—Did you say that Belle is sorry that she spent so much money on her wedding?

Ethel—Yes; she hasn't any left for her divorce.

Sudermann's Latest Drama

"The Flower Boat" is the name of the latest Sudermann drama. It is said to be quite as powerful a play as his "Magda" and more candid in its treatment of a delicate topic than his "Joy of Living." It mercilessly holds up the mirror to the German Nineveh—Berlin. Brutally, fearlessly, the greatest of German dramatists excepting Hauptmann dissects the shallow philosophy based on Nietzsche which is an absorbing topic of controversy in Germany, and those who most ardently uphold him are perhaps those who, like the chief characters of this play, least understand the true significance of his theories. "The Flower Boat" may be regarded as Sudermann's contribution to the Nietzsche controversy. He presents in it the spectacle of a mother who, deeming herself a "super-woman" in the pseudo-Nietzschean sense, desires to pass pleasantly through life as in a "flower boat" in the garlands of which the serpents, not of a great passion, but of amorous dalliance, writhe and wriggle shamelessly and unchecked. Like a festering sore the ideas of this elegant wanton have poisoned the atmosphere around her and infected her daughters. But in their hearts there slumbers a spark of the ultimate passion of decency and we see—but not before their lives have been shaken to the very roots—a glimpse of salvation. This is the one positive note in the play. It is symbolic of Germany, mad modern literary Germany, finding herself once more and restoring the fallen household gods to their altars.

The first act introduces us to the salon of a refined voluptuary, the Baroness Erfflingen, widowed daughter-in-law of the founder of a great commercial house.

Her husband has committed suicide, and she has married a convenient nonentity to whom she owes her title. Her daughter, Raffaella, has married Brose-mann, a stern and simple man whom she derides as a philistine, and who is the actual head of the firm that conducts the affairs of the house in the name of its founder, now in his dotage. The second daughter, Thea, the heroine of the play, is about to be married to a young count of orthodox views whose narrowness she detests. A family council has been appointed to discuss the marriage. Before that even there is a conversation between the two sisters which throws a light on the mode of thought of fashionable Berlin:

Thea (with an innocent air): Tell me, sweetie, I was going to ask you this question long ago—why don't you take a lover?

Raffaella (lets the flowers drop and looks around timidly): Thea! For God's sake!

Thea: I have been observing you now for a whole year. You laugh, you cry, your lips are feverishly warm. Now it is this one, now that one who interests you. I always keep thinking: When will something happen? But nothing happens. Tell me now, it cannot be that you are so utterly devoid of talent?

Raffaella: Dear Thea, I forbid you to speak in this manner to me.

Thea: My dear, my sweet sister, I am not a child any more. We poor things, if we do not mutually trust and confide in one another—

Raffaella: Yes, yes, dear; but believe me, you are quite mistaken, it is a false picture you are creating.

Thea: As regards details—yes. That is natural. But I won't allow myself to be blinded. I see everything, the entire mechanism. All the world is a market for lovers, the end of all things—intoxication, life, the exercise of the imagination—everything, in a word, is the lover. For whom are we beautiful? For the lover. Why do we strive for individuality and independence? In order to hold ourselves inwardly free for the lover.

Raffaella: Oh, if mamma heard you?

Thea: Ha, ha! It is from her that I get all this wisdom.

Raffaella (shocked): From mother?

Thea: Of course she never said it to me. Such things are as a rule not said. But, dear, it is the atmosphere, the atmosphere that one must breathe, and the atmosphere around mother was always that—

Raffaella: I, in your position, would respect her gray hair.

Thea: So I do! Mother is a superb woman, the grandest woman I know. Mother laughs, and everybody and everything is at her feet. Mother need but lift her hand. She is a goddess. That is why she was able to live the life she did.

Raffaella: But you were a child then. You did not understand anything.

Thea: No. At that time I only used to wonder why it is that little girls are invariably sent away when a handsome uncle calls. But—

Raffaella: Thea! Thea! I do not want to. Don't speak. I know it.

Thea: So you know it also? You are not so stupid after all?

Raffaella (with tears): It was not that way; not exactly so. You must not always think the worst.

Thea: Deary, lovey, don't cry. I cannot see you cry. I don't mean to reproach her at all. I think it was her full right, and I will act likewise.

Raffaella: For God's sake child! It is a crime against yourself to speak like that on the day of your engagement.

Thea: Yes, you were good and pious. God knows! But what is the use? At last the voice of the blood speaks.

Raffaella: No, it does not, it must not, it ought not. I love Leopold. He is my husband and I love him.

Thea: And think of your lion-hunter day and night.

Raffaella: That is not—

Thea: Don't fight against it. It catches you all. It will catch me some day also. . . .

Kelcey and Shannon

Madeline Lucette Ryley's funny comedy "A Coat of Many Colors" with Mr. Herbert Kelcey and Miss Effie Shannon in the leading roles, will be the attraction at the New Alcazar Theatre this coming week. A more complicated farce was never written. Its situations tumble over one another and are ridiculous to the extreme. Mr. Kelcey and Miss Shannon are meeting with great success at the Alcazar. The patrons of that theatre appreciate the fact that these two thespians are artists of the highest rank, and that their appearance at the head of our leading stock company marks an epoch in the history of local theatricals.

High Class Vaudeville

The week beginning this Sunday matinee will be a red letter one at the Orpheum for the bill to be presented there contains among its new acts, five of the very best in vaudeville, two of which are headliners of exceptional merit. James Neill and Edythe Chapman Neill, chief among the newcomers are old favorites who will be most cordially welcomed. Their contribution will consist of a one act comedy by Julian Street, entitled "The Lady Across the Hall." Mr. and Mrs. Neill will be assisted by Reginald Travers, a clever young San Franciscan who of late has been distinguishing himself in the East. The other headliners are Jesse L. Lasky's latest vaudeville success, "The Stunning Grenadiers," an elaborate production embracing four scenes, four complete changes of beautiful costume and many bewildering and novel effects. Although the entire production was made in London and Paris it is the result of some clever and original American ideas. It is headed by Meredith Meredro an American prima donna who was a great success in the London Music Halls. The remainder of the cast is composed of charming European girls and includes Maude Corbett, an English comedienne. The company also possesses an eccentric musical director who wields the baton a la Creatore with fanatic skill and vigor. Roberts, Hayes and Roberts will introduce their laughing comedy sketch, "The Cowboy, The Swell and The Lady." Billy Gaston and Ethel Green who were features of the Babes in Toyland and Wizard of Oz Companies will furnish a skit entitled, "Bits of Musical Comedy." Mr. Gaston is the author of "Gee But This Is a Lonesome Town," and other song successes. Both artists excel as comedians, singers and dancers. Les Tardy, two famous French equilibrists, will also make their first appearance. It will be the last week of Willard Simms & Co., Muller, Chun and Muller, and of Benjamin Chapin in his inimitable impersonation of Abraham Lincoln. There will be new motion pictures.

Idora Park

The charming operatta "The Merry War" is drawing to Idora Park the usual large crowds and they find that the beautiful waltz and march melodies of the great Strauss are as captivating and seductive as ever. These typical Viennese melodies seem never to grow old. The company does exceptionally good work and special praise is due Miss Christine Nielsen, a young lady who has had only six or eight weeks' experience on the stage. She sings the difficult music of her role with the skill of a true artist, and displays exceptional histrionic talent. She is besides an extremely pretty girl not yet out of her teens. Edith Mason, Bernice Holmes, Tom Persse, Walter De Leon and Ferris Hartman are all at their very best, and Steindorff's chorus and orchestra deserve special mention. The new scenic railway is proving a great attraction and a "Barrel of Fun" is another addition to the Park that is pleasing the patrons. After the run of "The Merry War" we are promised a superb production of "The Geisha" with Wallace Brownlow, the eminent baritone, as Lieutenant Fairfax and Miss Goodwin, a new soubrette, as the French girl.

In the Limelight

"The Prince Chap" follows Ezra Kendall at the Van Ness Theatre and will be played by Cyril Scott and the New York cast. This is one of the most charming plays of the decade and holds a particularly fine record in this country as well as abroad.

Ethel Barrymore will close her engagement at the Van Ness Theatre with the performances on Saturday afternoon and night. The Friday and Saturday night performance as well as the Saturday matinee will have as an additional feature the one act play of "Carrotts."

Mme. Galski will sing several new roles during the season at the Metropolitan Opera House this winter. Conried has the exclusive rights to her services for the next three years, but has consented to her appearing at a few concerts previous to the opening of the New York season. So we shall hear the great artist while her voice is at its very best and before it has been subjected to the hard work of a New York opera season.

Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin, for purposes of the tour of "The Great Divide" next season, will retain the same company, with one minor exception, which aided in the extraordinary success of the William Vaughn Moody drama at the Princess Theatre, New York, last year. Mrs. Thomas Whiffen and Laura Hope Crews will again be the chief feminine support while the masculine roster will include Charles Wynn-gate, Charles Gotthold, William J. Butler, Arnold Wilbur, Henry B. Walthall, Bertram Harrison and Nolan Gagne. Mr. Miller and Miss Anglin will renew their New York run in "The Great Divide" at Daly's Theatre on August 26th and will go on tour about mid-autumn, playing in all the principal cities from Boston to Kansas City between that time and March, after which a trip to the Pacific Coast and the Pacific Northwest will be made.

Alla Nazimova will appear in an American play by an American author next season. This is Risgeley Torrenie's "The Madstone," which Henry Miller, the beautiful Russian actress' manager, considers another "The Great Divide" in point of originality, strength and dramatic intensity. Nazimova's chief Ibsen revival will be "The Master Builder," though of course she will repeat her wonderful performances in "A Doll's House" and "Hedda Gabler."

the Massereens women were of no account; she felt herself only to be an incumbrance. That heightened Shan's glory in her eyes. He was immortally young and romantic, he had known the "world." Its glamour was on him. An ageless romance is no bad companion, it was Fiona's. Shan dominated her life as secretly and completely as he dominated his mother's, but neither woman spoke of him. Fiona only knew the anniversaries in his life by the concentrated gloom on her grand-aunt's face.

This very day was Shan's birthday, and Fiona had resolved to visit his grave. As she turned the corner of the road she met—not a banshee—but Mad Andy, who came singing towards her. His vacant eyes stared before him, his cracked voice thrilled out sentiments as rebellious as they were childish. He passed Fiona still singing. A yard behind her he paused and flung a statement over his shoulder.

"I'm afther seein' Misther Shan," he announced.

Fiona wheeled round.

"What Mr. Shan?" she asked eagerly.

"There niver was but the one Misther Shan, an' he lived beyant." Andy waved an arm towards the Red House. Then with the peculiar cunning of the short-witted in his eyes, he exhibited to Fiona a florin held tightly between his teeth.

"'Twas himself gave it me for the reminbrance of old times," he added.

Then fearful for his possession he resumed his road and his song.

Fiona was puzzled. She knew that in Andy's brain past and present gleamed alternately like the colors of shot silk. Some kind stranger had recalled the memory of the open-handed Shan. She turned down a lane and went by an old gate into the Abbey grounds. The dead leaves whirled about her as she approached the ruined church, which, among its hollies and fir trees, looked like some chapel perilous set in a wild land.

The tiny churchyard was disused, but the graves of the Massereens were there among ground ivy and woodsorrel and plants that crept into the crannies of stonework. There was no cross over Shan, for his father had deemed a block of granite a more befitting memorial for the dead. He would have resorted in his blind bigotry to a heathen memorial rather than a cross. So on a block of smooth granite was recorded the name—"John Massereen," and the date, and then the lines—

"O Paradise, O Paradise,

I greatly long to see

The special place my dearest Lord

In love prepares for me."

Unfortunately Shan had never displayed any such longing or any celestial anxiety whatsoever.

Behind Shan's head was a wild valley and then the Wicklow mountains, dark against a stormy sky. A low red glow sent gleams amongst the tree trunks. The hour was enchanted.

Fiona knelt by the grave, her face buried in her hands. Her grand-uncle slept too profoundly under a marble urn to tell her not to pray for the dead, so she prayed for Shan vaguely, almost wordlessly. When she looked up her eyes met the eyes of a man who was sitting on the wall with his back to the mountains and his feet on the granite block. His figure was outlined against the dim light.

"Were you praying for him?" he asked abruptly.

Fiona could scarcely find her voice. She swallowed nervously.

"Yes," she said at last.

"I wonder why," he answered.

"Because," said Fiona, "because I love him. This is his birthday, I—I had to come."

She paused shyly, though her eyes said that there was more unexpressed.

"But you cannot have known him," said the stranger, "you must be very young."

"I am nineteen," this with absolute frankness.

"Do young girls generally remember the dead who have lain in their graves for twenty years?" he asked.

Fiona still knelt, her hands unconsciously clasped.

"Ah, but with Cousin Shan it is different," she said; "he—he seems to be always with me. He is so real that I think I know him better almost than Aunt Matilda. I do not think on a night like this he could sleep quietly. I think he would wake up to follow the wind, and to see the mountains. Don't you—don't you think so?"

He turned away from her, his face silhouetted against the dim light. There was a silhouette of Shan at the Red House. The two profiles were identical. Fiona saw this, and an excitement far deeper than terror made her shiver.

"You are right, Cousin Fiona," he said slowly. "No one could stay in his grave on such a night. The wildness of it would wake the dead. Has Heaven anything like it do you think? These swaying trees, the wet smell of the world, the mountains there, the dusk. Oh! dear God, it's good, it's good. A man couldn't lie still to-night—I couldn't."

Fiona rose, the last gleam rested on her excited elfish little face.

"Oh, Shan, I knew you would come sometime," she cried.

The man turned towards her quickly, but she could not see his expression. She went on speaking very quickly and eagerly.

"Shan, I have waited for you to come so long; I've had to pretend you were there—but I knew you were. Aunt Matilda is kind, but she is so old and grave, they all are—Anne and Thomas and Mrs. Redman; but I felt you would understand. Do you remember when I found the flycatcher's nest in the garden? I hoped you'd see. And when Aunt Matilda locked me into the china cupboard, and I cried so, I thought you came and whispered at the keyhole. Shan, I never was lonely because you were there, you were always young and kind, and you understood. Oh! I wish you could stay with us. I thought you'd be here to-night; everything said you would. But are you really truly," her voice shook, "really Shan?"

"My name is Shan Massereen," he answered.

Fiona trembled. She was giddy with excitement. The raindrops pattered on her old hat and against her flushed cheeks.

"You must go home," said Shan, then he laughed. "We don't mind rain, you and I, Fiona? But it's getting very dark. If I tell you to go home, will you?"

"Yes—but—Oh! Shall I never see you again?"

"If you come here at sunrise I will be here."

"Sunrise?"

"Yes, will you come?"

"Oh, of course."

"Why are you not frightened?" he asked suddenly.

"Because I love you, Shan."

"Ah! Well I will be here because I love you, Fiona."

She turned and left him; a dripping, obedient little figure she passed into the darkness of the trees, through the wild wind and beating rain.

The leaves of the arbutus and the holly trees glistened, as Fiona, in the strange glow of an autumn morning, ran down the Glenroy road. She ran, because the sky was rose and gold, and a wind blew out from the sunrise. The whole world shone with the first ethereal glory of dawn. The leaves rustled round her feet. At the Abbey gate she paused for a moment. Then (it was well for Mr. Massereen that he did not see his grand-niece!) she made the sign of the cross.

She walked over the grass more slowly, at the corner by the holly trees she looked towards the mountains and the ivy-covered low wall. Shan was sitting there, the light upon his young sun-burnt face and his rough brown hair. His hat lay on the ground, and he sang to himself. Fiona stood quite still, and he looked up and saw her among the hollies.

He rose and came towards her. He sang as he came, and the morning was like him and he like the morning. Fiona gazing at him with wide startled eyes knew that he was no ghost, but the living young embodiment of Shan. She did not question him. Their eyes met, and he smiled and kissed her. They looked at the mountains and the wild valley. Then they knelt hand in hand by the grave of the elder Shan, the father of the one, the cousin of the other.

Mad Andy met them at the turn of the road, and gave them a bow which was worthy of an imperial court.

"'Tis Mither Shan," he said, and laughed; then he muttered "He's put the comether on Miss Fiona," and turned to stare at her. For the morning was with Fiona, in her eyes and in her heart.

When they reached the Red House Mrs. Massereen had long been up. She was in the library reading some ancient book of sermons. To her it was but "words, words, words," for her son came between her and the book, so that she could only see him or try to see him, for the moment her mind tried to conjure up his face it eluded her. She tried to hear his voice, but she could not. Her whole being was rigid in this effort after concentration. When the attainment came she thought her fancy was cheating her with a noble deception. For she heard Shan's voice in the hall and his step on the threshold.

Then she knew that her wild prayers were answered and that he had returned. For a second as her dazzled eyes rested on him she believed her own fancy.

"My son, my son!"

But she was Shan's mother, and she knew that this was not her boy, but someone who was like him, yet unlike.

She stood and waited, and he came to her and kissed her hands.

"You are my grandmother," he said, "I am Shan's son. I have come to look for my own people. This is my father's land. Will you not kiss me?"

She put her arms about him.

"What is your name?"

"Shan Massereen," he said.

Then Mrs. Massereen knew that the world had changed, for Shan had returned.

"The Long Road"

There is abundant evidence that the writers of fiction have begun to discover other themes to occupy their pens than the momentous question whether they shall devote their attention to the problem of two women and one man, and the consequent comedy, or whether it shall be two men and one woman, and tragedy; whether their lovers shall marry in the first chapter and tire of each other on the rest of the journey, or whether they shall yearn through four hundred pages of print and finally come together under a shower of rice. "The Long Road" is unique in more respects than one. It is a tragedy without gloom, a story of Russia which relates neither the intrigues of the society of the capital, the conspiracies of the Nihilists nor the persecutions of the peasantry; a tale of exile in which convict chains and cruel Cossacks are left out, a narrative so simply set forth that it might easily be taken for one of the primitive legends of the country. Ivan Illne was a prosperous blacksmith in Kazan, one of the Volga provinces. The resources of Siberia had but newly been discovered. Men were needed to develop them. Ivan had been given a present of snuff by a trader for whom he made repairs. Ivan took snuff—what more do we want? He was exiled to Irkutsk, and for more than a year he was on his way, he and his wife and his little nine-year-old Stepan, walking the dreary miles to the place of his assignment. Ivan learned wisdom and made no complaint. To whom should he lament, and why? He set himself up in business once more, and his trade prospered. His boy lived and grew and worked at the forge beside him, and the fame of Illne traveled far, as that of a good workman. Dolgourof, the governor of the province, held his reins lightly and there was peace and prosperity at home, albeit the contributions to the Imperial treasury were small. But Dolgourof went the way of all mortal men, and in his place came Paschkin, a hard man, a relative of the empress, and one whose eyes were not blinded to his own further advancement. Speedily he signalled out the Illnes, father and son, but the apparent honors they knew only too well how to estimate. Ivan Illne was made a member of the governor's council, which meant simply that by the law providing for the existence of such a body, certain men were selected to sit patiently and silently, if they could, and assent to what they could by no means prevent. Both father and son were made the instruments of the oppression of others. Being Russians and already in exile, how could they escape their fate and still live? A convoy from one of the silver mines was late. The roads were virtually impassible, but it mattered not to Paschkin. Ivan was sent as an envoy to discover the cause of the delay, and to bring back the heads of those who were to blame. Between two stages of his journey, man, horses and attendants disappeared. None were ever seen again, but the governor hanged the two men in charge of the belated convoy, probably as an example to the bad roads. In his journey of exile the little Stepan had one adventure which he never forgot. The exiles were unprovided with food or other comforts. They trudged wearily through heat and cold, mud and rain, and depended on what they could beg from the villagers for their subsistence, and as the little Stepan's short legs were soon tired, the family party of three was generally at the end of the procession and often too late to obtain even a crust at the end of the long day. One evening, when this had been their hard experience, and the little boy was caked with mud from head to foot, a tiny girl, taking compassion on him, thrust into his hand her own supper cake, and the vision of her golden curls from under her little cap, as she stood between her parents in the doorway, and the name they called her, "little Katenka," never left his memory. What the name of the village was, whether far or near, the name or the station of her parents, and whether she were living or dead he did not know and had no means of learning, yet "little Katenka" kept all the other maidens out of Stepan's mind, and though his good mother longed to see him married and settled, he could find himself in no mood for it. It was the one good thing that Paschkin did for the Illines when he sent Stepan virtually to sieze two handsome black horses he had seen on the steppe, and there at the end of the expedition, was little Katenka, grown up, Katia, now and with her own recollections of the "little mud boy" who had excited her infant compassion. Stepan, guided by the counsel and example of his father, was careful not to make himself conspicuous. He was prosperous, but not too prosperous; he lived well, but not too well, and he studiously affected a degree of stupidity which left him unmolested. It was after the good Ivan's disappearance, when he and Katia were married, and there was a little Katia, just old enough to run about and prattle intelligibly, that the second bolt fell. The governor's sleigh had met with an accident, and coming to the nearest shop for repairs, he happened on the master instructing one of his men in a manner which showed his quality. It was enough. Stepan was drafted into the council, like his father before him, and in time, sent on an expedition precisely like that in which Ivan had been lost. Stepan was not drowned, however. Scarcely had he set forth when a messenger was sent, with information about the roads which had been withheld from him, to reach Verinsk before Stepan could make the journey. This express messenger carried a decree of banishment. Stepan Illine was privileged to travel in any part of Siberia save the province of Irkutsk, but on no consideration was he to be allowed to rest more than ten days in one place. His business, his wife and child, all his interests were in Irkutsk, across whose borders he must not step. He was a blacksmith and iron worker, yet, how could he set up a forge or obtain employment as a journeyman if he must forever move on? How could he even dispose of his interests or make any provision for those dependent upon him? The real story of Stepan Illine begins with this exile within exile, with the manner of which he enabled himself to re-establish a domestic life with his wife, Katia, his little Katenka, and the newly added baby Stepan, and his friend, the old Jew trader, Peter Korp, and the vicissitudes of "the long road" with its heart-breaking tragedies. The extraordinary decree by which Stepan was made a wanderer on the face of the earth to satisfy an arbitrary spite is vouched for as a historical fact. The crass stupidity of police officials who executed their instructions to the letter under the most trying circumstances would be unthinkable outside of Russia. Even after the death of Paschkin there was no release, for it was no one's business to revoke the decree. It is a singularly moving story. The figure of Stepan Illine is one which will live in the memory long after the pinchbeck heroes of pseudo-historical romances and problem novels have faded out. The merciless exactions of a tyrannical governor exercised in this way against a harmless man, and his helpless family are a mightier arraignment than all the blood spilled in the newspapers, all the tales of Nihilistic terrors, all the accounts of student circles broken up and military incompetence. The author, John Oxenham, has given us nothing before from which "The Long Road" could have been predicted. It stands out from the ruck of books like a finely executed statue amongst a heap of stones. Published by the Macmillan Company.

Justice Juggled Beneficently

For the one signal achievement of the Graft Prosecution—the substitution of Poet Taylor for Fiddler Schmitz—the community is profoundly grateful. If in all else there should be failure, in that one glorious consummation there is ample compensation. It would be much more satisfactory if Mayor Taylor could read his title clear, but we need not oppress ourselves with apprehensions over the reinstatement of Mayor Schmitz. While there is a section of the code which makes a verdict of guilty unaffirmed by the Supreme Court insufficient to effect removal from office, Schmitz cannot regain undisputed power until he is granted a new trial. And though it is pretty generally believed in the legal profession that he is entitled to a new trial the courts are not going to be in any hurry to give him a hearing. Judge Dunne, who is more concerned about the immediate interests of the community than anything else, has put the settlement of the bill of exceptions off as long as possible, and the Court of Appeals, not having been inoculated against timidity, an emotion which the press has made infectious, is not inclined to accelerate matters. In this matter Judge Dunne has shown that whatever else he may be devoid of, he is not lacking in a sense of humor. He postponed the settlement of the bill of exceptions on the score of pressure of business, and set for an antecedent date the trial of Eugene Schmitz on a second charge. This is a refined species of juggling with justice which the people must appreciate since it is for their benefit. Judge Dunne either is not so dull witted as his enemies assert, or else he is being cunningly advised, for if the programme is carried out Schmitz may be convicted a second time before the Court of Appeals is able to settle the points raised on the first trial. In other words Judge Dunne will be at liberty to conduct the second trial along the lines of the first, and all the while we shall enjoy the felicity of a clean and honest administration of municipal affairs. This method of correcting abuses may be repugnant to sensitive souls with an acute instinct for the law, and they may rant against these perversions which at another time may be indulged against the immediate interests of the people, especially if the whole bench proves susceptible to intimidation, but this appears to be a time in which it is salutary to ignore conventions. To be sure there was a speedy legal remedy at hand for the removal of crooks from office, but if that remedy had been invoked the governor of the state would have taken a hand in the straightening out of our affairs; and the governor is not in sympathy with labor unions. Besides an important desideratum was control of the political machine.

The Day of Judgment

The carpers who are finding fault with our judiciary, censuring those that assiduously cultivate mob favor and railing at the ones who are yielding to intimidation while being defied to undo the work of the Prosecution, should reflect that the latter are perhaps sacrificing themselves for the public weal. Human affairs are as variable as the clouds of heaven. Another year may find us dispassionate, beyond the bitterness and hatreds of internal dissension and in a mood for taking stock of our judges. Perhaps we shall be assisted to a sound judgment by the comments of those Eastern experts who have been reviewing the Schmitz case from afar. Or perhaps some jurist of high degree, in reversing a nisi prius court, will write an entertaining disquisition on improper conduct, in language free from technical phrases, and with such precision and clearness as to be within the comprehension of the common people. Then we shall probably view expediency in a different light from that which now illumines our judgment. In his calm moments the average citizen is scrupulously jealous of the character of the justice dispensed in the land. No matter how eager he may be for the punishment of the guilty he has a very strong prejudice against the man who sits to judge after the law and who smites contrary to the law. Every man who regards the law as a buckler to shield and a sanctuary to save, admires the judge, who, in times of inflamed feelings, has the courage and the conscience to fling himself back upon great and fixed principles, and suffers not the slightest encroachments of injustice. "Why!" asked Sydney Smith, "do we pay our homage to the dispensers of justice? Because we all feel that there must be somewhere or other a check to human passions; because we all know the immense value and importance of men in whose placid equity and mediating wisdom we can trust in the worst of times; because we cannot cherish too strongly and express too plainly that reverence one feels for men who can rise up in the ship of state, and rebuke the storms of the mind and bid its angry passions be still." We have reason to expect our judges to be men of the type that compel profound respect for the bench, men who never lose sight of the fact that they are charged with the duty of protecting the constitutional rights of their fellows with the sacred weapons of the law, and who know that there can be no crisis or emergency in which public morals and interests may be best subserved by sweeping aside fixed principles of justice. And while we may applaud them for yielding to our justifiable prejudice, in our cooler moments we realize that they have been false to their own conscience, and that the crimes they have punished are but venial transgressions in comparison with their own iniquities.

Playing to the Labor Gallery

Said Mayor Taylor upon his accession to office: "I abhor class distinction, class legislation, class administration. The law does not recognize it; our theory of government does not tolerate it; to no honest man can it appeal." Fine sentiments, and uttered with the proverbial sincerity of a poet. But no sooner was Mayor Taylor inducted into office than the mouth pieces of the Administration proceeded to advise him respecting the pestiferous and spurious representatives of labor who were deemed eminently qualified to co-operate with him in the management of our city government. Evidently Mayor Taylor's assertion that he abhorred class distinction made no impression on them. They assumed that it was distinctly "gallery talk." For if Mayor Taylor abhorred class distinction, most repugnant to him would be the idea of elevating to office, receiving as a member of his official family, any man who has achieved the discreditable distinction of being a labor leader in San Francisco. There are many union men in San Francisco competent to assist Mayor Taylor in the administration of municipal affairs; many that might reflect credit on his Administration, but they are not among the professional agitators who have brought organized labor into disrepute by diffusing the sentiment that there must always be hostility between the employer and the employed, and by aiming at the subversion of government in the interest of unionism. These professional agitators typify class distinction. While there is no objection to giving labor representation in governmental affairs, nothing could be more glaringly inconsistent with an abhorrence of class distinction than an endorsement of any man who has assisted in the creation of the sentiment that it is to the interest of unionism that injustice should prevail when on the side of union workingmen. That is the sentiment that has been created in this city by the men who have candidly confessed that justice is on the side of Patrick Calhoun and at the same time insist that he must bow to the dictates of organized labor. No man who abhors class distinction or in whom civic patriotism is more intense than zeal for self interest will extend the hand of fellowship to any demagogue by whom union labor has been converted into a faction animated by a spirit hostile to the city's best interests, a spirit contracted in its views and viciously selfish in its objects, a spirit that looks to the aggrandizement of the few even to the destruction of the interests of the whole. It is notorious that in this city today a sentiment is being fostered in organized labor antagonistic to the principles of our government. It is notorious that because of this sentiment San Francisco is virtually unrepresented in the National Guard of the State. Opposition to the militia is based upon no other sentiment than that which is hostile to that function of the state in the exercise of which law is enforced and order maintained. It is distinctly an anarchistic sentiment; and in a large measure, responsibility for it rests on the shoulders of a coterie of ill-bred and illiterate foreigners, who have rewarded the generosity of this country in bestowing on them the elective franchise, by inspiring class hatred and seeking to destroy the institutions which they have sworn to protect. Why should these men be coddled? Why should they be propitiated? We shall be told that they represent a large element of the community that should have a voice in the management of public affairs. But this is merely a fiction long nourished by demagogues. No reason having its roots in any sound theory of government can be urged in support of the contention that because unionism embodies a certain amount of force it should participate in the affairs of government. Organized labor is obviously a trust animated by principles that are prejudicial to the peace and prosperity of the country and as obnoxious to the sense of patriotism as those of the most corrupt capitalistic combine. It may be politic to recognize this revolutionary element that fosters demagogism, chicanery and distrust and that seeks by force and intimidation to make this a class government abounding in special privileges for unionism, but it is surely unjust, it is unquestionably hostile to the spirit of our constitution. Every man who abhors class distinction must revolt at the proposition to encourage the doing of politics by an organization which is responsible for the irreparable injury that has been done to this city and which, according to many Eastern authorities, has made it impossible for San Francisco to regain her supremacy as the metropolis of the coast.

Modernism and the Pope

Not since Pope Leo XIII addressed his encyclical on "Americanism" to the bishops of the United States has a document come from the Vatican equalling in general interest the syllabus dealing with "modernism" which was published a few days ago. That this pronouncement from Rome will cause a number of controversies and involve the extremists among Catholic divines in an unpleasant tangle is apparent to all who have followed the trend of recent events in so far as the Papacy is concerned. So far our knowledge of the contents of the syllabus is meager, the cabled accounts of its promulgation reciting only a few of the sixty-five propositions which are condemned. The position that divine inspiration does not guarantee all and every part of the holy scriptures against errors is declared untenable. This pronouncement may be traced directly to the findings of the Biblical Commission appointed by the present Pope. That the resurrection of the savior is not an historical fact but is purely supernatural and cannot be demonstrated; that the Roman Catholic church became the head of all churches not by divine ordinances, but by purely political circumstances; that the Christian doctrine was first Judaic, then Pauline, then Hellenic, then universal; that the principal articles of the Apostles' Creed has not the same significance to the primitive Christians as they have to the Christians of the present time—these propositions are all denounced. The position that the church is the enemy of natural and theological sciences is also condemned. So too are certain holdings with regard to the authority of the congregation of the Index and other congregations which are not definitely stated in the dispatches. That this syllabus with its denunciation of sixty-five distinct propositions was inevitably coming close observers have guessed for some time. Pope Pius acts quickly and decisively, as was made clear when he refused all offers of compromise in the French difficulty. That it has been in his mind to curb the exuberance of the ultra-liberal churchmen with measures of an unflinchingly drastic character was made clear when he took summary action in the cases of Father George Tyrrell in England and Don Romolo Murri in Italy. Just how the syllabus will be received it is perhaps not difficult to predict, in the light of what has happened in similar cases before. Most of the so-called modernists will declare their submission to the authority of Rome, as the "Americanists" like Ireland did when Pope Leo's encyclical was issued. A few will undoubtedly resist and the unrelaxing discipline of the church will be applied to them. Whatever criticism may be made of the teachings of Roman Catholicism, it must be admitted by all that its position in such matters, based on the claim of infallible authority, is perfectly logical.

The Current Liberal Movement.

How the English Jesuit George Tyrrell found himself deprived of his priestly functions when he persisted in a position not consonant with Catholic orthodoxy has been told in Town Talk. The silencing of Don Romolo Murri is of more recent occurrence. It was the endeavor of Murri to make socialistic principles harmonious with Roman Catholic doctrine, but in his work he cultivated a spirit of extreme independence which led him finally to criticise the highest authorities of the church as well as the present policies of the Vatican. This brought him under the ban of the Pope who is above all things a disciplinarian and he was suspended from his priestly functions. Murri belongs to a set of enthusiastic young men in the Italian church who have been long inclined to take more freedom in the discussion of theological, biblical and political matters than the Pope is willing to accord them. Some of these clerics addressed a letter to the Pope recently in which the Vatican was daringly censured for its treatment of Murri, while, at the same time, claims to the widest liberty were set forth. These among other modernists may be considered as officially answered in the syllabus just promulgated. They have received a strong intimation that the Catholic Church, as has been said, "is neither a democracy nor a debating society." That the syllabus and its series of condemnations will inspire resistance in this country is most unlikely. Even the tendencies which were condemned under the name of "Americanism" had not become widely spread when Rome denounced them; and the strict orthodoxy of the church in America has not been seriously clouded since, if such anonymous outbursts as that which appeared last January in the North American Review are excepted. It is in Europe that orthodox teachings are most attacked and even in that connection it may be said, that they find staunch defenders in most unexpected places. Some of the most authoritative among purely agnostic Egyptologists and Syriologists have recently borne testimony, in the published results of their researches, to the correctness of the orthodox Catholic interpretation of the Scriptures.

The Index in England

So much ridicule is tossed across the Atlantic at this country by British writers whenever the severely virtuous trustees of the Boston or other public libraries make a chaste but laugh-provoking spectacle of themselves by excluding from the shelves volumes whose virtue is suspected, that it has a most bracing effect on our opinion of American intellectuality and liberal-mindedness when England is caught in a similar offense. This is what has just happened. The London County Council has excluded from all London school libraries, as unfit reading for the young, Mrs. Gaskell's novel, Mary Barton. Now Mary Barton, as all who have read the story will quickly agree, is as innocuous as Cranford so far as any danger to the morals of the reader, youthful or old, is concerned. Yet has it come under the official ban of the mysterious authority which compiles the index expurgatorius for the London County Council. That this power who wields so great an influence in literature is no respecter of parties may be inferred from the fact that his action in condemning Mary Barton under a conservative regime was preceded, when the radicals were in power, by the condemnation of Dombey and Son, Hypatia, Peter Simple and Grimms' Fairy Tales. It may be inconceivable that any authority should adjudge these books unsuitable for youthful reading, but it is perfectly true. London children who depend on the school libraries for their books are therefore debarred from becoming acquainted with three of the classics of English fiction and one of the standard collections of fairy stories. It is a state of things to make Peter Pan weep, but it is also a condition with which Americans may fairly twit the superior Britishers who insist that ridiculous exhibitions of puritannical bigotry are only to be found on this side of the Atlantic. Public libraries in this country quite frequently exclude from the public shelves the best-selling novels of English and American writers, but their judgment is usually confirmed in the long run as the best sellers in both countries are generally ill-written and of absolutely no permanent worth. But it would be impossible to name a public library or a public school in the United States which places Dombey and Son, Peter Simple, Hypatia, Grimms' Fairy Tales and Mary Barton beyond the reach of the child with a thirst for good reading. This country must be allowed to take a brief unholy pleasure in the latest act of the London County Council, for there have been many provocations and after all, the spirit of vindictive exultation is intensely human.

The Peace Conference

There were no great problems solved at the opening session of our Peace Conference. The oratory was mostly platitudinous. The personal views of the speakers were neither interesting nor instructive, and not one of them exhibited a firm grasp of any of the important questions that are now engrossing the attention of the industrial world. The discussion was mainly academic but not always highly intellectual. Sentiments were deftly diluted out of a very warm respect for the prejudices of unionism, and nothing was said to which even Mr. Tveitmoen could take exception. It appeared to be assumed that organized labor will always be able to regulate wages. Nothing was said of soup kitchens.

The Journeyman

By Ralph Hodgson

Not baser than his own homekeeping kind
Whose journeyman he is—
Blind sons and breastless daughters of the blind Whose darkness pardons his,—
About the world, while all the world approves,
The pimp of Fashion steals,
With all the angels mourning their dead loves
Behind his bloody heels.

It may be late when Nature cries Enough!
As one day cry she will,
And man may have the wit to put her off
With shifts a season still.
But man may find the pinch importunate
And fall to blaming men.
Blind sires and breastless mothers of his fate,
It may be late and may be very late,
Too late for blaming then.

Perspective Impressions

Mr. Spreckels has been quoted by the Chronicle as saying that he will be vindicated by Time. But surely Mr. Spreckels doesn't feel that he is in need of vindication.

Mr. Langdon, we are told by one of his newspaper panegyrists, "made the graft prosecution possible by appointing Mr. Heney." Which is an indirect way of affirming the incompetency of Mr. Langdon. We appear to be getting at the truth in easy stages.

When are we going to wake up and demand that a little of the energy that is being expended upon the discouragement of graft be devoted to Cornelius and the other blackguards who are prolonging what they admit to be an unjust strike and are therefore responsible for the activity of cowardly thugs?

Mr. Phelan modestly praises the graft prosecution, thus implying that he is not one of them. Why this diffidence on the part of an ex-mayor.

According to a Fresno paper Patrick Calhoun has been hiring weekly papers to say that Spreckels is a grafter. This is very naughty of Patrick, but as Mr. Spreckels appears to have a monopoly of the daily press what is Patrick to do?

What better evidence do we need of the great progress that is being made by the town purifiers than the latest attempt that was made in the Mission to kill a motorman and conductor? And what better evidence do we need of the purity and absolute freedom from hypocrisy of the daily press than the silence with which such dastardly acts of violence are met.

The Infidelity of Madeleine Jeffreys

By L. T.

It is bad enough, in all conscience, for a man to find himself tied for life to a woman whom he does not love. But for a woman to find herself tied to a man whom she does not love is infinitely worse, and for this reason, that not only does love, or its absence, in married life, mean far more to a woman than it does to a man, but also that the finer sensibilities which distinguish woman from man are more easily revolted by the many repugnant circumstances incident to a loveless union.

I do not speak here of the woman who deliberately sells herself for wealth, or rank, or other material advantage. Such a woman must necessarily lack those finer sensibilities to which I have alluded. I speak of her far more-to-be pitied sister, who, having married a man under the delusion that she loved him, afterwards wakes up to find that it has all been a hideous mistake—that the idealized lover with whom, in the days of her courtship, she had promised herself such ineffable happiness, presents a very different aspect under the close and searching intimacies of wedded life. He need not necessarily be a bad man. He may even, according to his lights, be a virtuous man. But (which is the material point) he is not the man—not, that is to say, the individual whom girls of the lower orders know as Mr. Right. Aye, much to be pitied is the woman who, believing she was marrying Mr. Right, finds out too late that she has married Mr. Wrong. And such was the unhappy experience of Madeleine Jeffreys.

George Jeffreys, her husband, was a lawyer, with a large practice, enjoying a high reputation professionally and eminently respectable in private life. But his temperament was essentially conventional and commonplace. He walked through life on a dead-level plateau of smug mediocrity, carefully avoiding alike the depths that lay to his left hand and the altitudes that soared on his right. He was equally incapable of stooping to the disgraceful and of rising to the sublime. No temptation ever seduced him into shady behaviour, and no impulse ever surprised him into a quixotic action. In short, he was a decorous and inveterate prig.

How, then, had Madeleine, the impulsive, the generous, the high-spirited, the sensitive, the passionate come to imagine herself in love with such a man? That is a question to which I confess myself unable to give a satisfactory answer. It may have been that Jeffreys, under the novel influence of the first awakening of love within him, had been temporarily inspired with a fervour foreign to his nature, and warranted not to last; or it may merely have been that Madeleine, by some strange infatuation, read into his character qualities and sentiments that were non-existent there. Dreamy, as she was, and prone to idealize, there is nothing very unlikely in the supposition of her having done so. Anyhow, the fact remains that she did imagine herself in love with Jeffreys when she married him. Unfortunately, also, the fact remains that three months of wedded life with him opened her eyes, once and for all, to the fatal delusion.

Some women of calmer disposition would have recognized the inevitable, would have sat down by it, and have resigned themselves to making the best of it. For awhile, indeed, Madeleine did attempt to do this. But her passionate, impulsive nature was incapable of long sustaining that dutiful, if somewhat hypocritical, role. Her manner towards her husband grew so cold and discouraging that, though not a man of very fine or acute perceptions, he could not but see that he had somehow forfeited Madeleine's affection. What the reason might be he could not divine, being too much eaten up with self-esteem to attribute it to any shortcomings on his own part. So he formed the conclusion that some one else must have come between them—in short, that there was another man in the case. At first, I believe, there was no foundation at all for such an idea. And possibly, if Jeffreys had kept his suspicions to himself, his wife, in spite of her dislike for him, would still have remained strictly loyal to her marriage vow. But from the moment that her husband, in the course of one of the many disagreeable scenes that occurred between them, openly declared his belief that some other admirer was at the bottom of her coldness and estrangement—from that moment she appeared to regard herself as free from further obligation to the man who had thus insulted her.

For some months nothing noteworthy happened, Madeleine remaining outwardly, if somewhat coldly, civil to her husband, and discharging all her domestic duties with laudable regularity. But at last definite shape was given to her husband's suspicions by her behaviour over a letter that she received one morning while at breakfast. If it hadn't happened that his eyes chanced to be fixed upon her at that particular instant, her look of confusion as she slipped the letter under her other correspondence would have escaped his observation, for it was all a matter of half a moment. But what he saw in that half moment, including the writing on the envelope, which was in a bold, masculine hand, at once confirmed all that he had hitherto suspected. Madeleine was in clandestine correspondence with somebody, and that somebody was of the male sex. At first Jeffreys was minded to tax her with her deceit then and there, and to demand to see the letter. But, on second thoughts, he decided to hold his tongue and appear to have noticed nothing, for if she refused, as she certainly would do, to show him the letter, he could not very well use force with her, and the only effect of such a proceeding would be to put her on her guard. He concluded that the wiser course was to lie low for the present, and thus having lulled Madeleine into a false sense of security, to put himself in a more advantageous position for watching her.

This course he adopted, with the result that, little by little, he made a number of discoveries that amply

Beneath the Surface

(What the Eastern Press is Saying of San Francisco's Multitude of Misfortunes)

San Francisco continues to occupy a large share of the attention of the Eastern press. And it is by no means singular to relate that in the matter of the highly dramatic affairs of this city much news is to be obtained far from home. Some of the large New York dailies and weeklies have had correspondents in this city, who evidently, unlike Lincoln Steffens, have the old-fashioned newspaper idea of the superior quality of news that is obtained from impartial sources. One of the best narratives of the misfortunes of this city, that has yet appeared, was printed by the New York Times on July 7th. It tells the whole story. That is, it tells more than one side. Though it contains some suggestions that may seem extravagant to the reader, it shows that at any rate there are two sides. It contains some inaccuracies, but on the whole it is a pretty faithful and vivid picture. In the opening paragraph we are told that a woman recently said of this city:

"San Francisco's general condition at this time reminds me of nothing so much as a grievously wounded animal, desperately struggling to recover from its almost mortal injuries, but which is being attacked from different quarters by a pack of wolves, whose only thought is to profit by its helplessness, and who are ready, on the instant, to bring about its destruction, if their selfish, personal ends can be attained."

Behind it all, says the writer, "is a game of politics, mean and selfish ('peek-a-boo' politics, as a business man termed it a few days ago), is being played at present, which extends to Washington, D. C., and Oyster Bay, L. I., and the effect of which it is intended shall be felt in the next National Republican Convention. In this Rudolph Spreckels, who is supplying (or rather advancing, for no one doubts that he will be reimbursed, through legislative or other action), money to the extent of $100,000 for the meritorious object of sending certain "boodlers" and "grafters" to the State prison at San Quentin or Folsom, yet others, fully as guilty, are to be given immunity from prosecution as a reward for turning State's evidence, while at the same time being retained in office upon condition that they will "take programme" absolutely from those interested in the prosecution, and, in addition, are to be permitted to retain the bribes they accepted as city officials.

In this political game of chess no less persons of influence and importance are involved than the President of the United States and E. H. Harriman. Of the warfare which has waged, is waging, and is doubtless to continue between these two forceful men the public throughout the country is well aware, but that Theodore Roosevelt, strenuous and dominant, is anxious, even determined, to have a hand in the management and shaping of California State politics, with a view to strengthening his position, in view of the next National Republican Convention, or at least so arranging the political wires that his wishes regarding the Republican nominee for the next Presidential term shall be respected, may not be generally known."

Here follows a recital of the part played by the Southern Pacific Company in California politics explanatory of the importance to Roosevelt of the wiping out of the Harriman influence which is exerted through W. F. Herrin. Continuing the Times' correspondent says:

"The earthquake and fire of April 18, 1906, were psychological events which made possible the realization of certain plans—political and commercial—which might never have been realized had not Providence intervened. Rudolph Spreckels, James D. Phelan, and other men of wealth and energy had only a few days before the fire made application to the Board of Supervisors for a franchise for a street railroad to compete with that of the United Railroads, of which Patrick Calhoun is President. The board, however, which is the same precious set of rascals that are today in office, was "friendly" to the United Railroads, and Spreckels, Phelan et al. could make no headway. The United Railroads had for months been seeking to obtain permission from the board to change its system from cable to overhead trolley, and while a certain percentage of the business men were opposed to the change, whether reasonably or not, the supervisors were inclined to listen to the urgings of the United Railroads. It is said that the stumbling block was only the question of 'how much' the United Railroads was willing to offer for the much-desired franchise."

The granting of the franchise, according to the Times' correspondent, was a bitter disappointment to the Spreckels-Phelan combine, and it was the means of arousing the ire of Claus Spreckels, whose espousal of the cause of the San Joaquin Valley farmers is a bit of history which is incorporated in the article to show how shrewd he is in fighting his enemies. The Times man says Claus Spreckels built the San Joaquin Valley road because of his hostility to the Southern Pacific Company. He promised to rescue the farmers from the Octopus and after enlisting their co-operation sold out to the Southern Pacific. This, of course, is a glaring inaccuracy. Mr. Spreckels did not sell out to the Southern Pacific. He sold out to the Santa Fe, and freight rates are as they were before.

The correspondent also relates that it is part of the programme of the Spreckels-Phelan combine to ruin the Spring Valley Water Company in order to put through a big water scheme. But the main purpose, it is said, is to build up a big political machine, and that is why Roosevelt "loaned" Heney and Burns to Spreckels and Phelan. As for Langdon, says the correspondent, he is merely a figurehead.

The correspondent approves of the good work that has been done but laments the evil. Of the prosecution of Calhoun he says:

"It was generally known that Mr. Calhoun and other officials of the United Railroads were liable to indictment by the 'graft' prosecution, but what was expected by the better class of citizens, believers in the much-vaunted 'square deal,' was that the prosecution would give its attention to others under suspicion, leaving Calhoun, for the time being, with his hands free to fight the car strike, in which so large a measure of the public and social interest was involved.

But when Rudolph Spreckels saw that Calhoun was in a situation where he could be greatly hurt by aid and comfort being given to his opponents, the strikers, he turned upon him with an exultant and remorseless energy, and on the very day that the strike was declared caused him to be summoned before the Grand Jury, and a few days later, in spite of the assurance made some time previously by Heney (and before he had consulted with Spreckels) that Mr. Calhoun would not be indicted, he was indicted upon a number of counts. From that time forth Calhoun has been harassed, fought and attacked by Spreckels, privately, publicly, and in every way which might tend to embarrass him in his fight with the strikers and weaken his powers of resistance and courage."

The story of Spreckels's espousal of the cause of the strikers in his public utterances is told; also of business depression and the attitude of the banks; and the correspondent asserts that the striking carmen are being held together for the August primaries. Notwithstanding the gloominess of the situation the writer thinks that San Francisco will recover.

According to Samuel Blythe in the Saturday Evening Post, we are still optimistic. "But," he says, "the cold, naked truth about the labor situation in San Francisco today is that the city will never regain her old place, will never get back to her old importance, never attain the power and prosperity that is rightfully hers, until this labor question is settled. The graft disclosures astonished nobody who knew anything about San Francisco, much less the people of San Francisco themselves. They knew the municipal government was rotten. They knew it before they voted Schmitz and the present board of supervisors into office the last time. Still, they voted them in, and the crimes now being exposed are as much the people's crimes as the specific crimes of individuals. When that gang of self-confessed felons now holding office as supervisors was elected 'every burglar-alarm in the city began to ring and has kept ringing ever since,' to use the words of a man who has lived in the city all his life."

Respecting the Graft Prosecution Blythe says:

"There are two sides to this bigger-game story. Some of the leading men in the city declare the whole scheme of graft prosecution is based on a personal quarrel between Patrick Calhoun, president of the United Railways, by which name the street car system of San Francisco is known, and Rudolph Spreckels."

He concludes:

"It seems like 'Poor, old San Francisco!' now. Broken and bruised and bleeding, her commerce appears to be drifting away, her internal difficulties seem insuperable, her physical conditions beyond repair. But you can keep your 'Poor, old San Francisco's' to yourself. San Francisco will come back, perhaps without the old atmosphere that made everybody who knew it her slave; certainly with better buildings for her business, and certainly, also, with a decent internal management. The towns on the coast that boast they will snatch her trade with the Orient are celebrating prematurely. San Francisco was the result of a natural geographical condition. That condition still exists. The harbor and the railroad were not destroyed. When San Francisco does what she must do for herself she will find herself in the old commanding place, with outside capital ready to come in, and that is what she must have. And the reason why San Francisco will come back, why she will conquer all her difficulties, is because the people of San Francisco are Americans. They couldn't lose if they tried."

Diana's Footprints

By Wilfred C. Thorley

Though the leaves are still and the ambient air is hushed,
I know she has passed but an hour ago this way;
For the young green leaves of the bay are but newly crushed,
And no scent is surer to know that the scent of the bay;
And the dust of the pollen is still afloat in the air
That burst like steam from the pines as she bent the spray.

The way she went, that way will her feet return,
For here is a sandal dropped in the heat o' the chase.
The buckle is set with rubies like eyes that burn
In the heart of the jungle at dusk, from a tiger's face.
And the golden glance of the daisy is blurred with blood
From the wounded deer as he paused in his deathly race.

Ah, here she comes! The sound of her brazen horn
Thrills all the pendulous leaves with its threat of blood.
And the blossoms flutter down at the blast of scorn,
Or seal their beauty anew in the oval bud.
And the sweat of her steeds drips down as they neigh for home
And over the strangled flowers their wild hooves thud.

The Friend

By Mabel Porter Pitts

If this rough path had still more tortuous wound,
Had steeper been,
If twice the pitfalls had been spread and found
And every hope that we have failed to win,
To bruise the heart had sunk more deeply in;
If darker skies had rimmed the way of loss
And heavier had been the heavy cross,
Yet were the road that marks the waste of pain
A happy way
And our poor life would still not be in vain.
It has obtained a not inglorious end
If we, in trust, may clasp the faithful hand
Of one well known, one who can understand,
And truly say,
"This is a friend."

The Spectator

The Lady and Her Gun

One young lady of Pacific Heights carries in her muff a wicked little revolver which she intends to use on the first hoodlum that utters threats against riding on the street cars. The why for is the experience of a friend who was recently insulted and terrified by a brute on a lonely corner of Jackson street. Before buying the gun, the young lady first sought a lawyer and assured herself that a little shooting under such conditions would be justified in law. Union thugs who value a whole skin will do well to avoid the upper end of Pacific Heights, for the fair gun-packer has Southern blood in her veins.

The Cinching of McCarthy

The novel spectacle of P. H. McCarthy, president of the Building Trades Council, on his knees suing for peace is one of the pleasing incidents of the fight against the unreasonable demands of the labor unions. Since former Mayor Phelan plucked McCarthy from the basement depths of the California Hotel to make him a member of the Civil Service Commission, the autocratic hotel carpenter has ruled the Building Trades Council with the uncompromising despotism of the Tzar. By dominating the executive board of the Council he has succeeded with browbeating and bulldozing tactics to stamp out at its inception every revolt against his power. Three unions more rash than the others have been summarily reprimanded while others have been forced from the ranks of organized labor because their officers had the temerity to defy McCarthy. In his dealings with the employers he has been as arrogant and dictatorial. While the ashes were still smoldering on the ruins, McCarthy declared there should be no increase in wages until the city had been rebuilt. The newspapers and the public acclaimed this patriotic announcement but before a week had elapsed, McCarthy was scheming to force wages to a prohibitive figure. He persisted in making unreasonable demands until he was checked by a combination of bankers whose patience had been exhausted. McCarthy is now like a roped bull which has reached the end of its tether. He may snort and paw the ground but he is no longer to be feared.

How it Was Done

His subjugation came about during the metal trades strike at a time when it was feared there would be a general tie-up of all industrial interests. One of the larger shipbuilding concerns had weakly acquiesced in the demands of the machinists. As soon as the news reached 'change notice was served on the concern by its bankers that their account was no longer desired. The ultimatum was good naturedly accepted, the account closed and the managers went in search of new bankers. To their dismay they soon found that not a bank in town would accept the account under any conditions. The shipbuilders quickly withdrew their recognition of the union, discharged its men and closed down its works. On that day word was sent to McCarthy that if he wanted a strike of the bricklayers, carpenters, plumbers or any of the other allied unions that it was time to begin. The financial institutions were lined up for a long struggle and it could not come too soon to suit them. McCarthy, who on the day before had been urging an increase of pay for the bricklayers, suddenly changed his tactics. He hastened messages of conciliation with assurances that the Building Trades Council were satisfied with the existing schedules. While these assurances are accepted with caution, it is not believed that McCarthy will attempt to break the rope that is now holding him, but even if he should the bankers have a whip with which to drive him back to cover.

Finn For Mayor

Union Labor, I hear, is grooming Tom Finn for mayor, or at least a certain faction is grooming him. Grooming seems the right word, since Finn is president of the Stablemen's Union. Finn has been supervisor, fire commissioner and deputy sheriff and is now police commissioner. Whether he has shown himself more than an amiable dummy in office, no one seems to know, but personally he is very popular in labor circles. "He never gets sassy or nothin'" said a city janitor of him. That the stablemen have lost two strikes under his presidency is not held against him. The strikes were for increased wages on the ground that hostlers are de facto horse doctors. County Clerk Mulcrevy might also get the place—if he wants it—but not as a gladhandler. Mulcrevy has an annoying habit of beating his men to work and hauling them up if tardy. He also goes over the books after they leave to see whether the entries are up to date. He has even risked his popularity by discharging incompetents. But labor is just now inclined to make a great hero of any of the party who has shown any degree of ability, character or honesty.

A Question of Morals

"The defense has alluded to these supervisors as degraded beings. Are they degraded by the fact that they took bribes or by the fact that Glass bribed them? I claim that they have been redeemed by their confession that they were tempted and debauched."

—Francis Heney.

Claim on sir! but your claim is not allowed.
Such cant may captivate the motley crowd,
But surely adulation makes no haste
To sing the wonder of such curious taste.
Though mob may flatter, still shall wisdom find Unfit, your moral precepts for mankind.
To me 'tis manifest, for such as you
The trade of moral critic will not do.
There is a Father, kind alike to all,
Who hearkens to the sinner's mournful call.
But not to whine of unrepentant crook.
Who, when he's brought summarily to book
Accepts the promise of immunity,
And stipulates to hold his plunder free;
Who contracts to protect both pelt and pelf.
Indifferent to everything but self.
Would you, stern moralist, now have it said,
By mocking retribution, guilt is shed?
Then say I in sadness, not in elation,
Thy morals mend; they need much alteration.

Industrial Discontent

This is the kind of verse that Ambrose Bierce is not at present writing for the Examiner or for Mr. Hearst's Cosmopolitan, and yet I am told that his sentiments have not changed:

"As time rolled on the whole world came to be
A desolation and a darksome curse;
And some one said: "The changes that you see
In the fair frame of things, from bad to worse,
Are wrought by strikes. The sun withdrew his glimmer
Because the moon assisted with her shimmer.

"Then, when poor Luna, straining very hard,
Doubled her light to serve a darkling world,
He called her "scab," and meanly would retard
Her rising; and at last the villain hurled
A heavy beam which knocked her o'er the lion
Into the nebula of great O'Ryan.

"The planets all had struck some time before,
Demanding what they said were equal rights:
Some pointing out that others had far more
Than a fair dividend of satellites.
So all went out—though those the best provided,
If they had dared would rather have abided.

"The stars struck too—I think it was because

The comets had more liberty than they,
And were not bound by any hampering laws,

While they were fixed; and there are those who say
The comets' tresses nettled poor Altair,
An aged orb that hasn't any hair.

"The earth's the only one that isn't in

The movement—I suppose because she's watched
With horror and disgust how her fair skin
Her pranking parasites have fouled and blotched
With blood and grease in every labor riot
When seeing any purse or throat to fly at!"

Poetry and Politics

"Nothing," says Goethe, "is more significant of men's character than what they find laughable." This observation may be rendered more felicitous for my purpose by substituting "judgment" for "character." It appears to be the judgment of many men in this city that the idea of being mayored by a poet is fit incitation to jocularity. And yet there is nothing laughable in that idea. Poets are not, as the illiterate imagine, made to sport all their time in the sunshine's golden braids, astounding the birds with rare melodies. The poetic temperament does not beckon eternally to flowery fields and amorous cavortings. It is not always responding to the moving invitations of Elysian delights. The most enthusiastic of poets do not smack the lyre all the time. The great poets were great thinkers and great philosophers; and Plato who was something of an authority in governmental matters tells us that until the rulers of this earth have something of the spirit and power of philosophy, and political greatness and wisdom meet in one, cities will never cease from ill.

How to Judge Him

So far as Mayor Taylor is concerned, if he were more of a poet I should have greater confidence in his ability to make an ideal philosopher. In this land and in these days we are too apt to giggle about poets, and too ready to make game of poetical aspirations. Consequently there are few Americans who would dare look and act like a poet. Even Dr. Taylor who has written some verse that is poetry and some that isn't, only to that extent acts like a poet, for nearly all the great poets from Wordsworth up and down have written metrical prose. But Dr. Taylor unabashedly looks like a poet, and all that he lacks, all that prevents him from being generally recognized as a poet is that he doesn't take himself seriously enough as a poet and doesn't exhibit the taste and preferences and prejudices of a poet in his relations with men. But I am digressing. All that I intended to write in these paragraphs was a protest against the irreverent American sentiment which laughs at poetic aspirations. The poet penetrates into the sacred mysteries of the universe and interprets nature for us. He has done much to make clear for us what one should love, and what one should despise. He has exercised a most wholesome influence over the minds of men. The generosity of soul which ever accompanies true genius has induced the poets and philosophers of all ages to stand forth in the cause of liberty. As a man, according to Carlyle, is a poet in proportion to his depth and sincerity of vision, perhaps the best way to judge of the poetry of Mayor Taylor is to note the character of his achievements as chief magistrate of this city.

A Few Suggestions

Unfortunately Mayor Taylor may have but a short time in public office; so short that it may be impossible for him to do aught but instruct and refine by example. It is his privilege to exhibit for our benefit something of the benignancy of a poet, as he did at the Peace Conference, and with his sense of the public welfare supreme in his mind he might endeavor to quell all petty impulses, assuage those passions that have been heated to igniting point, sing the virtue of fair play, deprecate rancor and discourage the practice of recklessly purveying injurious rumors and insinuating black motives. We should not be content with vindicating to the world our detestation of graft. If it is reputation that we are looking for we should be eager to abate our acrimonies and restrain ourselves from conduct toward a human being that may in our calmer moments, when we shall have regained our mental equilibrium, cause us to burn with shame. As a poet, Dr. Taylor has an intimate knowledge of human nature; its secret springs, labyrinthine windings and perplexed mazes. He is quick to differentiate what is amiable from what is detestable, what is worthy of admiration from what should excite abhorrence, and therefore by virtue of his office and his instinct he is well qualified to teach what one should be eager to imitate and careful to avoid. Whatever may be his personal views respecting the guilt or innocence of Patrick Calhoun, as mayor of this city he must have felt a twinge of humiliation, as an American citizen he must have felt a shock of indignation, upon learning of the treatment to which that man was recently subjected by the officers of the so-called Civic League of this city. The hypocrisy that based objection to the presence of Calhoun at the Peace Conference on the circumstance of his indictment, notwithstanding the fact that he was invited after he was indicted, must be more repugnant to Mayor Taylor than even the crimes with which Calhoun has been charged.

A Significant Difference

Patrick Calhoun may be the blackest rascal that ever set foot in this city, but he ought to felicitate himself nevertheless upon having as yet refrained from exhibiting some of the traits of character which distinguish a few of our leading citizens, and which should be sufficient to raise them from obscurity were they in the most humble circumstances. How often one sneers at the old system of things and say, See what superior people we are,—how impossible under our sacred and enlightened institutions is anything so base and absurd as occurred in despotic France before the Revolution. Should we not keep our scorn for our own weaknesses and our own times? It is indeed, as Fontaine says, "The spirit of the race resembles that of the individual man; it shines and is eclipsed by turns." If I believed that the repeated expressions of hostility to Calhoun were due entirely to the conviction that he is a public enemy, rather than to a servile desire to humor the spleen of organized labor, I should have no criticism to offer, for I know that the actions of men follow their passions as naturally as light does heat, but there are impregnable obstacles to such a notion. The main one is this: the crimes with which he is charged are the same as those with which other men in this community are charged, and yet the other men are not the objects of such bitter hostility as is being vented against Calhoun. The difference in attitude has been well exemplified, by Dr. Clinton, the faithful friend of the late Nettie Craven, who was shocked by the presence of Calhoun at the Olympic Club, a club of which several men under indictment are members. Those men have not been asked to resign, nor has Dr. Clinton resigned because they are members. Of course it would be highly improper to ask them to resign, since they are presumed to be innocent, and so important is that presumption in the case of all men charged with crime that it abides with them even until the jury of their peers retires to deliberate on a verdict, and it is a fatal error on the part of the judge who does not so instruct the jury.

Some Other Obstacles

The other men charged with crimes similar to those upon which Calhoun has been indicted belong to our swellest clubs of which the men behind the prosecution are also members, and no objection has been made to their presence in those clubs. Nay it would be deemed an outrage to raise objection. Another obstacle to the notion that the hostility to Calhoun is a righteous hostility lies in the knowledge of the fact that it is not being exhibited by angels. In some instances it is being exhibited by men who, if unrighteousness really revolted them, would not be on speaking terms with themselves. In some instances it is being exhibited by vociferous merchants who have become very busy moralists. Fancy a merchant a moralist! Why in ancient Babylon they relegated merchants to the outskirts of the city because of their contaminating influence. The wise Babylonians assumed that a man could not be an honest merchant. But it was wrong to be hostile to merchants. The man least to be admired in this world is the one who cannot censure a vice without rage against the guilty party. That is why I look with something of aversion on those of our leading city who have become absurdly ostentatious with their scorn. They remind me that when I was quite young I read in Fielding that the worst of men generally have the words rogue and villain most in their mouths.

Clinton's Hallucination

There are men in this world afflicted with a tendency of constitution to persuade themselves that they have done things which they have only thought of doing. In this way they come to regard themselves as heroes of achievements which are merely the relics of unrealized resolutions. Of this type of man is C. A. Clinton, the well known political doctor who was for many years intrenched at the public crib, and who has hopes, I suspect, of gorging himself again. Dr. Clinton has been deftly recalling himself to the mind of Mayor Taylor. He was very much in danger of being overlooked in the still hunt for supervisors when there came to him a fine opportunity for thrusting himself into public notice, in the dual role of workingman's friend and uncompromising defender of civic purity. The opportunity arose at the Olympic Club's banquet. Patrick Calhoun was there as a club guest; Dr. Clinton, as a club member, and therefore was Patrick Calhoun's host. As, in the person of Calhoun at present, there is typified that spirit of our country which energizes the principle of personal liberty, and as, in this city at present, it is recognized that there is very much need of something to quicken respect for that principle, the presence of the railroad magnate at the banquet was a stimulus to the imagination. In the circumstances it was not strange that exuberant feelings gave spontaneous testimony of approval to the courageous stand that Patrick Calhoun has taken. But there was one man among those five hundred banqueters who was not elevated by the enthusiasm; one man who defied the spirit of the occasion and undertook to make it serve the end of his own glorification. That one man was Dr. Clinton, who rushed into print the following day with what purported to be the speech which he delivered. And that is why I have attempted to classify him. Dr. Clinton did not deliver that speech. I should hate, however, to think that he has not persuaded himself that he delivered it. For if, being conscious that he did not deliver it, he should insist that he did, then I should have to put him in a quite different classification, and marvel at the courage of the man.

What Really Occurred

Dr. Clinton probably has a keen imagination from which he derives a facility in fabricating extravagances. This is in the nature of an endowment of mental confusion. This is unquestionably a creative faculty, but it is not an addition to the fundamental power of strong, discerning perception; rather is it a vulgar substitute. It bespeaks an obtuseness of the perceptive faculty accompanied by a tendency to misrepresentation, unchecked by an appreciation of the virtue of veracity. I was at the Booster's dinner and I feel competent to record what took place. After reading Dr. Clinton's account of what took place I should have been very much in doubt of my competency had I not learned later of the storm of indignation which this remarkable person caused by his misrepresentations and had I not had my own recollection of events verified by numerous eye-witnesses. What I saw and heard at the banquet so far as Patrick Calhoun is concerned may be briefly described. We had just seated ourselves when he entered, and as soon as he was recognized he was cheered for at least two minutes. It seemed to me that every voice in that throng was raised in acclamation. Judge Lawlor entered a little later, and he too was cheered but much less vociferously and only for a moment. After the chairman of the evening, Mr. William F. Humphrey, made a report to the members of the club on its affairs and announced that there would be no speech-making, there was a call for Patrick Calhoun. It was taken up with a spontaneity that attested the sincerity and unanimity of sentiment. But Calhoun did not respond. Men rose to their feet in all parts of the vast hall and alternately cheered and shouted the railroad magnate's name. Still Pat Calhoun remained in his seat. He did not rise until, as it seemed to me, every man in the hall was on his feet cheering and waving his napkin. No greater outburst of enthusiasm have I ever witnessed in a throng of equal size. Mr. Calhoun thanked the Olympians for the reception, and said that as he believed in law and order he must bow to the chairman's inhibition.

Rough House For the Doctor

Up to this stage of the proceedings I was unconscious of Dr. Clinton's presence. He may have protested inwardly, but I am certain that he made no speech except to himself. He first attracted my attention when we were leaving the banquet hall and the large throng was massed in the vicinity of the doorway leading into the main building. The members of the club were in exuberant spirits over the success of the affair which augured so felicitously for the future of their club. They were generous with their acclamations, and it was while they were in this mood that somebody catching sight of Patrick Calhoun, who was just in the act of descending the stairs into the main building, shouted his name and incited the crowd to another outburst of cheers. Calhoun was again called on for a speech, and he responded as briefly and as gracefully as before. Then it was that Dr. Clinton thrust himself into the limelight. The unmannerly doctor was standing within ten feet of me, but his utterances were unintelligible, for the reason, as it seemed to me, they were choked down his throat. A score of indignant Olympians in their rage at thus being humiliated by one of their associates who would in their home put insult upon a guest, rushed upon the offender. What violence they did to him I was unable to see, as at that moment some thoughtful person closed convenient folding doors, shutting Clinton and the twenty or thirty by whom he was being suppressed, out from the main throng. The whole scene was enacted with such speed that the continuity of Calhoun's speech was unbroken. As soon as he finished, the doors were reopened; and presto! Clinton had disappeared. He had been hustled to an upper floor.

His Strange Quiescence

I cannot conceive of any theory upon which Dr. Clinton can justify his behaviour. If Patrick Calhoun is good enough to be a guest of the Olympic Club, surely he is good enough to speak at the Olympic Club. There is not, that I know of, any rule of ethics which affirms that a guest may mitigate the offensiveness of his character by the simple process of holding his tongue. Dr. Clinton saw Patrick Calhoun enter the banquet hall and seat himself at a table. Dr. Clinton remained and dined with Patrick Calhoun. As Dr. Clinton is a member of the Olympic Club, Patrick Calhoun dined with him as his guest. It was Dr. Clinton's privilege to withdraw from the table. He did not do so. He heard Patrick Calhoun called upon to speak by nearly every member of the club, and he remained and heard that speech. Subsequently when the banquet was at an end and another speech was called for then did Dr. Clinton resolve to avail himself of the occasion as a means of promoting a little cheap publicity for himself. Dr. Clinton is evidently one of those somewhat rare men who are fiercely ambitious in small things rather than in large. He seems to be proud of having made a boor of himself.

The Imperative Consequence

The directors of the Olympic Club feel pretty keenly the humiliation to which they have been subjected.

But their duty in the matter is obvious. Patrick Calhoun was their guest, and if there is any significance to one of the laws of this land which we should hold more sacred than any other, the insulting of him on the score of his indictment was an offense so grievous that the person by whom it was committed should be deemed unfit for the companionship of men who take pride in the decency of their behaviour. There is no law for the letter and spirit of which we should be more solicitous than that which requires the assumption of a man's innocence until his guilt has been established. Men are not made outcasts by the simple process of indictment. To assume that a man is guilty because he has been indicted is a crime against our system of government of an especially mean and contemptible character. It bespeaks a disposition to prejudice, and while that has not been provided against by penal enactment it is forbidden by a law that by many is considered much higher. We are told by an eminent biblical authority that the man is as smoke in the nose of the Lord who says to one of his fellows: "Come not near to me, for I am holier than thou." But it is not entirely because Dr. Clinton is a barbarian in morals that the directors of the Olympic Club should deal with him. Nor is it because, possibly, he was influenced in his unmannerly conduct by a lively sense of the profit to be derived from cultivating labor union favor. Not satisfied with having created a disturbance in the club, Dr. Clinton gave publicity to a club scandal. And worse than that, he dealt in misrepresentation respecting members of the club; misrepresentation of a character highly prejudicial to their reputation. All of which is most unfortunate. All of which adds to the compunctions of the lovers of fair play in this community who are conscious of the brutalities to which Patrick Calhoun has been subjected. For whatever may be one's opinions respecting the charges that have been made against Calhoun, it is undeniable that the treatment which he has received from some men is akin to that species of inhumanity which is barred in Christian warfare. We can vindicate our abomination of the crime charged against Calhoun without gloating over insults offered by union waiters and acquiescing in such brutalities as have been paraded to the impairment of our reputation for decency and fair play. It is this kind of conduct which suggests that while as children of nature we are brothers to the stars and the lilies we are also akin to toadstools and weasels.

A Boost For Taylor

From a recent issue of the official organ of organized labor I learn that Mayor Taylor is persona non grata to the unions of this city. This is a circumstance that should have a tendency to commend Mayor Taylor to the esteem of law abiding citizens and win for him their support in the coming election. I regret that I was not at an earlier date apprised of the hostility of the unions to our mayor. This hostility indicates that whatever may have been the attitude of the men who discovered Dr. Taylor, toward unionism, they have brought him into no entangling alliances. For Mayor Taylor, the protegee of the prosecution, has been pronounced an enemy of labor by the official organ of labor. By the way, I do not believe that the editor of the official organ was subsidized by Patrick Calhoun, for he represents Calhoun to be worse than Taylor. According to this inflammatory editor Calhoun should not be sent to jail; he should be put to death. And as for the Graft Prosecution it is a joke and Langdon an enemy of the people. So from all this it is obvious that disapproval of the Graft Prosecution is not always inspired by Patrick Calhoun.

A Fatal Oversight

A broker just back from a popular summer resort is telling with glee of how he "beat the house." At about the time he arrived at the resort the hotel rates had been raised from three and a half to four dollars a day. He remained for ten days, and upon leaving asked for his bill. When it was presented to him he glanced at it and remarked: "Four dollars a day, eh? Well, I won't pay that." The clerk gasped in astonishment. "Won't pay it? Why, that's our regular rate. We raised it not long ago, you know." "Perhaps you did," was the guest's reply, "but you didn't raise it on me. The rate here for me is three and a half a day." The clerk looked extremely puzzled. "I confess that I don't understand you," he said. "We charge everybody the same." "No you don't," said the broker. "You're charging me three and a half a day. There's a card up in my room which says that is the price." And what could the clerk do but correct the bill? But the broker was hardly out of the hotel before the bell boys were scurrying around taking the old rate cards out of the rooms.

A Tourist and Her Bear

The Teddy Bear craze has not yet struck here except so far as the children are concerned. The toddlers carry the wooly things around, but as yet adults have not had the courage to lug them through the streets. But the craze is on its way via Los Angeles. A correspondent tells me that although it has not broken out there in the virulent form that prevails in the East, still a beginning has been made. "I saw one beautiful example of the utter ridiculousness of the fad," writes my informant. "On a mountain trail I met a tourist lady astride of a burro. She was more than plump, and her face was red and moist because of the excessive heat. She was not an inspiring spectacle at best. Tucked under one arm, its feet poked ludicrously out, and actually an expression of weariness on its fuzzy face, was a Teddy bear. I did not know whether to laugh or swear." I more than half expected that the Princess Alice would have one of these substitutes for blood and meat babies with her when she arrived. If she had, the fad would have taken hold in good shape. She should be thanked for sparing us the infliction.

Caught in More Land Frauds

A big land fraud case pregnant with all kinds of sensations has just been decided in Modoc County to which I am surprised that our friends the big dailies have given practically no attention, especially since John A. Benson, of land fraud notoriety, and T. B. Walker, the multi-millionaire timber king, were very grievously mixed up in it. According to the testimony Benson, Walker and C. L. Hovey obtained by fraud from Mrs. Mollie Conklin a tract of 9500 acres of land in Kern and Inyo counties, known as the "Monache Meadows." Benson pretended that he wanted the land for lieu purposes. By securing it and later surrendering the title to the U. S. government he could get in return certain script which would give him the right to take up timber or other valuable government land acre for acre up to the amount of his script. According to the agreement he wormed out of Mrs. Conklin he was to pay her $4 per acre for her property when the government accepted it. After

Grave Findings Made

Later on Mrs. Conklin discovered that among these supposed deeds she had unintentionally been made to sign a power of attorney to Hovey. But subsequently Hovey transferred the property to Walker. Mrs. Conklin made desperate efforts to get the money due her for the land but outside of a small sum, collected early in the deal, she was unable to obtain anything. On the hearing of the case, last week, up in Alturas, the jury was out only a little while and brought in a strong verdict for Mrs. Conklin. Forgery was charged in some of the papers used to deceive her and multimillionaire Walker was told that he was any thing but an innocent purchaser when he bought title of the lands from Hovey. Altogether the three defendants received such a blistering from the jury and subsequently from the bench that there is little likelihood of their courting a repetition by taking an appeal.

Brains Appreciated

In commercial circles examples of the reward of merit are not of such frequent occurrence as to fail to excite interest. It is not unusual for a business firm to show appreciation of brains and industry by promotion and increase of salary, but it is in rare instances that a man who has zealously contributed to the prosperity of his employer is admitted to partnership. Therefore of more than casual interest is the action of the pioneer firm of Sherman, Clay & Co., in bestowing upon Mr. Andrew McCarthy an interest in the business, at the same time electing him to the office of treasurer. Mr. McCarthy entered the house in his boyhood days, and by perseverance and industry rose to the responsible position of manager which he filled in a manner that added greatly to the prestige of the firm. Mr. McCarthy has been warmly felicitated by his numerous friends on his good fortune.

A Crusade Against Microbes

Not long ago a musty old curmudgeon of a scientist announced, doubtless in high glee, that he had scrutinized a kiss through a powerful microscope and found it to be fairly permeated with large, fuzzy microbes. The discovery was hailed by his musty brethren as the finish of romance. Science had at last, thought they, got the goods on Romeo the lovelorn, and on the rowdy Cyrano with his pretty speech—Un baiser—to the fair Roxane's casement. The day seemed plainly in sight when poetic sputterings by moonstruck youth would yield to scientific selection—perhaps a public marriage bureau conducted under competitive examination. But now comes Long Beach City with a microbeless scheme of much the same import. This select village has set itself above and apart from the rest of poor, infected mankind by a means that nothing but Southern California or Kansas would think of or act upon. In short it has passed a municipal edict placing a ban upon dogs, cats, cows, canaries, chickens, parrots, white mice and Belgian hares and in general every living thing whose existence depends upon its owner's affection; and even horses and mules are placed under severe sanitary restrictions. Long Beach is now microbeless as well as saloonless. There is nothing to prevent its inmates from entering the Hereafter via senile decay, after vegetating into a green, aseptic old age. To the busy, pleasure loving San Franciscan, with his many bad and many forgivable traits, this panic fear of microbes looms up as a powerful sermon on futility. There is a recklessness or fatalism in San Francisco's spirit greatly to be deplored, no doubt, yet morally preferable to a selfish and irreverent desire to protect one's mere animal existence by robbing life itself.

Their Awful Existence

The Long Beachcomber makes a veritable bugaboo of his environment. What voodoo worshiper is there, anyway, so thoroughly surrounded by spirits, ghosts and devils as the health crank. Believing his miserable, tortured body a mere chemical retort, he eats his protose and wheatnuts with a wry face and ends with an antiseptic gargle for fear meat might harden his protoplasm. He debases caution. So does Long Beach, which having no commercial, scholarly or artistic activities to absorb its time becomes fanatic over

In the meantime the San Franciscan is content to trust his welfare to the quarantine officials and the local health department. Yet he will not be entirely uninfluenced in mind by the action of Long Beach. For one thing, he will hereafter be more leniently disposed toward the Hawaiian who conceals his stricken friends in his own abode to save them from banishment to the leper isle of Molokai. The Hawaiian is desperately reckless and even criminal in this respect. But he is so downright human that we can almost forgive him.

Trying to Dodge the Gold Bricks

So many innocents have been stung by "the millions NOT taken out of Goldfield, but out of the pockets of the unsophisticated plain people by wily promoters and brokers that suspicion is rampant now whenever any one connected with a brokerage firm is observed tripping in the vicinity of financial distress. Owing to last winter's big slump in stock values, good, bad and indifferent firms have been caught short and in almost every instance the fleeced public shouted "guilty" till the badgered firms, in several instances, were able to prove their honesty. The last concern to fall under the criticism of the Nevada speculators was Patrick, Elliott & Camp. M. B. O'Farrell was the manager. When the grass became short several months ago and stocks still "kept a dropping" O'Farrell pulled out and came to this city where he started a new company. Several weeks ago he disappeared, or so thought those Nevadans who had suffered by the lapses of Patrick, Elliott and Camp, and the announcement was spread broadcast that he had jumped to foreign parts with a clean up of $30,000. The San Francisco dailies were deceived by the rumors and published a story of his departure on one of the Pacific liners. It was the regulation absconder story with the pursuing sheriff, the only piece of "verisimilitude" missing was "the blue eyed blonde with the swell figure, his companion." The truth of the matter is that O'Farrell was in the south on a vacation. He at once wired the sheriff and his friends in Goldfield of the true situation and rushed back here to straighten out matters; but as Patrick, Elliott and Camp's creditors are not all satisfied he'll have his hand's full. O'Farrell claims that he paid out $50,000 of his own private funds in his efforts to get the firm back on its financial legs and finally quit because the members showed a disposition to let everything go by the board. O'Farrell's end of the affair seems to be all right for Sheriff Inman, after investigating the complaints of his alleged flight, reported that there was "nothing against him."

The Entertaining of Alice

According to published report Mrs. Eleanor Martin called on Mrs. Longworth and after mutual pledges of admiration, the President's daughter coyly remarked that she was not averse to receiving social attention, and Mrs. Martin insisted that her apathy in the matter was due to misinformation, whereupon they fell on each other's necks and agreed to a day of dizzy social delights. At this writing they are plucking the fatted squab in Burlingame but it is yet too early to speak of the luncheon in the authoritative past tense. But at least we can explode some of the involved theories that unravellers of social mystery have concocted from the fact that Mrs. Eleanor Martin and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels will act as joint hostesses on the occasion. The favorite explanation that is bandied across the tea tables of the uninitiated, is that Mrs. Spreckels would find the role of hostess altogether too trying these troublesome days. The Spreckels' guest list has been rather abbreviated by a difference of opinion, and the wiseacres insist that Mrs. Spreckels made a very clever move by getting Mrs. Martin to share the honors of hostessing the affair. Mrs. Martin has scrupulously avoided taking sides with either faction—she makes the entertaining of others the business of life and does not believe in mixing up outside business with pleasure. Mrs. Martin has taken special pains to show the regard in which she holds Mrs. Spreckels. As I said several weeks ago, Mrs. Spreckels was among those invited to receive at the reception Mrs. Martin gave Mr. and Mrs. Patrick Calhoun, which fact alone limelights Mrs. Martin's attitude. Mrs. Martin and her son Downey Harvey have long enjoyed intimate social and financial relations with James D. Phelan (who is rather coy these days and disinclined to divide honors with Mr. Spreckels), and it is therefore easy for her to act as mediator between the factions created by the graft prosecution. How long Mrs. Martin will be able to fill the role is another question.

How It Happened

Meanwhile there is plenty of fuel to start a nice little blaze at which the cold outsiders may warm their hands and it seems a pity to throw cold water on their theories. But as a matter of fact these two ladies—Mrs. Martin and Mrs. Spreckels—did not closet themselves in secret session and seal, sign and deliver themselves to a pact whereby all the warring factions were to be brought together with Mrs. Longworth as the magnet. Mrs. Eleanor Martin went to the Fairmont to call on Mrs. Longworth and found Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels on the same mission bent. The ladies decided to have luncheon together and found the Longworths in the dining room lingering over a repast to which they had invited Miss Ethel Barrymore and Senator Newlands. There was a cordial exchange of greetings, and Mrs. Longworth said she hoped to find an opportunity to see her San Francisco friends, and then both ladies in the same breath suggested the luncheon and dinner and Mrs. Longworth agreed to ring them up on the telephone and appoint the day. I have this story from at least four people who sat at an adjacent table and could not turn a deaf ear to social history in the making. Just how Mrs. Martin and Mrs. Spreckels figured out that they would act as joint hostesses at the luncheon and that Mrs. Martin should preside over the dinner alone I do not know but in just such unexpected way as I have related were the affairs suggested. With Mrs. Martin's non-partisan presence as a guarantee it will probably not be necessary to censor the luncheon list very carefully. Mrs. Spreckels herself would probably handle the situation as though Burlingame were not passing through the glacier period. For with Mrs. Longworth to thaw things out society would not act as though it had been in cold storage all summer and I fancy the guest list would be about the same if Mrs. Martin were out of the running.

In Honor of Ethel

Ethel Barrymore, with her registered stage pedigree, consummate beauty, and pretended disdain for society, has nevertheless been extensively entertained by the smart set during her engagement in San Francisco. The beautiful young actress is usually the house guest of the Joe Tobins but they are in Europe just now, and so are the Charlie Clarks with whom she always spends much of her time. Miss Barrymore was the only one outside of the immediate family who was present at the marriage of Miss Tobin and Mr. Clark. In a published interview Miss Barrymore scores her press agent for making capital out of her social connections and evidently she has managed to successfully evade his alert eye, for several affairs given here in her honor have not yet been served with coffee and rolls at the family breakfast. Thornwell Mullally was host at a handsomely appointed dinner in her honor at the Fairmont Hotel. Among the other guests were Mrs. Walter Martin, Miss Virginia Joliffe, Miss Jennie Crocker and Mrs. Thomas Eastland. Miss Barrymore does not grow a Marcelled mane but society loves to stroke it just the same—the young actress still wears her hair parted in the middle and rolled smoothly over her ears when she is not on character parts. Having been engaged more times than Lillian Russell has been married and having thus far never played a speaking part at the altar, society women do not regard Miss Barrymore as a dangerous rival who is trying to bag an eligible in local preserves for Cupid has not yet hit the mark with smart drawing rooms the wide world over for a target.

A Void in Our Art World

The home-coming of Miss Gertrude Partington, who will shortly leave Paris for a visit to San Francisco, has brought to light a curious lack in the art equipment of the city. Miss Partington has lately added to her various laurels a distinguished success in dry-point etching, a departure not indeed remarkable to those familiar with the illustrative work of this clever young woman. Mr. John Wanamaker, who is responsible for the Hellen vogue in America, is responsible also for the direction of Miss Partington's genius along these lines, one of the artist's first subjects being Mr. Wanamaker's daughter, whose portrait by Hellen is among the etcher's best known work. That the well-known connoisseur freely expresses his opinion as to the superiority of the Partington portrait is regarded as exceptionally significant testimony to the beauty and distinction of the work. His opinion has taken the very practical shape of several other commissions, the resulting etchings being introduced into America in the Philadelphia gallery of the dealer. The work has attracted the widest attention there, and a large commission from another Philadelphia art dealer, for a series of the beautiful girl etchings in which Miss Partington has been so successful, is among the pleasant evidences. Naturally, to the Californian California as a mine of feminine loveliness ever suggests itself, and Miss Partington determined to combine business with pleasure and return to San Francisco to fulfill her commission. The artist's sister, Miss Blanche Partington, the dramatic critic, was accordingly admonished to look out for those newer beauties that have bloomed during Miss Gertrude's absence of the last three years—and for an etching press. The beauty-quest was easy, says Miss Partington, but the etching-press is another story. If the evidence so far is conclusive, there is not at the present moment an etching press in all San Francisco.

But Los Angeles Has One

Advertisement, and exhaustive enquiry among artists, printers, and art dealers alike, have failed to discover the local existence of one of these indispensable adjuncts to etching, with the coincident evidence of the entire absence of the art among the city's artistic activities. The fact also develops that Los Angeles owns at least one of these presses, the property of Mrs. Pope, who was Miss Marion Holden of this city, herself an etcher of some distinction. Doubtless among the lost treasures of the city were etching presses, and doubtless we shall have etching presses again, but in the meantime San Francisco is an etcher's desert. Among the beautiful women who have so far been asked to pose for Miss Partington is Miss Ethel Barrymore, who will "sit" for the artist in New York. That Miss Barrymore, like Mrs. Wanamaker's daughter is a Helleu subject, adds a particular interest to this promised portrait. For the local beauties, whether or not Miss Partington has them "on the list"—her opinion here being regarded by the artist as all but final—is one of the day's burning questions.

Distinguished Lecturer Coming

A matter that should be of considerable interest to people in this and neighboring towns is the coming of

ED AMONG THE FINEST BEACH RESORTS IN CALIFORNIA AND THE WIDE

Dr. James H. Hyslop, formerly Professor of Logic and Ethics at Columbia University. He will speak at the State University on the thirty-first of this month and will deliver a lecture under the auspices of the California Club on August fourth at the Bush Street Temple on Science and the Future Life. Dr. Hyslop is perhaps better qualified than any other man in America to discuss this subject, he having been one of the most active of the group of scientists identified with the investigations made of late years by the American Society for Scientific Research.

They Never Feazed Her

Evidently when Alice Roosevelt Longworth wants a thing all the blue ribbon badges in the world can't budge her from her desire. The morning that the Longworths arrived at the Fairmont, some hundred Christian Endeavor delegates were banqueting in the Red Room. Just as they were washing down crab salad with Spring Valley, Vintage '07, the word went round that the President's daughter was lunching in the main dining room. Careless of the possibility of their ice water getting flat, there was a stampede to the door to see Mrs. Longworth. That young matron and her husband happened at the moment to be drinking their favorite brand of cocktail. Mrs. Longworth glanced up, saw the bulging eyes under the motley millinery jammed in the door, and gazing pensively at the C. E. badges fluttering on "heaving bosoms," calmly ordered another cocktail!

Perhaps it Was Tea

One mild eyed young thing, who was among the last to squeeze in, and get a squint at Mrs. Longworth, remarked in a very audible whisper, "they say its a 'Rooshian' habit to drink your tea out of a glass." But I fancy that some of those stern eyed women swallowed that "tea" pretty hard. However Mrs. Longworth seemed utterly indifferent to the tempest she had set a bubbling in the tea pot in the Red Room.

Her Lively Interest

There is a remarkable difference in the bearing of Mr. Longworth and his near-Princess Alice. The Honorable Nicholas is evidently studiously intent upon ignoring the public gaze which follows in their wake. He carefully focuses his eye upon blank space or his charming wife, while she on the other hand pays the public back glance for glance. In sauntering through the foyer of the Fairmont she met curious gaze with gaze—a look that showed neither annoyance nor the disinterested glance of a public eye, but rather the amused gleam of one who is filing away "types" in the picture gallery of the mind. Mrs. Longworth herself is rather a unique type, for with the whole world for a footstool, she still manages to take a brisk interest in everything and everybody while the average San Francisco society girl is blase at twenty.

Evolution of the Shorbs

Los Angeles society was very much interested in Bernardo Shorb and his bride while they were honeymooning in the South. The marriage of "The Infant"

as Bernardo is called by people who have not yet adjusted him to his new role, is only another one of the dynamic surprises which the Shorb family has furnished Los Angeles since it pulled up its stakes in those parts. The Shorbs were not counted in the race for social leadership down there, and Los Angeles sat up and rubbed its eyes when Mrs. Ynez Shorb White began to appear in black face type in the San Francisco society columns. Then it was that the carpet-baggers and the new rich of the South learned of the glorious past of the Shorbs. The mistake had been made of estimating the social worth of the family from the standard of its financial worth, and the family fortune had vanished. Even the old Shorb home on a hill overlooking the San Gabriel Valley, once one of the show places of those parts, after having been mortgaged up to the hilt passed into other hands. When the Shorbs occupied it the hospitable latch always hung out, but no effort was made to win social prestige for the family 'scutcheon, though at one time even the family exchequer would have easily placed leadership in their grasp but the social bee had not yet learned to buzz in the family bonnet. I was told the other day by an old friend of theirs that even Ynez Shorb showed none of the social instincts in her girlhood which distinguish her now. The prominence and newspaperiety which the family have achieved here have made Los Angeles prostrate itself before the Shorb connections still left down there. Brent Watkins, whose engagement was announced the other day, is a cousin and is a power that is reckoned with by Southern California girls who are anxious to have a fling at San Francisco society. Mrs. White's influence with Mrs. Eleanor Martin is the lever by which her Southern friends believe she moves social destiny.

Mr. and Mrs. L. R. Mead (Mrs. Mead was Miss Mae Sadler) are expected home in August. When they left San Francisco on their wedding trip they went to Alaska but when last heard from they were in the Yellowstone Park. It is their intention to remain in the Park a couple of weeks then tour Montana and Oregon, taking the trip down the Columbia river and home via the Shasta Route. On their return they will make their permanent home at Byron Hot Springs.

A Pleasant Time at Bon Air

One of the most pleasant and perhaps the most popular of Marin County hotels is the Bon Air, delightfully situated upon a hillside overlooking the bay. They have had some delightfully informal gatherings there during the summer. The last was on Saturday the 20th. The grounds and hotel were crowded with some of San Francisco's best people and dancing lasted into the night. The personnel of these assemblies is always select and the hospitality of Messrs. Strassburger and Parker and their capacity as hosts has not only been demonstrated but is fast becoming known about the bay.

A NEW FINANCIAL INSTITUTION

Fresh and inspiring evidence of the confidence that notable financiers have in the future of San Francisco is given by the recent incorporation of the San Francisco Bond and Mortgage Company which is to serve as an intermediary between capital and borrowers in this city. The officers are: John Lloyd, President; David F. Walker and W. P. Plummer, Vice-Presidents; Treasurer, J. Dalzell Brown; Secretary, Rufus P. Jennings; General Counsel, W. J. Bartnett and Charles W. Slack; General Attorney, M. E. Cerf. The capital stock is $10,000,000. The purpose of the company is not to compete with well-established institutions but to co-operate with them in securing funds necessary for the immediate rebuilding of this city. It will be operated upon principles that have long been familiar to the greatest financiers in Europe.

Taking Ezra Kendall Seriously

Whether or not a humorist may ever be taken seriously is a delicate question, but for present purposes it may be hazarded that a so-called humorous play may be taken with deadly seriousness when it is so atrociously bad that it cannot even be regarded as a good joke on the audience. It is not possible that "Swell Elegant Jones," the offering in which Ezra Kendall is just now endeavoring, with the most painful results, to exploit his humorous personality, was perpetrated as a practical joke on humor-loving theatregoers. It is too bad even to possess that doubtful reason for being. It is so bad that the author has not dared to put his name on the program, preferring to be an anonymous torturer of the long-suffering public. And so, faced by the miserable failure of his every effort to be funny it becomes necessary, for the first time in his career, to take Ezra Kendall seriously. Time was when Ezra Kendall rocked an Orpheum audience with mirth for twenty breathless minutes but there is no hint of the vaudeville star in the Kendall of "Swell Elegant Jones." Careful attention to every line of the play fails to show a single joke worthy of the author of "Spots" and "Good Gravy." There are times when one laughs at the silliness of the attempts at wit, but that is only when an hour or so of painful endurance has worked complete demoralization of the sense of humor. One chuckles occasionally with solemn politeness, but the suggestion of a post-mortem tribute to murdered mirth is irresistible. There is not the inspiration for a hearty guffaw in the whole play: it is the canonization of insipidity, the apotheosis of dreary and unrelieved dullness. It is no disappointment to learn that Ezra Kendall is no actor, but the other members of the company are not famous monologists like their star, so there is no excuse for their collective crudity. Kendall has been provided with a genuine barnstorming company and scenery to match; and the fact that, so equipped, he has stolen for two weeks into the best playhouse in town—treading closely on the heels of Maude Adams and Ethel Barrymore—is the only thing remotely resembling a joke in connection with his engagement.

—Edward F. O'Day

Orpheum Vaudeville

The bill for the week beginning this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum is headed by the foremost comedy acrobats in this country, Frank Seymour and Emma Hill, who will introduce their latest hit, "The Mix and the Mixer," which it is predicted will prove a delightful surprise. John W. World, a clever singing and dancing comedian and Mindell Dreyfus Kingston, a soubrette with a powerful voice, will reappear after quite a long absence and are sure of a cordial greeting. Among other newcomers are the Five Musical Byrons, who perform on a variety of instruments with a skill that has made them famous. It will be the second week of the Stunning Grenadiers who have created quite a sensation and the last week of Gaston and Green, Roberts, Hayes and Roberts, Les Jardy and of those delightful artists, James Neill and Edythe Chapman Neill. Mr. and Mrs. Neill will say adieu to us in a new one act play by Edgar Allen Woolf, called "The Actress and the Devil." Mrs. Neill will appear as the actress and Mr. Neill will play "The Devil of Wall Street," a character study and very much out of the conventional. His make up is described as striking and perfect and he presents a type of man familiar to New York, and yet his appearance is made to bear a subtle resemblance to that of the accepted portraiture of his satanic majesty which makes the title of the play seem to fit it. The entertainment will conclude with New Motion Pictures.

The Prince Chap

"The Prince Chap," one of the greatest comedy successes seen in New York in many seasons so report runs, will be presented here with Cyril Scott in his original star role. The play was written by Edward Peple, and produced at the Madison Square Theatre

EMMA HILL

Who in conjunction with Frank Seymour will present the comedy, acrobatic eccentricity, "The Mix and The Mixer," next week at The Orpheum.

in the metropolis. Its success was so great that the day after its first performance tickets were placed on sale for the balance of the engagement. Owing to other bookings at the Madison Square the comedy moved up to Weber's Theatre on Broadway, where its run was successfully continued for over 209 times.

It was afterwards presented at the Yorkville, Lincoln Square and Majestic theatres, all within eighteen months. Besides this "The Prince Chap" was played 150 times at Sir Charles Wyndham's Criterion Theatre, London, and is now running in the English provinces. "The Prince Chap" will be seen at the Van Ness Theatre commencing Monday, August 5th.

Kelcey and Shannon in "The Idler"

Herbert Kelcey and Effie Shannon will play the leading roles this coming week at the Alcazar in C. Haddon Chambers' fascinating English society drama "The Idler." The play has something of an American atmosphere, for though the events take place in London they hinge upon a tragic happening in California a score of years before the opening of the story. The plot is one of intense human interest, dealing as it does with the career of a man who in early life committed a murder, and in later years is threatened with exposure and punishment. The plot abounds in thrilling complications and through its warp and woof runs the thread of a woman's love.

The Geisha

Commencing Monday July 29th that delightful Japanese operetta "The Geisha" will be sung by an enlarged opera company at Idora Park. The new members of the cast are Doris Goodwin, a singing soubrette, and Wallace Brownlow, the well known baritone. The work will receive the finest presentation it has ever had on the Coast. Hope Mayne will bid adieu to the stage in this production as she has decided to retire to private life and make a certain well known Alameda bachelor the happiest man on earth. After the run of "The Geisha" the ever welcome "Robin Hood" will be revived.

O'Sullivan in Oakland

The special engagement for three weeks of Denis O'Sullivan at the Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, opened most auspiciously last Monday evening with a presentation of Boucicault's "Arrah Na Pogue." The popular San Franciscan has already made hosts of Oakland admirers by his splendid impersonation of Shaun the Post and the delightful manner in which he sings the old Irish melodies. For the second week of his engagement, commencing next Monday evening, Mr. O'Sullivan will present "Peggy Machree," the musical play written especially for him by his wife, which he presented with great success in London and throughout the British Isles, and which proved very popular when given by him during his last engagement at the old Grand Opera House. O'Sullivan, by the way, has signed a five years' contract with Joseph Brooks and will be starred by him in this play next season, opening in New York in December. As Barry Trevor, O'Sullivan is seen at his best and will have an unusually attractive repertoire of songs that will include many of the ancient Irish folk songs besides "Welcome Home," "Driscoll Abou," "The Donovans," "The Birds Fly South," "Oh, Lovely Roses," and the fascinating "Widow Malone." The excellent stock company at the Liberty gives Mr. O'Sullivan excellent support. A specially engaged chorus will be a feature of the production of "Peggy Machree." "The Shaghraun" is announced for the third and last week of Mr. O'Sullivan's Liberty engagement.

"The Man of the Hour" is an early booking for the Van Ness Theatre where its presentation is bound to create quite a stir. The big special company organized especially for the tour by Wm. A. Brady will open here August 19th.

The production of "The Prince Chap" to be seen at the Van Ness Theatre is identical with the one that enjoyed a run of two hundred and nine performance at five different New York theatres.

"Salomy Jane," one of the most prominent of the past season's hits in New York has been booked for the Van Ness Theatre.

"The Lion and the Mouse" and a big production of "The Prince of Pilsen" are two of the successes of former seasons to be offered the coming autumn at the Van Ness Theatre.

English critics are predicting that "The Merry Widow" run at Daly's London Theatre will last for three years.

American Plays in London

An occasional correspondent now in London writes as follows:

"The English theatre-going public is collecting a strained garland of ideas regarding America, its customs and its language from a number of plays now being presented here by American artists. Grace George's bizarre diction is accepted by cultivated Londoners as a good example of 'English as she is spoke in New York' and the homely caricatures of 'Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch' are calmly looked upon by the untraveled, yet highly superior Briton, as correct types of American people. I sat behind a group of English people, comprising a baronet, two members of parliament, and three ladies of high position and liberal education, the other night. Each individual in the group assented with a superior 'Oh, yes, of course, that's very American' when someone turned around to say that all boys of eight years in the States chewed tobacco. This remark was, of course, apropos to the fact that one of the youngsters in the play is caught red-handed and black-lipped in the act of enjoying a plug of the fragrant weed. It is difficult to persuade an English mother that American parents do not delight in torturing their offspring, and all sorts of shuddering exclamations at the outrageous American practice are heard when a woman in the play kinks a little girl's hair with a flat iron. Verily, the idea of America gleaned from 'Mrs. Wiggs' pleases vastly, and vastly misleads the London theatre-goer. Mr. Tyler and his company may fondly believe themselves to be making an enormous artistic hit at the Savoy Theatre, but the real 'hit' is made by the exaggerated types which prove all the wild dreams our British cousins entertain regarding American customs and habits to be quite true. Inasmuch as more Americans than comprise the entire population of Great Britain visit England in the course of every five years, we may fairly believe ourselves to be very well informed about English habits and customs, and to look with pity upon our insular neighbor who derives his misinformation as to America from the plays sent over to London to exploit character actors and actresses in character parts."

The Infidelity of Madeleine Jeffreys

confirmed his suspicions. For instance, he ascertained that Madeleine, who hitherto had been a very stay-at-home woman, was now in the habit of going out for hours at a time, nearly every afternoon, "shopping"; though the number of purchases that she bought or had sent home, was, if anything, less numerous than heretofore. Again, though no more letters in that handwriting were received at the house, he learned that his wife usually found some reason for running out to a neighboring newspaper shop as soon as he had gone to business. He had no difficulty in discovering that the shop in question drove quite a lucrative little trade by lending itself out as an accommodation address. Hence the true inwardness of Madeleine's frequent morning calls there was tolerably apparent.

But these were only small discoveries compared with what came to light when George Jeffreys reached that stage of his investigations when he thought it necessary to interrogate the servants. He found both Martha, the housemaid, and Mrs. Holly, the cook, simply bursting with suppressed intelligence. What they had to tell him related to circumstances that occurred on two or three occasions when business had called him away from home for a few days.

"Oh yes, sir," said the voluble Martha, in the course of her revelations. "You know missis's little sitting-room, with the French windows opening on the back garden. Well, I first begin to think, I did, when, one evening, as you was away, and missis was supposed to be alone in there, I was a-passin' the door and I hear missis a-talkin' to some one, and a man's voice a-answerin' of her. Which, thinkin' it very funny—bein' then late in the evening—I came straight into the kitchen and told cook, didn't I, Mrs. Holly?"

"You did, Martha," replied the person referred to, nodding her head impressively.

"Well, sir," continued Martha in her rambling way, "me and cook thought as this was a thing as want more lookin' into. So we goes and listens together at the door of the little sitting-room, didn't we, cook?"

"We did, Martha," rejoined Mrs. Holly, again nodding her head even more impressively than before.

"And while we was a-listenin'," continued Martha, "we hear things as make us look at each other and ask ourselves whatever is respectable situations a-comin' to. Yes, sir, we did—we hear the missis and the gentleman a'callin' of each other 'darling,' and all manner of loving names; and then, it's true, as I'm standing there, sir, we distinctly hear them a-kissin'—didn't we, cook?"

"We did, Martha," assented her fellow-servant, the impressiveness of her nod being this time quite portentous.

"Then I tap at the door," went on Martha, "and turned the handle to go in, but find it locked. 'Who's there?' says the missis, sharply. 'Only me, m'm,' says I. 'I was a-comin' to ask you if there was anything I could do afore I went to bed.' Then I hears the sound of the winder being softly opened and shut agen, and a moment later missis, she unlock the door. 'I was asleep, Martha,' she says, makin' believe to yawn, 'and had locked myself in to avoid being disturbed. I hope you didn't knock more than wunst,' she says, a-eyeing of me rather suspicious. 'Oh, no, m'm' I says; which was quite true, for I hadn't only knocked that wunst. Well, that was the first evening as you was away, sir. And the next evening as you was away, me and cook decide as it was our dooty to watch what went on this time, sir, so we slips off our white aprons and puts black shawls over our heads, and we waits outside behind the yew tree in the corner of the back garding, in case there might be anythink to see. And we hadn't been waitin' long, sir, afore a gentleman—which it was too dark for us to see his face—come quietly in by the side gate and goes up to the winder and taps gently. Which a minute later the winder's opened just wide enough for him to slip through, and then it's softly closed agen. And cook and me, we creeps up to the winder and tries to peep in, but the curtings being drawed, we couldn't a-see nuthink, though we could hear them two, quite distinct, a-calling each other loving' names, and now and then a-kissin' of each other; which it was nearly a hour sir, afore the gentleman leave agen, going out quietly by the side gate, same as he come. And that, sir," concluded Martha, "was the last time as you was away, so we haven't had no chance of seeing nuthink since."

"You are quite sure of all this?" demanded Jeffreys, whose face was very pale and stern, fixing his eyes in a scrutinizing gaze on the two domestics.

"Certing, sir," replied Martha.

"Certing sure, sir," added Cook.

"And you are prepared, if necessary, to repeat what you have told me on oath?"

"I'd swear to it anywhere, sir," answered Martha, emphatically.

"Ditto me, sir," said Cook.

"But this gentleman, now?" interrogated Jeffreys. "You say it was too dark for you to see his face. Can you give me any sort of description of him—was he a big man or a small man, for instance?"

"Well, sir," rejoined Martha, "I should say as he was neither one thing nor the other, though rather on the small side—'bout as big as the milkman, shouldn't you say, Cook?"

"Just about," nodded Mrs. Holly.

"And he'd got a beard, sir," continued Martha. "Rather a long beard, which made me think he might be a hartist, or a littery gent, or sumthink o' that sort. But that was as much as I could see."

"You have nothing further to add to what you have told me?" demanded Jeffreys, after a moment's silence.

"No, sir. We've a told you everythink," replied Martha.

"Yes, sir, we've a told you everythink," corroborated Cook.

"That will do for the present, then. I need not keep you further now. But I must impress upon you not to tell anybody—and especially not to tell your mistress—of the information you have given me."

Both domestics assured him that they shouldn't dream of such a thing and then withdrew. The upshot of the interview was that Jeffreys at once consulted a fellow attorney as to his best course of action, and, acting on the latter's advice, he employed a detective to watch Madeleine. Probably the lady had somehow got an inkling that her movements were under surveillance; at any rate, she was so careful in her behaviour that the man employed to spy upon her found himself persistently baffled. But Jeffreys, determined to find out the whole truth, and to find it out without more delay, took the drastic step of breaking open his wife's desk one Sunday when she was at church, in order to see whether he could discover any evidence there in the shape of compromising letters.

The result of this step was decisive. In her desk he found from thirty to forty letters in the same unmistakably masculine handwriting as he had observed on the envelope of that letter which had first aroused his suspicions, and a perusal of their contents placed Madeleine's guilt beyond doubt. The writer had so far had the prudence to conceal his identity that he had refrained from attaching his surname to the "ever your devoted Boy" with which all the letters wound up. But though he had thus been careful to hide his personality, he had taken no pains whatever to conceal the real nature of his relations with Madeleine, but had let himself go with an ardour of amorous unreserve that clearly revealed the state of the case. Jeffreys' face grew black with rage as he read them. When his wife returned from church, there was a terrible scene.

Madeleine stood up to the infuriated Jeffreys with a courage and a spirit worthy of a better cause. She refused either to admit or deny anything. Her husband had stooped to question her own servants against her, to set detectives on her track, to force open her desk and read her letters. She would have nothing to say to such a man. He had taken upon himself to ferret out things to her discredit in his own mean, underhand way, and in that way he might continue to make what investigations he pleased, and to discover what he could. She was not going to hold any communication with him on the subject.

"By Heaven!" cried out Jeffreys, almost beside himself with anger at her cool defiance of him. "You shall tell me, woman! I will wring from your false lips the name of the scoundrel who has betrayed me."

She smiled at him in cold disdain.

"Will you?" she replied. "We shall see."

"By —," he ejaculated, now white with fury, as he shook his fist at her. "I will make you tell me, you —."

She neither quailed at his clenched fist, nor winced at the foul name by which he addressed her.

"Nothing shall ever make me tell," she answered, drawing herself up very proud and erect. "I love him far too well to give him away."

She was utterly in the wrong. She stood convicted of that which should have bowed her down with shame, if not with repentance. Yet there was something almost splendid, almost noble, in the woman's misplaced loyalty, in the courage with which, while she was ready to face any consequences for herself, she proudly refused to betray her lover.

It was in vain that Jeffreys raved, stormed, threatened. She remained defiant and immovable.

"Look here, you shameless baggage!" he cried out, at length, "let me warn you, for the last time, that unless you give me up this fellow's name, I will drag you through the exposure of the Divorce Court without mercy and without compunction."

"Drag me where you please," she answered, with proud determination. "I do not want either your mercy or your compunction. I would not have them at a gift. I hate and despise you far too much. But I love him, and I will never betray him—never, never."

With that, she turned and left him. Half an hour later she quitted her husband's roof for the last time.

Madeleine kept her secret faithfully and well. By no artifice or investigation could Jeffreys discover the identity of her lover. In the end, when he commenced divorce proceedings, he was obliged to cite as co-respondent "some person unknown." This circumstance of itself attracted a good deal of attention to the case, which Madeleine fought out to the bitter end. But those fatal letters (corroborated by the evidence of the servants, which remained unshaken under cross-examination) were damning and conclusive. In due course the decree was made absolute, and about a couple of years later Jeffreys married again.

Not long after that event he was surprised and not very well pleased to find lying on his plate, when he came down to breakfast one morning, a letter addressed to him in Madeleine's handwriting. Opening it, with a moody frown, he read as follows:

I am glad to see you have married again. I hope your present wife will make you happier than I did. I think the time has now come for me to tell you the truth about my lover, whose identity I have hitherto refused to disclose.

I certainly deceived you. But not in the way you thought. The fact is this. When I realized that I did not love you, I found it simply insupportable to remain your wife. But the law says that only sin in the man or the woman can dissolve the marriage tie. Now, there was no chance of your sinning, and I could not sin in that way. I could, however, behave in such a manner as to make you believe that I had sinned. And this is what I did, in order that you might claim release from me.

Can't you guess how I did it? It was the easiest thing in the world. For what easier than to counterfeited the bass tones of a man's voice for the deception of two suspicious maids listening at the keyhole? What easier than to disguise one's self in male attire, with a false beard, and to slip in at nightfall through one's own boudoir window? What easier than to write, and to get a confidential friend to copy, any number of compromising letters, and to take care that they should fall into your hands?

Briefly: there was no man in the case. I was my own lover. There, you have my secret. I shall not disclose to anyone else; no more, of course, will you.

AUTO NOTES

Mr. J. H. Durst returned to this city on Friday last after spending several weeks in Nevada, where he took with him his model "A" Oldsmobile. Mr. Durst reports having made several thousand miles in his car. He makes special mention of a trip from Hawthorn to Bodie through the Sweet Water Country. At times he was compelled to go over a grade of 12 miles in length, averaging probably 20 per cent and, at points, as much as 35 per cent. A great deal of sand was encountered and, in summing up the trip, Mr. Durst says he does not believe there is another car built, in the class of the Model "A" Oldsmobile, which will duplicate the performance of his car.

Mr. I. M. Green, who, with his family, is spending his vacation in Lake County, visited this city for a few hours last Saturday and says he is having a most delightful time touring through Lake County in his Model "A" Oldsmobile.

Mr. David D. Vint is an ardent devotee of the speed wagon which gets its power from gasoline. Since purchasing his 60 H.-P. Thomas "Flyer" Mr. Vint has thoroughly acquainted himself with the car and now dispenses with a chauffeur entirely, having found, as most motorists do, that the real fun is only experienced when at the wheel.

Mrs. H. F. Mordoff received her new Thomas "Flyer" last week and has made several pleasant trips through Alameda and other bay counties. She is a firm believer in the fact that the Thomas is the only car.

"Priscilla of the Doll Shop"

Nina Rhoades has a well-earned reputation as a writer of stories for the little girls still interested in dollies and toy tea sets, and such miniature momentous matters. She is wise enough not to preach, but confines herself to relating an interesting narrative, leaving the moral to take care of itself, and as her good girls are not superlatively good, nor her naughty ones impossibly bad, and her "big people" neither implacable tyrants nor idiotically complacent, little readers find themselves at home to the extent of feeling that if the incidents are not likely to occur in their own lives, at least they might have happened to other children. "Priscilla of the Doll Shop" is the title of her latest book, but that is only one of three stories. Priscilla was a little girl who helped dress dolls for sale after school hours, and out of her occupation in assisting her aunt to earn their support, she walked right into the middle of a real story. "When Eva was Seven" tells of another little maiden who, overhearing some servant's gossip, was convinced that her parents were woefully disappointed that she was not a boy. Her little playmate, Jimmy Murphy, was an only son, and Mrs. Murphy having once said to Eva that she wished she had a nice little girl of her own, the child set about rectifying the mistakes of Nature by attempting to effect an exchange. What happened, then, and the games and plays which Eva and Jimmy enjoyed together will interest both boys and girls of the same age. "Lulu's Penance" is most heartily commended to those mothers and aunts who will persist in afflicting their juvenile relatives with those abominable "Elsie" books. Lulu was pretty well spoiled by adulation, to begin with, but the finishing touch was added when a companion loaned her "Elsie Dinsmore," and she felt moved to emulate the example of that sniveling little Pharisee who is the most dangerous book companion ever deliberately chosen for a little girl. The three stories together make quite a substantial volume. The cover design is similar to that employed on previous books by the same author, so that, though they do not form a continuous series, yet the "Brick House Books" are easily associated. Illustrations, by Bertha Davidson, are unusually good. Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

"Heart Melodies," a selection of prose and poetical extracts of a cheerful and uplifting character brought together by Mary Allette Ayer, will make its own appeal to those in search of something at the same time useful, appropriate and beautiful as a gift to a book-loving friend. It will be equally appreciated by the youngest girl past nursery age and by the oldest woman who has yet eyesight enough to read by or hearing enough to enjoy being read to. The selections are gathered from every source, yet the compilation is free from the usual padding and platitudinous bits which seem to be forced in for the sake of having something, no matter what, from every great writer. The dainty white and gold binding immediately suggests Easter, Christmas, confirmation, a birthday, a wedding anniversary, or the recovery from an illness, in fact, there is no occasion upon which a gift of any kind is appropriate that "Heart Melodies" would not fit into. This is the third volume of selected gems by the same editor, the predecessors being "Daily Cheer Year Book," and "The Joys of Friendship." Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.
